14th Union Joins Strike Against GE

By Eugene A. Kelly

Picket lines of 150,000 General Electric strikers stayed solid during the holidays as members of a 14th union joined the united labor effort to win acceptable new contracts from the giant electrical manufacturer.

The Firemen & Oilers joined the AFL-CIO's Coordinated Bargaining Committee for as long as it takes to get a settlement from GE, the nation's fourth richest corporation. The union represents GE climate-controllers.

At New York's Summit Hotel, Disputes Dir. Walter Maggiolo of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service held two unproductive meetings with the parties Dec. 29 and 30. When GE showed no sign of changing its take-it-or-leave-it bargaining posture, Maggiolo recessed the talks to Jan. 5.

Nothing will happen, he pointed out, "if everyone sits around waiting for someone else to make the first move. Let's all come back Monday prepared to move" toward an agreement.

Other developments in the strike, now in its third month:

- The AFL-CIO boycott of GE products was proving effective in many areas. Sales were down and a number of major retailers took GE products off their shelves.
- Contributions toward the GE Strike Support Fund approached the $2 million mark in the nationwide drive for donations of $1 or more per union member.
- A GE back-to-work drive sputtered out in failure. At company headquarters a spokesman admitted "there has been no great return" to work through picket lines.

Central labor bodies across the country have staged rallies to tell the story of the strike to union members and to win support for the "boycott and buck" campaign.

Boycott demonstrations at company outlets before Christmas were called "phenomenally successful" by strike leaders. Minneapolis-St. Paul unionists said the boycott has been so effective there that no major department or appliance store was reported advertising or displaying GE products.

The Jewish Daily Forward, largest and most influential Yiddish language daily in the United States, announced that its directors had voted not to accept advertising from local merchants featuring GE products in any city where the Forward is read.

Labor Hits Policy Shift On Mideast

The AFL-CIO called on the U.S. government to "cease bartering away the freedom of Israel and trying to appease Soviet and Arab dictators."

Federation Pres. George Meany urged the Administration to insist on direct negotiations between Israel and Arab nations "as the only mechanism which can achieve lasting peace in the Middle East."

The United States must further "redress" the present imbalance of arms in the Middle East by assuring that Israel has the weapons needed to protect herself, Meany said. "The current imbalance, created when the Russians rearmed Nasser, is not conducive to peace," he warned.

The AFL-CIO statement was issued in the light of recent reports that the United States has submitted a set of specific guidelines to a four-power conference trying to resolve the Israeli-Arab dispute.

The proposals, as reported, would include withdrawal of Israeli troops from certain areas occupied in the June 1967 war, procedures for repatriating refugees and conditions for a unified Jerusalem.

At a news conference following release of the statement, Meany voiced concern over press reports that "bankers representing oil interests" have consulted with the government about the need for improved relations with Arab nations.

Although Middle East oil may be important to corporations and even to the U.S. economy, Meany observed, U.S. foreign policy should not be based on "preserving their

APPEASEMENT OF ISRAEL'S FOES would tend to jeopardize the freedom of Israel and ruin the chances of working out peace in the Middle East, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declares during a press conference at federation headquarters in Washington.

Says Labor Set to Meet Challenges

The problems that face America are not insurmountable, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in a New Year's statement in which he called 1970 "the threshold year" to a "decade of opportunity."

"The American labor movement moves into the Seventies fully aware of the complex problems that face America, fully determined to do everything in our power to help solve them," Meany said. (Text, Page 5.)

While listing a just and honorable peace in Viet Nam as first among the priorities for the new decade, Meany said the domestic problems confronting the nation are well-known: hunger, poor schools, deteriorating cities, de facto segregation, dirty air and dirty water, medical and health care that is denied to too many, an unbelievable housing gap and slums that grow instead of dwindle.

"Not one of these is beyond solution," Meany said. "In the Sixties, Americans aimed for the moon and walked there. In the Seventies, we know that the earthbound problems can be conquered."

The coming year will afford an early opportunity to test America's willingness to tackle its problems, Meany said, because the 1970 elections will set the nation's course for the entire decade. "They will determine whether men and women who believe in progress will back their beliefs with their ballots."

Session Ends in Flurry:

Congress-Nixon Rift Brews on Priorities

By Duane Emme

The 91st Congress wound up its first session with a flurry of action on major bills and the prospect of a confrontation with Pres. Nixon early in the next session.

The stage already is set for a showdown on national priorities centering on the issue of how much the nation can afford to spend on education and other vital domestic programs.

Debate on the subject, attacks on some of Nixon's policies and passage of a sweeping tax relief and reform bill marked the final days of the first session.

The tax bill, which the President signed even though he earlier threatened a veto, also raises social security benefits by 15 percent for some 25 million older Americans (Stories this page and Page 7).

The President also signed with "reservations" a strong coal mine health and safety bill containing special workmen's compensation for victims of "black lung" disease. There had been indications of a possible veto of the labor-backed bill.

The issue of funds for domestic programs is wrapped up in an appropriations bill covering education, health research, pollution control and anti-poverty programs.

The bill, as approved by a House-Senate conference committee, provides $19.7 billion in appropriations for the Departments of Health, Education & Walfare and Labor, the Office of Economic Opportunity and 11 smaller agencies.

After the House passed the conference committee bill, 261-110, the Senate set the measure as the first order of business when Congress reconvenes Jan. 19.

Senate Democratic Leader Mike Mansfield said the purpose in holding over a vote was to prevent Nixon from letting the bill die through a "pocket veto"—that is by taking no action on it within 10 days after Congress adjourned.

Since the President had indicated he might veto the bill, Mansfield reasoned, Congress should be in session so it can have a chance to override the veto.

Nixon Signs New Tax Measure Combining Cuts, Some Reforms

A far-reaching tax relief and reform bill, with increased social security benefits, has been signed into law by Pres. Nixon after winning the overwhelming approval of Congress.

The bill, worked out by a conference committee, capped a year-long effort by Congress on tax legislation. The vote in the House was 381-2, and in the Senate, 71-6. All opposing votes were cast by Republicans.

In signing the legislation, which he had once indicated he might veto, Nixon described the tax cuts as inflationary but said that the reforms outweighed this factor.

"I sign it," he said, "because I believe that, on balance, it is a necessary beginning in the process of making our tax system fair to the taxpayer."

Major reforms in the law include cuts in oil and other mineral depletion allowances; the closing or narrowing of some loopholes that have permitted a tax-escape on real estate, capital gains and banking procedures; a new tax on foundations; limits on "hobby farming" as a tax dodge; and a minimum income tax to get at least some revenue from presently sheltered income.

Included in the tax relief sections, are a three-step increase in the personal exemption from $600 to $750, a three-step raise in the standard deduction, tax relief for single persons, and a low-income allowance to relieve millions of poor families from having to shoulder any tax burden.

The 10 percent income surtax on individuals and corporations is reduced to 5 percent, effective Jan. 1, and expires completely on June 30. The 7 percent investment tax credit for businesses has been repealed.

While the new law closes or narrows scores of loopholes in the tax law, billions of dollars will continue to escape full taxation and unearned income will continue to enjoy a privileged position in the internal revenue code.

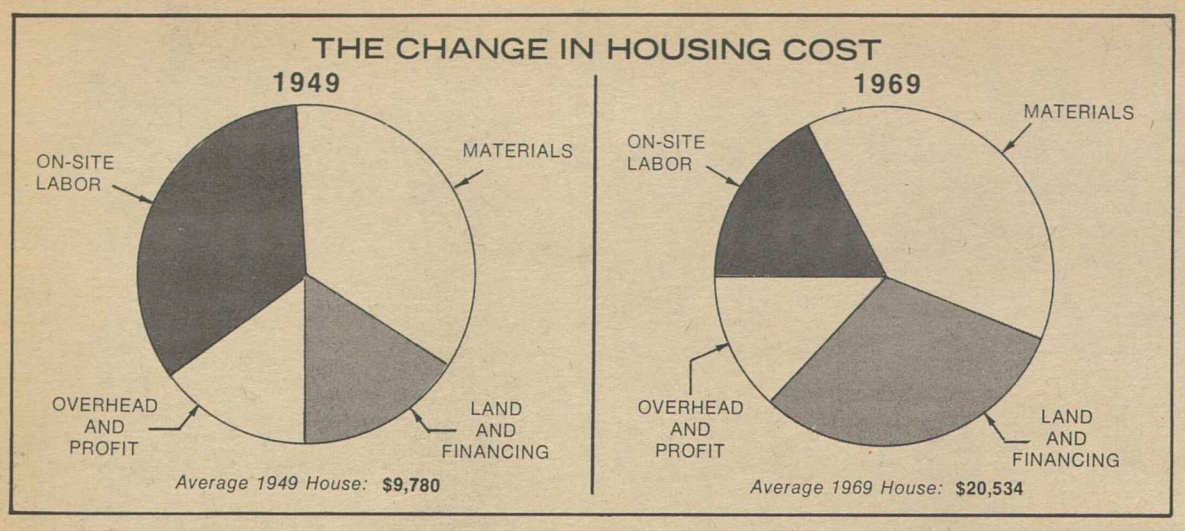
Buying Power Continues Skid, Prices Climb

By John R. Oravec



The purchasing power of workers skidded again in November as consumer prices continued to rise and average earnings dropped for the second month in a row.

While gross weekly earnings of production and non-supervisory workers fell 62 cents from the October level, the Consumer Price Index rose five-tenths of 1 percent to 130.5 for the nation as a whole, the Labor Dept. reported.

Real spendable earnings—take-home pay expressed in 1957-59 dollars to reflect consumer price changes—averaged 78 cents lower in November for the worker with three dependents.

Although workers in finance, insurance and real estate got a slight increase in purchasing power, this was offset by declines in other major industries.

Buying Power Continues to Skid, Earnings Drop for Second Month

Real weekly earnings for a worker with three dependents averaged $77.81, down five-tenths of 1 percent from November 1968 and 2.3 percent below the record registered in September 1968.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics said that the increase in the CPI was due mainly to higher prices for food, apparel and nearly all kinds of consumer services. Gasoline and used cars posted the only significant declines.

The November rise put all items in the index 5.8 percent above a year ago, BLS noted.

Food prices, which usually decline in November, rose seven-tenths of 1 percent. Fresh vegetables and eggs led the price increase. And meat prices were down less than usual as pork prices failed to show their customary seasonal drop. Restaurant meals and other foods eaten away from home continued to climb, but at a pace below October's record.

As a result of the November price increases, it cost $13.05 last month for goods and services that cost $10 in the 1957-59 base period.

Nearly all types of services moved higher in November. The most notable increases, the BLS observed, were for services associated with home ownership. These included mortgage costs, property taxes, insurance and residential gas rates.

Charges for medical care services posted a relatively moderate advance as the fees of physicians rose for the second consecutive month, the Labor Dept. said.

Increases in auto insurance rates and repair prices were the major factors behind the significant rise in transportation costs.

Public transportation costs rose along with new cars, while gasoline and used car costs declined.

Prices of nondurable goods other than foods rose three-tenths of 1 percent. Apparel prices, especially women's dresses, skirts and slacks, were up substantially more than usual for November, the BLS said. Prices of cigarettes and liquor also showed further increases.

About 161,000 workers will receive cost-of-living wage increases based on the CPI jump in November.

More than 86,000 workers, including 73,000 in the meat packing industry and another 10,000 grocery store employes in the San Francisco area, will receive hourly pay increases ranging from 6 to 9 cents an hour on the basis of the six-month rise in the national index.

An additional 55,000 workers, including 20,000 tobacco workers, 5,000 in farm equipment and 9,000 chemical workers will get raises from 1 to 5 cents an hour based on the quarterly rise.

About 2,350 in the Cleveland transit system will receive 7 cents an hour more in January because of rise in the Cleveland index since May. But another 10,000 workers whose escalation reviews are tied to the November index will not receive adjustments because they already have received the maximums stipulated under their contract.

New York Transit Talks Near Strike Deadline

New York—City subway and bus drivers voted unanimously to stop work at 5 a.m. New Year's Day if an acceptable new contract offer is not received by that time.

No public offer of any kind had been made as the AFL-CIO News went to press. The Transport Workers Union and the Amalgamated Transit Union said train crews and bus employes would prefer not to strike but the Transit Authority's "molasses-slow" bargaining methods may leave no other alternative. TWU represents 35,000 workers on the bus and subway system, and ATU about 2,000 on the Staten Island and Queens bus lines.

TWU Pres. Matthew Guinan said he is "disappointed with the way the authority is dragging its feet" because he had "hoped that management would break its pattern of making a late offer" and avoid the "biennial New Year's Eve cliff-hanger.

More than 5,000 TWU members filled every seat and stood outside the hall when the strike authorization vote was taken. The current two-year contract was due to expire at midnight Dec. 31, but the union agreed to extend the strike deadline five hours to permit holiday celebrators to get home by subway or bus, Guinan announced at the rally.

A three-man mediation panel appointed by Mayor John V. Lindsay has been sitting in on the negotiations at the Americana Hotel. As contract expiration grew near, Lindsay announced he was moving into the Americana and had canceled all other appointments.

The unions presented evidence to show that transit pay has lagged behind the cost of living and that train and bus workers are underpaid as compared with other workers, including other public employes.

Current rates range from $3.40 an hour for porters to $4.63 for electronic-equipment maintainers. Bus drivers get $4.15 an hour and subway motormen $4.46.

The unions ask a 30 percent increase over a two-year period. Transit workers average $4.01 an hour—well below the $11,264 that a family of four needs to live moderately in New York by Bureau of Labor Statistics estimates.

Union negotiators also have asked the Transit Authority and five private bus lines in Manhattan and the Bronx for a four-day, 32-hour week, time and one-half pay for all Saturday and Sunday work, a cost-of-living escalator arrangement, pension improvements, extended sick leave, major medical benefits and dental care.

The mediators are Theodore W. Kheel, Chairman Vincent D. McDonnell of the State Mediation Board and Joseph E. O'Grady, former Transit Authority chairman.

Sheet Metal Union Wins 2 Elections

The Sheet Metal Workers scored decisive victories in two recent National Labor Relations Board elections in the air conditioning and refrigeration industry.

At the newest plant of the Carrier Corp., Morrison, Tenn., the vote was 325 for the Sheet Metal Union, 187 for no union and 32 for three other unions. The plant eventually will have more than 1,000 production and maintenance employes. At the main plant of Lennox Industries, Columbus, O., workers voted 545-245 to rebuff an attempt by the Lennox Employes Association to replace the Sheet Metal Workers.

Citizens Group's Ads Ask Support for GE Strikers

Public support for 150,000 striking General Electric Co. workers is being urged in newspaper ads by the Citizens Committee to Support the GE Strikers.

Strike benefits are "a meager $12 a week" but the GE strikers "are determined to win their fight—and you can help them," say the ads purchased by the committee, whose chairman is former Sen. Paul Douglas.

The committee message suggests that the public can help in these ways:

"You can write to GE and tell the company that you support the strike. Encourage your friends and neighbors to do likewise. Let GE know how the public feels.

"Members of the IUE, which represents 60 percent of the striking workers, have increased their dues by one hour's wages a week" to support the strikers. "This is a sacrifice for these workers and we ask you to share it with them."

Committee members made this appeal:

"We ask you, as an act of solidarity with GE's workers, to send a check for $3.25—the average hourly wage of GE workers—to this committee.

"Your contribution will be used to support the strikers and their families and will signify your membership alongside us in the Citizens Committee to Support the GE Strikers."

Other committee officers besides Douglas are Bayard Rustin, vice chairman; the Rev. George B. Ford, treasurer, and Tom Kahn, coordinator. Among the members are the Rev. Ralph D. Abernathy, Cesar Chavez, Melvyn Douglas, Mrs. Martin Luther King, Jr., Sen. George S. McGovern (D-S.D.), and AFL-CIO Vice Presidents Frederick D. O'Neal and A. Philip Randolph.

The sponsors said "we do not work for GE, nor do we work for any of the striking unions. We have signed this ad because we believe that the issues in this strike affect every American.

"They affect the future of economic and social justice in our society."

Citing GE's record, the committee declared that a "victory for GE will encourage" employers to follow GE's reactionary economic policy. It said "a victory for GE will be a defeat for American wage earners and their families everywhere."

The committee's address is Room 110, 112 E. 19th St., New York 10003.

Myth Exploded:

Labor Small Factor In Cost of Housing

The price of home building in the United States is soaring because of increases in interest rates and the cost of land and not because of increased labor costs, AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger says in the current issue of the American Federationist.

In "The Myth of Housing Costs," Goldfinger points out that the on-site labor cost actually has dropped from 33 percent of the total cost of the average new home in 1949 to 18 percent in 1969.

The cost of land and financing has been about the reverse of those figures, growing from 16 percent of the price of a home in 1949 to 31 percent in 1969. In 1969, the land cost was 21 percent of the cost of the average new home and financing accounted for 10 percent.

Goldfinger quotes figures compiled by the National Association of Home Builders and used in congressional testimony in October 1969.

"The on-site labor component of housing has been the victim of gross distortion, ignorance and anti-labor myths," he asserts. "The sole focus of public attention on on-site labor costs and labor-saving technology is largely based on a hoax."

But many people believe the myth that labor costs are the chief problem in residential construction, Goldfinger says, "and they also believe that trade unions are the major impediment to reduced housing costs, although only about 20 percent or less of residences are union built."

He says the myth is ingrained in much of the talk about achieving national housing goals through the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development's "Operation Breakthrough." This is based on the belief that radical technological breakthroughs are going to accelerate the trend toward use of pre-fabricated units and components, thus reducing the on-site labor cost of a house.

But labor is such a small part of the cost of the average new home that even drastic reductions won't help much on the overall cost, Goldfinger says.

"As an example, based on these (National Association of Home Builders) figures, the on-site labor cost of a $20,000 house is $3,600," Goldfinger notes. "Let us assume that this cost is reduced 20 percent through the increased use of prefab, which brings the on-site labor cost down to $2,880.

"If the cost of materials can be held the same, despite the shift to pre-fab, and if land interest rate costs and profits were all stable, the 20 percent cost-saving would reduce the price of the $20,000 house to $19,280. That is a saving, but hardly a 'breakthrough.'"

Virtually the same is true for the renter, Goldfinger notes. He cites the findings of the Kaiser Committee on Urban Housing that "on-site labor costs represent such a small percentage of monthly rents that a general reduction of 20 percent for all workmen would mean only a reduction in rent from $100 a month to $98 a month in a typical unit."

The big bluster about pre-fabrication reducing housing costs through lower labor costs is thus detracting from the sorely-needed national commitment to solve the shortage of housing, Goldfinger says. And he points out that the crisis will mount in the next 30 years as America's population grows by at least 80 million—equal to adding the present population of England and France to the United States.

The Housing & Urban Development Act of 1968 set a 10-year goal of 26 million additional dwelling units, including at least 6 million subsidized units for low- and moderate income families, Goldfinger notes. But, he says, this goal "can be met only if there is a national commitment backed by effective government policies to achieve it."

"But today, more than a year after the 1968 Act was adopted, there is little evidence of such government policies and measures," he says. "The clear-cut evidence, in terms of actual construction, is to the contrary."

Goldfinger says that to attain the national goal, new housing construction should move up from the present 1.5 million starts a year toward 2 million. But housing starts are headed down, not up, he notes, and blames "the government's restrictive monetary and fiscal policies and the highest interest rates in 100 years."

Among the changes in governmental policy necessary to fulfill the goal would be a shift from inducements for business investment in plant and equipment to an emphasis on housing. Also, the government should stimulate money for housing through pooled mortgage bonds and a federal requirement that a modest portion of pension and similar trust funds be invested in government-guaranteed residential mortgages, Goldfinger says.

He also calls for direct public outlays for new residential construction of far more than the present $700 million a year and a national land policy which would include something like land banks to help hold down the soaring costs.

Warns Against 'Appeasement':

(the oil companies') profit pictures."

He strongly criticized the "inconsistency" of U.S. participation in four-power settlement efforts coupled with statements by Administration leaders, such as Sec. of State William P. Rogers, that peace in the Middle East cannot be imposed by outsiders.

As for the reports of the latest U.S. proposals, he charged, they indicate that the Administration is further changing direction, even "moving down the road of appeasement."

The contention by some that Soviet influence in the Middle East will lessen and American influence will grow if the government pressures Israel into giving up occupied territory "is sheer self-deception," Meany said.

"Such appeasement," he said, "would only give credit to the Soviets and Egypt for achieving through diplomatic blackmail and political maneuvering all they failed to win on the battlefield.

"It is an argument unworthy of America."

Further, Meany continued, any lessening of U.S. support for Israel will not improve America's image in the eyes of the Arab peoples as some advocates of a changed policy contend.

Proponents of such "image-building," Meany said, should think back to the years following the 1956 war in the Middle East when the United States joined with the Soviet Union in forcing Israel to give up territory.

"The 1967 war inevitably followed this appeasement policy which then also posed as statesmanship," Meany stressed.

Furthermore, he noted, the joint U.S. action with Russia did not make Moscow any more peaceful or friendly to democracy. Instead, it took advantage of our "image-building" to rush armies into Hungary to crush a democratic revolution.

"The repetition of errors," Meany added, "is a reversion to folly and not a recourse to peace."

Citing the preservation of world peace and the promotion of freedom as the overriding interest of the American people, Meany said:

"In this interest, the Administration should spare no effort to have the combatants in the Middle East enter into negotiations for a just and lasting peace."

He made it plain that the AFL-CIO looks upon the crisis "through the eyes of long friendship for the people of Israel and admiration for their devotion to democracy and their courage in the defense of freedom."

He pointed to the "deeply rooted" bonds of friendship between American labor and Histadrut, Israel's labor federation; their early joint warnings and later joint efforts against Nazi tyranny.

"Together," Meany said, "we have participated in the international labor community with a firm and unyielding commitment to democracy, peace and freedom everywhere.

"These are principles which tie American trade unionists to Israel. If we have to choose sides, we choose the side of freedom and democracy. Israel represents both freedom and democracy in an area of the world that has in the past known little of either."

GE Strikers All Brothers, Randolph Says

The General Electric strike is a "living example that the welfare of every worker depends upon the solidarity of all workers, regardless of race," Pres.-Emeritus A. Philip Randolph of the Sleeping Car Porters said in a letter to all members.

"There is no trace of racial division among the strikers," Randolph wrote. "They are all fighting for the same thing. They are all brothers in this struggle."

He noted that porters have through the years seen other evidences of the policy called Boulwarism, named for Lemuel Boulware, the former GE labor relations director.

In effect the company is saying "You do not know what is best for you. Only we know that. So here is our offer, and you can take it or leave it," said Randolph, an AFL-CIO vice president.

"We have seen this before, this combination of economic exploitation of workers and degrading contempt for their dignity as human beings. For this reason alone it is essential that the GE workers win their struggle."

Randolph noted that GE "still refuses to bargain in good faith" with the 14 unions representing 150,000 striking employes.

'Reporting for Duty!'

California Strikers Get Free Haircuts

Ontario, Calif.—Union barbers are doing their bit for GE strikers by giving free haircuts to union members picketing two General Electric plants here.

Members of Barbers' Local 253, San Bernardino, man the clippers in a five-chair barber shop every Monday. The shop, open since Dec. 8, will stay open for the duration, Barbers' Regional Dir. Alvin E. Holt said. Other locals may give like service, he said.

Local Helps Striker Visit Wounded Son

Jonesboro, Ark.—Local 747 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers is hard pressed to finance its strike against General Electric Co. here, but not so hard pressed that it couldn't give $200 to help send a member to see his wounded son in Japan.

The IBEW local contributed the money to a fund for Verlin Lamberson, who lives at nearby Bay, Ark.

Lamberson's son, Army Pfc. Tommy Lamberson, 20, is in serious condition in an Army hospital in Yokohama, Japan. He was wounded when he tripped a booby trap while leading a patrol in Viet Nam.

After Lamberson talked to his son by telephone, he expressed a desire to visit the youth during the Christmas season.

The 728 residents of Bay, headed by Mayor Ben Swanner, organized a drive to help. A total of $550 had been raised in contributions ranging from 50 cents to $15 until Local 747 came in with its $200.

Young Lamberson's left leg was amputated below the knee. Doctors said news of his father's visit must have given him "that bit of boost" he needed when he underwent surgery. "He'll be all right by the time his father arrives," his nurse said.

14th Union Joins Strike As GE Balks at Talks

said, from unions in many foreign lands — Italy, Japan, Mexico, Australia, Chile, Israel and others.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany announced receipt of a "generous and warm" contribution of $5,000 from Histadrut, the Israeli trade union federation. He called the gift "recognition of the international brotherhood of free trade unions in time of stress."

The contribution was sent by Itzhak Benaharon as his first official act on becoming Histadrut secretary-general. He said it "expresses our solidarity" with GE strikers "in their struggle for free collective bargaining and full recognition of union rights."

GE continued to advertise at a $2 million clip, with ads pressing the theme that everyone would be happy to return to work if strikers were not being shackled by "labor bosses."

When some of its ads accused the unions of refusing to bargain, Chairman John Shambo of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers' bargaining committee challenged the company to move the talks out in the open so members and the public could see for themselves who is refusing to bargain. Management refused.

The strikers, in an advertising message of their own, said:

"On behalf of the boys and girls, the women and men who make up the families of nearly 150,000 GE workers now on strike, we ask you:

"Please, Don't Buy GE Products — including Hotpoint and Universal-GE — until our strike is over."

AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William Kircher called on all strike supporters to remember that the end of the Christmas shopping season does not mean the end of the boycott. It must continue, stronger than ever, he said.

Because of the GE crisis, Kircher emphasized, "we are going into the New Year with a stronger and more united trade union movement than ever before in history. That's an achievement we can remember with pride to the end of our days."

GE Strike Activity Spurs Youths to Do Their Thing

The General Electric strike gives young people a "chance to help thousands of workers win economic justice," the Youth Committee to Support the GE Strikers said in an appeal for cooperation.

"Students and young people are only now beginning to become involved in supporting union struggles," Coordinators Max Green and Penn Kemble said in a message from committee headquarters at 112 E. 19th St., New York 10003.

The strike gives young persons "an unprecedented opportunity to forge a creative alliance with working people and their unions," they said.

The committee urged youth groups to take these actions:

- Organize a local youth committee to support the GE workers, and help distribute informational leaflets, buttons and bumper stickers.
- Join pickets at GE plants in the area.
- Collect donations for the special GE fund to aid the strikers.
- Hold public meetings to publicize the cause of the 150,000 striking GE workers in 14 unions, and boycott GE products in cooperation with local central bodies.

The committee advises students to "remember that we are supporting the unions, not telling them how to run their strike." It says "union members and their families, not students, will face the consequences if the strike is lost. Don't insist on slogans and tactics which strike leaders oppose."

The Dawn of the Seventies

AS THE DECADE ENDS we are beset by doubts.

Our self-defeating cities spread without plan into the countryside. In central cities, the pace of accommodation lags behind the rise in human need. By land, by air and by water we recklessly pollute with our waste the environment that sustains man and animal.

Our inadequacies—in housing, in schools, in hospitals—plague us. We plan from scarcity and not as the wealthiest nation in the world, counting ancient hovels as homes and calling beds in a corridor a hospital.

Some young people, judging the values of their elders to be irrelevant, prefer to wander in a rockbeat wilderness where no values thrive; others, unable to bear the "sufferings" of campus life, dilute course content and identify wrecking with learning.

Worst of all, a world with which we are anxious to share our wealth and our way of life, suspects our motives. We back our devotion to the cause of freedom with the lives of our young men only to be called imperialists. Meanwhile, domestic authority is challenged, eroded and undermined.

No other nation seems to be as troubled as we are.

TO WHAT CAN WE ANCHOR our faith in a sea of dissension?

For one thing, we ought to remember that no other nation is quite as troubled as we are because few have as much freedom to be troubled.

Countries without protest marches, without demonstrations, without a gadfly press or without disturbed colleges don't thereby have better housing, more stable youth or less trouble. We pay the price for our freedom in wide-range expression; they pay for the lack of it with suppression.

Freedom in this nation has its roots in the unique character of our people. From the beginning, our country has received newcomers from all corners of the earth, drawn to our shores by the hope of a better life—better than life in a homeland of social stratification, dictatorial government, poverty and prejudice, overbearing royalty or smothering nationalism.

Here, and here only, have newcomer masses enjoyed educational opportunities, social mobility, political freedoms which, despite imperfections, were to be found nowhere else.

IN A DECADE FROM NOW, today's 19-year-olds will be poised perilously on the edge of 30. What kind of world will they have fashioned for their youngsters?

If we preserve the toleration born of our multiple origins, if we sustain belief in equal opportunity for all, if we keep open channels of mobility, the generation that will greet the 21st Century will be safe.

U.S. Courts Show Leniency To Over-Disruptive Dissenters

By John P. Roche

BY AND LARGE I try to avoid comment on cases which are currently sub judice in the courts. While not accepting the rigid British rule that punishes any press comment on cases at bar, I feel in my capacity as a professor of constitutional law that American practice makes it extremely hard to get a jury that is unprejudiced.

Who in California does not know "all about" the Manson case? Where can Lt. William Calley find an unbiased jury?

However, I think that a few words on the trial of the "Chicago 8" (now down to 7) might not be out of order. First of all, on the legal level, I have grave doubts about the constitutionality of the statute that has been invoked. This is irrelevant to the conduct of the trial and will eventually be resolved by the appellate courts. Without going into detail, Congress has made it a federal offense to travel in interstate commerce with an intent to start a riot—this strikes me as pushing the commerce power well beyond reasonable definition.

But what impresses me about the trial itself is the extent to which the defendants are persecuting the government of the United States. There have been a number of criticisms of Judge Hoffman's handling of his courtroom, but (whatever their merit) I can not conceive of such a trial occurring in any other free nation. (In a dictatorship, of course, the problems would not arise in the first place.)

In a British trial court, for example, Bobby Seale would have been off to jail for contempt the first time he bellowed "pig" at the judge. Abbie Hoffman might be permitted to clown it up once, but the second time he started, "My Lord Justice" would ship him off to join Seale. Any courtroom disturbances would be drastically terminated.

And I doubt if a single British civil libertarian would blink an eye—the judicial process is not to be mocked. A few years ago when some protesters staged a sit-down on his doorstep, Bertrand Russell simply called the police and had them up for trespass.

What this highlights is the absurdity of the accusation that the United States has no tolerance for dissenters. In fact, the dissenter in the United States has the most incredible elbow-room. And, in the event he is arrested, he can then utilize public funds to announce to the world that he has been "gagged." In essence, the government sponsors attacks upon itself.

I am not complaining about this: it is one of the things that gives American freedom a unique character, a wild zest. But I do feel that this amazing libertarianism should get a better press. I get tired of my students telling me that we live in a police state, and recently I came upon some interesting data that really brings the point home. To the best of my knowledge, the story received no significant coverage in the American press.

On Nov. 15 a French group in sympathy with the anti-Viet Nam protest tried to hold a mass meeting in Paris. The Minister of the Interior said "no meeting" and, for openers, the Sureté arrested 160 "militant leftists" (many were already in hiding, so the agents arrested their wives). The minister justified this "dissuasive" action on the ground that violence was planned.

THE ORGANIZERS went ahead with the mass meeting. the riot police were present and, on signal, waded in with their truncheons. They beat up everybody in range and arrested over 2,600 people. I repeat—2,600 demonstrators were arrested. (I doubt if we have arrested 2,600 demonstrators over the last 10 years in the United States.)

There was no great outcry from an enraged public. Indeed, Raymond Marcellin, the Minister of the Interior, later explained to the National Assembly that the vigilance of the security police had forestalled a violent conspiracy. He is still Minister of the Interior.

To say this is not to justify any American rough play; it is simply to suggest that dissenters are well advised to see America first. Thank God, we take our freedom seriously.

Meany's New Year's Statement:

Labor Movement Prepared To Meet Challenges of '70s

Following is the text of the New Year's statement by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany:

THE AMERICAN LABOR MOVEMENT moves into the Seventies fully aware of the complex problems that face America, fully determined to do everything in our power to help solve them and fully convinced that America can successfully meet all challenges.

As America enters this new decade, it is well to take stock of what has been accomplished in the last 10 years. Since today's problems are so enormous, there are some who consider them overwhelming and some who lose track of the progress that has been made. Both of these attitudes are, in our opinion, a mistake.

First of all, substantial progress was made in the Sixties. Great strides were taken to eliminate poverty and hunger; to provide medical and health care for the elderly and the indigent; to demolish barriers to education; and to provide full and equal rights to minority group Americans in fact and in law.

It isn't necessary to itemize the long list of legislative measures which advanced these causes and promoted prosperity, security and human dignity. All have long been goals of the American trade union movement and we are proud of the role the AFL-CIO played in their enactment. The union label is nowhere more deeply imprinted than on the progressive legislation of the last decade which will benefit generations for years to come.

But being pleased with those victories is not to say that we are satisfied. There is too much more to be done for any trade unionist to enjoy the luxury of satisfaction.

The dimensions of the domestic problems are well known: hunger, poor schools, deteriorating de facto segregation, dirty air and dirty water, medical and health care that is denied to too many, an unbelievable housing gap, slums that grow instead of dwindle.

Not one of these is beyond solution.

In a sense, 1970 is the threshold year to the decade of opportunity in which America can fulfill what some call "impossible dreams."

In the Sixties, Americans aimed for the moon and walked there. In the Seventies, we know that the earthbound problems can be conquered.

The recent convention of the AFL-CIO set forth the goals for which we intend to strive:

- A just and honorable peace in Viet Nam;
- The total abolition of poverty;
- National health insurance—a program long overdue;
- The transformation of the cities into citadels of commerce, culture and civilization;
- Unlimited free public education through the college level for any young person who has the ability and the desire;
- Technical and vocational education for those young people who will be entering a working world increasingly dominated by technology.

WE ARE CONVINCED that the democratic process of America will endure and that through it full and equal opportunity for all will become a matter of fact as well as a matter of law.

In the final analysis, the way to achieve these goals is through adequately financed programs at all levels of government. This in turn depends upon a national economy geared to full employment, increased real incomes for wage and salary earners and a tax system that distributes in a fair and just manner the cost of making America truly great.

So 1970 is a crucial year, for its elections will, in fact, set the nation's course for the entire decade. They will determine whether men and women who believe in progress will back their beliefs with their ballots.

We believe America's voters will choose the path of progress, peace and prosperity.

Those are goals which demand the best of all Americans. We in the AFL-CIO are determined to do our share—and more—to achieve them.

Goldfinger Warns:

Severe Economic Restraints Seen as Trigger to Recession

A SERIOUS DANGER of recession hangs over the nation unless the Administration eases its tight, severe, across-the-board economic restraints, AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger has warned.

Declining employment, rising unemployment, home-building falloff and industrial production cutbacks are clear signs that the possibility of recession "grows greater day to day, week to week," declared Goldfinger. He appeared on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Goldfinger suggested that the nation's fiscal and monetary policies should follow a more rational approach through a more selective application.

"We have been going through a period of very severe restraint on economic activities. The results are showing up in the form of declining industrial production, a sharp drop in residential construction, a slackening of employment growth and the rise of unemployment," he said.

He cited statistics showing that there were 200,000 more people unemployed this winter than a year ago.

Goldfinger said the major problem in the current economy is the relative ease with which big corporations can obtain money, while small businesses, home builders, state and local governments are forced to pay more and more for financing that is harder and harder to find.

He noted that housing starts have fallen 500,000 since the first of the year, and that the credit pinch has sent state and local bonding costs as high as 9 percent.

"Big businesses have their own lines of credit at the banks" for lower rate loans to expand plants and install new machinery, he asserted, despite the fact that only 83 percent of existing production capacity is in use.

He pointed out that the only section of the economy that has continued to increase rapidly in recent months is business investment in plants and equipment.

"That expansion is based on profits . . . on tax gimmicks . . . on large depreciation writeoffs," Goldfinger charged.

"It is high time that Congress looks into the entire monetary mechanism of this country . . . and our monetary policies," he declared. "I don't think that we can keep going for another decade . . . with a so-called 'independent or quasi-independent' central banking system which frequently thumbs its nose at Congress . . . the President . . . and the people of the United States."

Goldfinger stressed that "there are ways of getting at this (inflation) problem without squeezing the entire economy, without unfairly depressing the activities of state and local governments, and without depressing residential construction." He said that such selective economic restraints as limiting business loans "according to the end use of the loan" should be adopted.

GOLDFINGER CALLED on Pres. Nixon to lift the general restraint on the economy—and instead to concentrate on specific trouble spots, such as the business investment boom.

He also suggested the Administration "develop pragmatic practical measures" to reduce the pressures on the costs of housing, medical care and auto insurance.

Reporters questioning him were Hobart Rowen, business and financial editor of the Washington Post, and Murray Seeger, Washington correspondent for the Los Angeles Times.

THE CONGRESSIONAL HEARINGS on occupational health and safety legislation have helped to throw some badly-needed light on a closely related problem, workmen's compensation.

Health and safety laws have the objective of making the workplace a more healthy, safer place of employment.

Workmen's compensation, on the other hand, had the original goal of safeguarding the interests of injured workers—establishing a balance between the legitimate claims of injured workers and the potential liability of the employer.

Now when evidence is presented at the occupational health and safety hearings of the deaths and injuries on the job, questions must be raised about equity, the care and compensation involved.

In 1968, 14,300 were killed at the workplace and 2.2 million workers sustained injuries on the job which disabled them beyond the day of the accident.

Some $2 billion was disbursed in connection with these deaths and injuries—64 percent by private insurance carriers, 22 percent through state workmen's compensation funds and 14 percent by self-insured employers.

These figures do not tell us several very important things:

- Some 18 million workers are still outside the state workmen's compensation law system.
- Occupational disease coverage — such as radiation, "black lung," "brown lung"—is severely limited.
- Employers can opt out of workmen's compensation and, as the above figures show, a large percentage do.
- Since there are no minimum federal standards, there is wide variation in what a worker receives for injury. Why should a foot, for example, be worth ten times more in Arizona than Wyoming?
- Injured workers are denied the right to a doctor of their own choosing.
- Many states deny protection to widows and surviving dependent children.

Our present state workmen's compensation system was established in 1912. The first, extremely limited state law, was passed in Maryland in 1902.

In 1909, Pres. Theodore Roosevelt wrote the Congress:

"Exactly as the workman is entitled to his wages, so he should be entitled to indemnity for injury sustained in the natural course of his labor in such manner that the employer is properly represented without expense to him.

"This same broad principle which should apply to the government should ultimately be made applicable to all private employers. Where the nation has power, it should enact laws to this effect. Where the states alone have the power, they should enact the laws."

At the time that Roosevelt made this statement there were questions over rightful jurisdiction. Today there is no question that the federal government has the power to establish federal standards so that injured workers will not be punished for living in one state or rewarded for residing in another.

ONE OF THE MOST serious shortcomings of the low benefits and limited duration of workmen's compensation coverage is that it tosses out other protections for work-related deaths and injuries.

When workmen's compensation is accepted as the exclusive remedy in cases of work injury, the worker is denied the right to go to the courts and sue the employer. And in a majority of cases the benefits he receives from workmen's compensation are far too inadequate and he must carry the rest of the burden.

One partial approach to more adequate protection in cases of permanent total disability is included in proposed amendments to the social security system. This has strong support from organized labor.

The private insurance carriers are now urging the states to upgrade their levels as is Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz.

But for 57 years most states have not responded to pleas for adequate protection. And for this reason there is a growing demand for federal standards.

1969 Closes Decade of Heights, Depths

Era of Sweeping Changes Leaves Scars, But Also Great Successes

By Harry Conn

We are marking not only the end of a year but the end of a decade.

In the last 10 years the American working man has experienced both exhilarating heights and dismal depths; overall he has seen change sweep across the land and across the world.

It was only in November 1960 that John F. Kennedy was elected to the presidency of the United States. He brought new style to government and made youth both exciting and respectable. The workingman knew he had a friend in the White House.

In November 1963 all this was savagely ripped away with an assassin's bullet.

However, the new President, Lyndon B. Johnson, was a man who was determined to carry on and extend the Kennedy program. Under his leadership the country went through an unparalleled advance in social legislation: education, civil rights, war on poverty, consumer protection and many more.

In the latter years of the Sixties, we have witnessed an alarming trend toward racial polarization, nurtured by both black and white extremists. There are emotional divisions over the Viet Nam war, between the generations. And organized labor has had its continuing struggles with management.

Yet, in this decade we did make essential social advancement and we did put a man on the moon. And the trade union movement remains strong.

The election of Richard M. Nixon as President in 1968 placed the Executive Branch in new hands —Republicans who had not always been too warm to the workingman.

Just how Nixon has handled himself, and how the workingman has fared, is written in the history of 1969, spelled out month-by-month from the files of Press Associates:

Backs Off from Veto Threat:

Nixon Signs New Tax Law Combining Relief, Reforms

that was the initial thrust of the Treasury Dept. studies released early in 1969—the law's effect will be gradual as special provisions and phase-outs expire and as new requirements gradually take hold and begin to produce revenue.

Some $6.6 billion in long-term federal revenue will eventually result from the law, almost totally from corporations and wealthy individuals. However, it will still be possible for very wealthy Americans to escape paying taxes.

The most massive overhaul of the tax structure began last Feb. 18. In subsequent hearings before the House and Senate, more than 300 separate witnesses were heard, providing 14 volumes of testimony. Among these were lobbyists for every conceivable industry, mineral, enterprise, foundation and special interest—all seeking to protect or enlarge their favored position in the tax code. It was in these hearings that the AFL-CIO proposed its program to close $16 billion in tax loopholes.

As a result of the hearings, the public soon learned that high-income Americans were paying little or no taxes because of special provisions in the law that enabled them to "shelter" their income against the maximum 70 percent tax. In fact, it was disclosed that the average income tax paid by those in high-income brackets was closer to 35 percent than to 70 percent.

With the Treasury studies before them and the testimony of reform-minded organizations such as the AFL-CIO, Congress concentrated its loophole closing among tax provisions affecting real estate, minerals, financial institutions and capital gains.

In the final measure, closing of real estate tax loopholes will provide $930 million in new revenue; the lowering of percentage depletion and the end to "carve outs" in oil and other minerals will produce $435 million; financial institutions, $420 million; capital gains $275 million and the minimum tax $635 million.

These new sources, plus a variety of other areas that are touched for lesser amounts, and the $3.3 billion that will accrue from repeal of the 7 percent investment tax credit, make up the revenue in the new act.

Briefly, some of these provisions are:

Minimum tax: A taxpayer adds up his income from some dozen sources presently sheltered from taxation, subtracts $30,000, then subtracts the tax he pays on his regular taxable income. A flat tax of 10 percent is levied on the remainder.

Real estate: Double depreciation, presently available for all new construction would be restricted to new housing. Other new building could be depreciated at the rate of 150 percent and all used construction would be confined to straight line depreciation except residences with a useful life of more than 20 years, which could use a 125 percent rate. Recapture provisions were strengthened.

Financial institutions: The bad debt reserves, which are tax deductible, are reduced for commercial banks, mutual savings banks and savings and loan associations.

Depletion and mineral payments: The percentage depletion on oil and gas is reduced from 27.5 to 22 percent. Sulfur and uranium are also cut to 22 percent. Production payments, or "carve outs," are treated as loans.

Farm losses: Farm losses which can be offset against non-farm income are limited generally to 50 percent of non-farm income.

Foundations: Self-dealing between foundations and their donors or operators is prohibited. An annual tax of 4 percent is levied on income; stock holdings of a foundation are limited to 50 percent of a business. In voter registration programs, foundation funds can be utilized if three or more foundations are involved, if the program is being carried out in five or more states and if no one foundation provides more than 25 percent of the funds involved.

Special provisions that would have benefited certain corporations, such as Litton Industries, Transamerica, Mobiloil, Western Massachusetts Electric, were stricken from the final measure. An earlier provision that would have taxed municipal bonds as part of a minimum tax while offering the communities a subsidy to defray tax costs was deleted.

Other worthwhile provisions in the law are:

- Corporate mergers are discouraged by making the interest on debentures taxable. This will produce $40 million.
- Health and welfare funds of unions were relieved of an arbitrary rule that would make their funds taxable if more than 15 percent of their income came from investments.
- The deductibility of two-thirds of treble damages is disallowed by corporations that are found guilty of price-fixing conspiracies, such as that involving General Electric.
- The requirement for filing a return is revised. Anyone earning less than the minimum standard plus the amount of his personal exemptions need not file a return.
- The problem of withholding taxes on students and other part-time workers is partly resolved. Those persons who paid no tax the previous year and who expect to pay no tax during the current year will have no taxes deducted if they sign a statement.
- A simplification of the tax court will make it possible for any taxpayer who has $1,000 or less in taxes contested by the IRS to have a review made by the tax court without the necessity of taking formal legal action.

Of particular interest to the average wage earner and salary worker, the new law provides for $9.1 billion in tax cuts, beginning in 1970 and becoming fully effective in 1974. Congress estimates the average tax cut will be 11.7 percent.

The tax reductions are essentially those proposed by Sen. Albert Gore (D-Tenn.) and supported by the AFL-CIO.

Under the law, when fully effective, taxpayers will have:

- A $1,000 minimum standard deduction.
- A standard deduction of 15 percent with a maximum of $2,000.
- A $750 personal exemption for each dependent.
- The present marginal tax rates.

The percentage tax relief will be greatest to those with incomes of $15,000 and below, thus providing a more equitable distribution of the tax relief than in the House-passed proposal.

The actual dollars and cents reductions under these tax cuts, when fully effective are shown in tables on this page.

In a non-tax area, the new law increases social security benefits 15 percent effective on Jan. 1. (Story, this page.)

Of great concern to the AFL-CIO is the failure of the legislation to deal effectively with capital gains. The concept of capital gains is that unlike wages and salaries, which are taxed as ordinary income at rates of 14 percent to 70 percent depending upon how much one earns, favored tax consideration is given to income derived from so-called risk investment. For example, if an individual buys and keeps stock for more than six months and then sells it at a profit, that profit is not taxed as ordinary income but as a "long term capital gain." As such, the taxpayer has a choice of two favorable tax treatments. He may either pay his regular tax rate on one-half of his profit, excluding the other half from any tax, or he may choose the alternative of paying only a 25 percent tax on all of his capital gain. In either choice, the taxpayer would not pay more than a 25 percent tax regardless of his income bracket.

The new law narrows these provisions by including the untaxed half of capital gains in the new minimum tax and by restricting the alternative tax of 25 percent to the first $50,000 of capital gains. Nonetheless, capital gains remain a very attractive tax reduction device to high-income individuals.

There were other areas of consideration that could be considered loophole widening, or relief or tax incentive, depending on the recipient.

- The income averaging provision in the law was widened to include capital gains. The effect will be to cost the treasury $300 million annually.
- A maximum tax of 50 percent on earned income was established. The cost will be $150 million annually.
- Write-off for rehabilitation of low income housing will cost $330 million annually.
- Of direct interest to workers who must move because of their employment, the new law provides for $2,500 in allowable expenses for moves of more than 50 miles.

Social Security Benefits Raised 15% by Tax Bill

The nation's new tax law raises social security benefits by approximately 15 percent for 25 million retired persons, surviving spouses and children, and disabled persons.

Although the increases take effect Jan. 1, recipients will not get the extra cash until they receive their March benefit checks in early April. Included with them will be retroactive checks for January and February.

Social security payroll taxes will not be raised to pay for the benefit increase.

The law also includes a provision designed to prevent states from offsetting the social security increase by cutting welfare payments to the same persons.

Moreover, congressional conferees who put together the tax law said welfare savings resulting from the increase in social security benefits would enable nearly all states to increase welfare benefits.

"We're not saying they have to do it," Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) of the House Ways & Means Committee said, "but I will be most disappointed if they do not, and when we come to consideration of the welfare programs their actions will be considered."

In another development, Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare Robert H. Finch announced that the $4 monthy charge levied for coverage of doctors' services under Medicare will be raised to $5.30 starting July 1.

The 32.5 percent increase will be the second boost in the fee paid by the aged under the medical insurance part of Medicare, which is also partly financed by the government. When the program was first set up in 1966 the fee was $3. It was raised to $4 in 1968.

Labor has long urged legislation to finance the medical insurance through contributory payments, the manner in which the rest of the Medicare program is financed. This is one of the things Mills said will be considered in a "comprehensive social security bill" early in the second session of Congress.

Milton Miller, Labor Editor, Dies

New York—Milton Miller, editor of several labor papers and an Executive Council member of the International Labor Press Association for many years, died here at 58.

A charter member of the Wilkes-Barre, Pa., local of the Newspaper Guild, Miller had been a Guild member more than 30 years. He edited 338 News for Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Local 338, and other publications. He was labor press consultant for the Muscular Dystrophy Associations, and president of the American Soccer Writers Association. He wrote a column on soccer for the Long Island Press for 25 years.

Miller's wife Irma and two sons survive.

Congress-Nixon Rift Brews on Priorities

Nixon earlier said he would veto the HEW-Labor appropriations measure as "fiscal irresponsibility after the Senate passed a bill calling for $1.6 billion more than he had sought. The House had previously voted $1 billion more than the budget request.

Conferees later trimmed $500 million from the bill, making it about $1.1 billion more than Nixon had asked for this fiscal year. Some White House sources indicated the President still was not satisfied.

In a letter to congressional leaders, Nixon opposed the increased funds on the grounds that they were inflationary and that government spending must be held down even on such important needs as education.

Democrats Press Funds

A number of Democrats said they were eager to make the case for increased funds for domestic needs because they had already slashed the total Nixon budget $6 billion by cutting less essential spending and eliminating waste.

In another development, the Senate delayed consideration of a $1.8 billion foreign aid appropriation in a dispute involving jet fighters for Nationalist China.

Although conferees had approved the bill with funds for the jets, the Senate refused to uphold the conference report. It instructed its conferees to negotiate a new bill after Congress reconvenes.

The delay on domestic and foreign aid appropriations necessitated a supplementary money bill to allow agencies to continue spending at their current rate.

When this proposal was before the Senate Appropriations Committee, it attached language stating that no federal money could be used to pay for any contract "which the Comptroller General holds to be in contravention of any federal statute."

The rider was aimed at preventing the Labor Dept. from activating its "Philadelphia plan" to impose quotas for the employment of minority workers on building projects under federal contract in that city.

A few months ago, Comptroller General Elmer Staats told Congress that the plan was illegal because it violated the 1964 Civil Rights Act which bars racial quotas in employment.

Quota System Opposed

In a telegram to House Leaders, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany emphasized that labor "firmly supports equal opportunity in every kind of employment for every American and we have major programs to find, recruit and train minorities to enter better paying jobs."

But, he added in support of the rider, "we are just as firmly opposed to quota systems which are illegal, un-American and in and of themselves discriminatory."

The Senate approved the rider as did a conference committee on the appropriations bill. However, the House and Senate later voted to remove it.

The new coal mine law sets strict dust levels for mines and will require many of them to install new anti-explosion equipment over the next six years.

It provides compensation for miners who incur pneumoconiosis — "black lung" disease — as well as benefits for their dependents, to be paid initially by the federal government with states gradually taking over the financing.

The Administration had lobbied against the bill in Congress. Nixon, in signing it, said he had misgivings about the federal government having to pay benefits. However, he termed the legislation "a crucially-needed step forward in the protection of America's coal miners."

More Bills Signed

Meanwhile, the President approved more than a score of other bills, including:

- Appropriations of $6.6 billion for the Dept. of Transportation; $2.5 billion for the Departments of State, Justice and Commerce; $1.5 billion for military construction projects.
- A $4.8 billion authorization for housing programs for the next year. This labor-supported bill also contains new provisions to help low-income families obtain adequate housing.
- A measure to allow him to invoke anti-inflation credit controls. In signing, Nixon expressed reservations and a White House spokesman said he thought the authority would go unused. Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.) urged Nixon to apply the controls to corporate borrowing.
- Legislation amending the railroad Hours of Service Act to reduce the maximum number of hours to be worked in a day by operating employes from 16 to 12 over a three-year period.

Shultz Names Advisory Panel On Job Safety

Labor Sec. George P. Schultz has set up a nine-member advisory committee on safety and health in federally-funded construction work.

The panel is made up of representatives from labor, management and the public. The chairman is Herman J. Spoerer, retired vice president for industrial relations of Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co.

Representing labor are safety directors from three AFL-CIO affiliates: Alan F. Burch of the Operating Engineers, Paul H. Connelley of the Carpenters and Victor E. Whitehouse of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Management representatives are George E. Aro, safety manager of United Engineers & Constructors, Inc., of Philadelphia and George A. Moore, president of George Moore Associates, Inc., of Portland, Ore. A third employer representative will be named later, Shultz said.

Representing the public are David V. MacCollum, safety director of the U.S. Army Strategic Communications Command and Barry C. Brown, director of the Michigan Dept. of Labor.

The committee was created under provisions of a construction safety law passed by Congress last year. The law covers up to 2 million workers on federal construction projects.

Air Line Pilots Elect Secretary-Treasurer

The Air Line Pilots executive board elected Richard H. Jones, an Eastern Airlines captain, as secretary-treasurer. He succeeds Seth M. Oberg, who resigned for personal reasons. The term will expire next November.

Jones, who also is an attorney, is admitted to practice before the Supreme Court, in the District of Columbia and Virginia.

Mortgage Ceiling Boost Called Blow to Housing

The government's decision to raise the interest rate ceiling to 8.5 percent on federally-backed mortgages has been termed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as "another serious blow to home buyers and residential construction."

Meany's statement came after Sec. of Housing and Urban Development George Romney announced that the "realities of the market" forced an increase of 1 percent in the ceiling allowed on mortgages insured by the Federal Housing Administration or guaranteed by the Veterans Administration.

The new rate goes into effect Jan. 5 and replaces the 7.5 percent ceiling which had been in effect since last Jan. 24.

Meany pointed out that the highest level of interest rates in 100 years had already strangled the housing market during 1969 and "priced a growing percentage of families out of the market for homes."

He said the new action would mean:

- "That monthly payments on principal and interest on a 30-year, $20,000 mortgage will increase 10 percent, so that the cost of the house over the life of the mortgage will be $5,000 more.
- "Home-building, which has already declined 27 percent since last January, will drop even further, at a time when America needs a sharp rise in residential construction.
- "Unemployment of construction workers, which rose from 5 percent in June to 5.6 percent in November, will continue to climb. Obviously many who will go jobless will be Negroes—at the very time the Administration is pretending to put blacks to work in the construction industry.
- "Another severe setback for the national goal of 26 million dwelling units in 10 years, established by congressional action in the Housing & Urban Development Act of 1968."

Romney said the decision to raise the rates was done "with great reluctance." He contended "the realities of the marketplace do not permit further delay" in the move, designed to attract more money into the mortgage market by making investors' return more attractive.

The increase will not affect FHA and VA mortgages already outstanding.

The HUD Secretary, in consultation with the VA Administrator, was authorized to set the interest ceiling by a law enacted in May 1968. Prior to that, the ceiling on FHA and VA rates was frozen at 6 percent by law.

Meany Terms Seventies 'Decade of Opportunity'

In listing the problems of the 1970s, Meany cautioned against dismissing the past decade as one in which nothing was accomplished.

"Substantial progress was made in the Sixties," he said. "Great strides were taken to eliminate poverty and hunger; to provide medical and health care for the elderly and the indigent; to demolish barriers to education and to provide full and equal rights to minority group Americans in fact and in law.

"The union label is nowhere more deeply imprinted than on the progressive legislation of the last decade, which will benefit generations for years to come," Meany said. "But being pleased with those victories is not to say that we are satisfied. There is too much to be done for any trade unionist to enjoy the luxury of satisfaction."

The way to solve the problems ahead is through adequately financed programs at all levels of government, the AFL-CIO president declared, "and this in turn depends upon a national economy geared to full employment, increased real incomes for wage and salary earners and a tax system that distributes in a fair and just manner the cost of making America truly great."

Meany said the 1960 AFL-CIO convention set forth the goals for which organized labor will strive: a just and honorable peace in Viet Nam, the total abolition of poverty, national health insurance, renovation of American cities, unlimited free public education through the college level for any young person who has the ability and the desire, and technical and vocational education for those young people who will be entering a working world increasingly dominated by technology.

"We are convinced the democratic process of America will endure," Meany said, "and through it full and equal opportunity for all will become a matter of fact as well as a matter of law."

Teachers Urged To Help Others Build Unions

New York—Teachers can repay their debt to the labor movement by helping other workers build unions of their own, Pres. Albert Shanker of the United Federation of Teachers said here at a testimonial dinner in his honor.

Labor, civil rights and other community leaders gave Shanker an engraved scroll in tribute to his "leadership, courage and militancy" and his active role in the fight for "equality and freedom" for all.

Among those who saluted the AFT Local 2 head were AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, Pres. Harry Van Arsdale of the New York City Central Labor Council, Mayor John V. Lindsay, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph, Bayard Rustin and Pres. Matthew Guinan of the Transport Workers.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany sent a message saying "Al Shanker well deserves the honor you pay him. As an educator, trade unionist, civil rights advocate and public-spirited citizen, he has served his fellow man with distinction and dedication. . . . The teachers, their pupils and the school system itself have all benefited."

Shanker lauded the labor movement for helping change the status of teachers who as recently as eight years ago were "willing to tolerate miserable conditions and salaries in order not to be associated with other workers."

Shanker's union defied the state's anti-strike law to win major gains in wages and working conditions for 35,000 public school employes. Shanker was ordered jailed for leading the strikers and his union lost its dues-deduction rights.

"Teachers have learned not to be ashamed, but to be proud that we are together," he declared. He called on the UFT to aid the war on poverty by helping to give all workers a union of their own.

Mayors Ask Arbitration, Fact-Finding

By Eugene A. Kelly

New proposals for ending the 11-week-old General Electric strike through arbitration or fact-finding won the "wholehearted endorsement" of the AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committeen representing 150,000 striking members of 14 unions.

The proposals came from the mayors of five cities with major GE plants. Meeting in Philadelphia with that city's Mayor James H. J. Tate, the mayors proposed, as their first choice, impartial arbitration binding on both parties, with fact-finding by an impartial panel as an alternate choice.

The CBC leaders, meeting at AFL-CIO headquarters Jan. 8, thanked the mayors for their efforts to "bring about a fair and rational end" to the strike. They pointed out that "each of our unions proposed binding arbitration to GE last October" before the strike started. Earlier this week, they noted, the unions also accepted a fact-finding procedure suggested by Sen. Jacob K. Javits, New York Republican.

"Both plans were rejected by GE management," the union spokesmen said. "It is with deep regret that we predict a similar fate for the mayors' efforts." Nevertheless "we hope they will continue" their settlement efforts.

GE Board Chairman Fred J. Borch telegraphed Javits that he was refusing the senator's fact-finding proposal because of an announcement by Labor Sec. George P. Shultz that Dir. J. Curtis Counts of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service has taken a hand in top-level mediation efforts.

Counts met with both sides separately in New York City but un-

Veto Battle Tops Agenda In Congress

By David L. Perlman

Labor will call on Congress to override a threatened presidential veto of urgently-needed funds for education and health programs.

The money bill, to finance most of the nation's domestic programs, includes $1.3 billion more than the Administration had requested for education and health programs.

Despite the increase over the budget request, the amounts are still substantially less than Congress authorized in the laws establishing these programs.

But the White House said the appropriations bill is too costly and announced that Pres. Nixon "absolutely" will veto it.

The AFL-CIO, its affiliated unions and the major education organizations have mounted a drive to build the two-thirds majority of the House and Senate needed to override a veto.

And the White House has countered with an appeal to Republican congressmen and senators "to support the President's stand" and "restore fiscal integrity."

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller has asked officers of the federation's state and local central bodies to contact congressmen and senators from their areas before Congress reconvenes on Jan. 19.

Critical Issue

They should be informed, Biemiller said, "that the AFL-CIO considers this veto to be a critical issue to the American people."

The President's original budget request called for only 37 percent of the amount Congress had authorized for aid to education, Biemiller noted.

He branded as "false and unfair" the Administration's argument that education funds must be cut back to curb inflation.

Congress has already cut $5.6 billion from the President's budget. Biemiller said, "so the increase in this legislation remains below the budget total and cannot accurately be termed inflationary."

Furthermore, he stressed, "no cut in federal spending that adversely affects America's children and its sick can be justified."

The appropriation bill, carrying funds for programs of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, the Labor Dept., Office of Economic Opportunity and several other agencies, was just one step from final passage when Congress adjourned its first session shortly before Christmas.

That one step, a final passage

'R-T-W' War Chest:

Senator Asks Funds For Anti-Union Push

"Right to work" forces are raising a tax-exempt war chest for a legal assault on the union shop, directed specifically at crippling labor's political activities.

Championing their cause is Sen. Edward J. Gurney (R-Fla.), one of only five senators to vote for each of three recent proposals that would have amended the tax bill to impose harsh restrictions on union political efforts.

The key measure, sponsored by Sen. Paul J. Fannin (R-Ariz.), and two variations of it were beaten overwhelmingly when the tax bill was on the Senate floor.

Now, writing to employers on his Senate stationery, Gurney has appealed to them to kick in sums of up to $500 to knock unions out of politics "with a single stroke."

The money, according to Gurney, would go into the coffers of the National Right to Work Legal Defense & Education Foundation. The foundation was set up by leaders of the National Right to Work Committee which has long led the drive to destroy the union shop.

Funds from the foundation, Gurney explained, would be used to finance "a national test case to challenge the constitutionality of the unions spending compulsory dues for politics." He said the immediate goal was to raise a "bare minimum" of $115,000.

Reed Larson, a vice president of both the foundation and the committee, told William J. Eaton of the Chicago Daily News that "we've been very pleased with the response" to Gurney's letters. But he didn't list any specific sum collected.

Larson also indicated that the appeal for funds was timed to take advantage of publicity on the recent proposal by Fannin.

Labor Seeks End to Fees On Medicare

Congress should act quickly in the new session to eliminate the requirement that retired persons pay a share of doctors' services under Medicare, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman has emphasized.

The action is urgently needed, Seidman said, in view of the announcement by Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare Robert H. Finch that the $4 monthly charge for such services will be raised to $5.30 starting July 1.

This fee under the medical insurance cost of Medicare, which is also partly financed by the government, was set at $3 when the

Big Bargaining Year Will Affect 5 Million

Union contract bargaining in 1970 will affect the wages and working conditions of at least 5 million workers—a greater number than in any year of the Sixties, the Bureau of Labor Statistics estimated in a report to the Labor Dept.

The report said an additional 5 million workers will get deferred wage increases under previously negotiated union contracts.

Contracts expire this year in the construction, rubber, trucking, apparel, meatpacking, auto, farm and construction equipment industries, among others, including many railroad labor agreements which may add to the 1970 bargaining load.

Because of the numerous contract expirations, the report noted that deferred increases under existing agreements are due for fewer workers this year—5 million compared with more than 7 million in 1969. But the size of the deferred increase will be the highest on record—an estimated 5.6 percent.

Major manufacturing industries scheduled for second- or third-year increases include food except for meatpacking, lumber, stone, clay and glass and metal working.

BLS pegged the average raise scheduled for 2.7 million workers in manufacturing at 4.3 percent, or 14.6 cents an hour.

Nonmanufacturing workers due to get deferred increases total

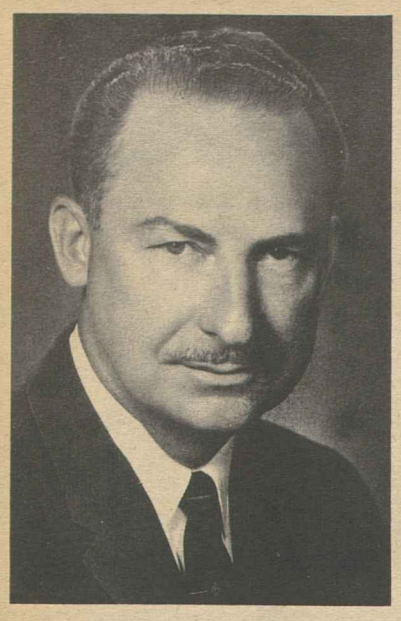
Court Urged to Uphold Dues Checkoff Order

The AFL-CIO joined the Steelworkers in urging the Supreme Court to uphold an Appeals Court order requiring an employer to grant the union a dues deduction clause as a remedy for the company's bad faith efforts to block a contract settlement.



Federation attorneys filed a brief supporting the position of the USWA and the National Labor Relations Board in an eight-year-old legal battle.

The case got to the high court when H. K. Porter Co., Inc., appealed NLRB and court findings that it made no good-faith effort to bargain with the steel union on a dues deduction clause at its Danville, Va., plant.

The AFL-CIO and the USWA are asking the Supreme Court to uphold the ruling. The company and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce also filed briefs urging the opposite view. The issue is the right of the labor board to order an employer to agree to a specific contract provision.

Attorneys for labor argued that where an employer rejects a check-off clause solely to frustrate agreement with the union, the NLRB's remedial authority includes the

FREDERICK O'NEAL

Roster of Standing Committees Includes Four New Chairmen

A new roster of AFL-CIO standing committees has been announced by Pres. George Meany. It includes four new committee chairmen.

Vice Pres. Frederick O'Neal, president of Actors' Equity Association, has been named chairman of the Civil Rights Committee. He succeeds former Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler.

Vice Pres. James A. Suffridge, president-emeritus of the Retail Clerks, heads the Community Services Committee, succeeding Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne. Beirne, president of the Communications Workers, had earlier been named chairman of the International Affairs Committee.

Vice Pres. Herman Kenin, president of the Musicians, has been appointed chairman of the Ethical Practices Committee. He succeeds the late George Harrison.

Nat Goldfinger, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, has been named chairman of the Research Committee succeeding Schnitzler.

All other committee chairman were reappointed. They are: Economic Policy, Vice Pres. I. W. Abel, president of the Steelworkers; Social Security, Vice Pres. Maurice Hutcheson, president of the Carpenters; Veterans Affairs, Vice Pres. Lee W. Minton, president of the Glass Bottle Blowers; Legislative, Meany; Political Education, Meany; Education, Vice Pres. Peter Schoemann, president of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters; Housing, Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan, secretary of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Organization, Vice Pres. Paul Hall, president of the Seafarers; Public Relations, Kenin of the Musicians; Safety & Occupational Health, Vice Pres. Richard F. Walsh, president of the Stage Employes.

The full roster of other committee assignments is as follows:

CIVIL RIGHTS: Minton; Charles Zimmerman, Ladies' Garment Workers; Louis Simon, Clothing Workers; Keenan, IBEW; Robert Powell, Laborers; David Sullivan, Service Employes; Thomas Murphy, Bricklayers; William Bowe, Sleeping Car Porters; Paul Jennings, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; Joseph P. ## Jobless Benefit Rolls Show Sharp Jump

The number of workers applying for and receiving unemployment insurance for the week which ended Dec. 20 was up substantially from the comparable period of the previous year, the Labor Dept. reported.

Total insured unemployment was up 58,000 from the previous year, to 1,251,000. The number of new claims that week was 289,400, which was 45,900 or 15.8 percent higher than the previous year.

New Labor Service Aids Cities, Counties

Convinced that public employe unionism is here to stay, three associations of local governments are sponsoring an information and training program to help public employers hold up their end of the bargaining table.

Sam Zagoria, who recently completed his term as a member of the National Labor Relations Board, will direct the new City-County Labor-Management Relations Service. Its sponsoring groups are the National League of Cities, the U.S. Conference of Mayors and the National Association of Counties. Together they encompass nearly all of the nation's municipalities and county governments.

The new service will not get involved in dispute settlements, nor will it "seek to intervene between public employe organizations and management," the sponsoring groups said.

It will provide training materials for management negotiators, provide information on current developments and trends in public employe bargaining and legislation, and "conduct research on how to alleviate problems presented by collective negotiations in the public sector."

Zagoria is a former president of the Washington, D.C., local of the Newspaper Guild and later served as administrative assistant to Sen. Clifford P. Case (R-N.J.). He was named to the NLRB by former Pres. Johnson in 1965.

In the collective bargaining field, public employe unionism is "where the action will be" in the decade of the 1970s, Zagoria told a news conference.

The sponsoring organizations described "the explosive growth of public employe unionism" over the past decade as a "vexing" phenomenon to city, county and state government officials.

Their statement announcing the new service added:

"Major established unions and organizations of all sorts have found the public employment sector a vast and fertile field for successful recruiting of new members.

"Almost overnight, local governments, which thought that civil service or other existing personnel arrangements were the answer to rising controversy over matters of pay and working conditions, have found these unions and organizations now knocking at the door of public management. And all too often, public managers have found themselves unprepared to cope with the situation confronting them."

The statement indicated that lack of management familiarity with collective bargaining techniques has resulted in blundering into strike situations "unwanted by either management or labor in the public sector."

Officers of the local government associations noted that much of the sharp rise in public employe strikes over the past decade stems from disputes over union recognition and negotiation of initial contracts.

Dubinsky Foundation Announces 1969 Grants

New York—The David Dubinsky Foundation has announced its 1969 awards program of 14 grants totaling $76,860 to aid various humanitarian and educational projects.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, chairman of the foundation, and Pres. Louis Stulberg of the Ladies' Garment Workers announced the awards, which range from $1,200 to $10,000.

The foundation was established by the ILGWU to honor Dubinsky, its former president. The first awards were made by the foundation in 1968.

Recipients of the 1969 awards include the Legal Defense Fund of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, which will use the money to support court actions in an attempt to end capital punishment; the Mexican-American Legal Defense & Educational Fund for law scholarships; and Aspira, a Puerto Rican agency that helps high school students find college scholarships and other educational aid.

The largest single award, for $10,000, went to the University of Wisconsin Industrial Relations Research Institute for research and studies in trade unionism. A commitment to renew the grant in 1970 accompanied the award, reported Gus Tyler, administrator of the Dubinsky Fund.

A $3,000 scholarship grant was awarded Cornell University's new Metropolitan Center in New York City. The center provides a two-year program for union members.

Other awards went to the Lower East Side Community Ambassador project which sends youngsters abroad for summer terms; the A. Philip Randolph Educational Fund to continue voter registration efforts; the National Committee Against Discrimination in Housing to train housing interns; and the U.S. Peoples Fund of the United Nations for the support of humanitarian projects.

The Medgar Evers Fund will also receive assistance in starting a program for the rehabilitation of Fayette and Jefferson County in Mississippi.

The awards committee honored three previous pledges totaling $30,000 to the David Dubinsky Student Center of the Fashion Institute of Technology and the Bund Archives at the University of Illinois School of Law for scholarships to train Negro lawyers.

Hospital Told Threats Must Be Retracted

Trenton, N.J.—The Public Employment Commission of New Jersey ordered the Bergen Pines County Hospital to put a notice in pay envelopes advising employes that they may engage in union activity without fear of reprisals.

The order probably is the first of its kind in public employment, said Director Jack Merkel of New Jersey Council 1 of the State, County & Municipal Employes. The council filed a complaint charging that hospital management put an unlawful leaflet in pay packets saying it opposes hospital unions.

The message advised "any employe who is approached by . . . any labor group" to report the incident immediately.

A new notice, ordered by the state commission, says employes have the right to join or assist SCME "without fear of penalty."

Arbitration or Fact-Finding:

GE Unions Back Mayors' Proposal

ion members reported no immediate signs of progress.

The 14 unions in the strike that started Oct. 27 reported no change in GE's inflexible take-it-or-leave-it bargaining stance.

A union statement said "it should now be obvious to everyone . . . that despite GE's barrage of self-righteous newspaper advertisements, it is GE that is blocking a settlement on any but its own terms."

"GE does not want the facts to be known, for GE, as always, wants to be the sole judge of what the facts are."

At the CBC meeting, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, who is committee chairman, presented a second $1 million check to the committee members from the AFL-CIO GE Strike Relief Fund.

AFL-CIO Dir. of Organization William L. Kircher reported that the nationwide boycott of GE products, which his department is coordinating, is increasing in effectiveness.

Hundreds of merchants have agreed not to advertise GE products and others have removed them from display, he said. Nearly 500,000 bumper stickers and more than 600,000 lapel buttons have been distributed to union families in labor's "boycott and buck" drive, he reported.

Rallies have been held in nine more cities, and steering committees have been set up by most state labor bodies, Kircher said.

As mediation efforts went on, 1,100 workers struck a GE metallurgical plant in Warren, Mich., in six-below-zero weather. They are members of Carboloy Local 771 of the Auto Workers. Their contract expired Dec. 28.

Meanwhile unions representing half of the 104,000 Westinghouse Corp. workers pressed that firm in negotiations to show more willingness to make progress. Management has been meeting with negotiators for the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, but no realistic offers have been made, the unions said.

"We reminded them that our contracts have been extended on a day-to-day basis, subject to the right to strike if no real progress is made toward agreement," the IUE said. "Our people are getting restless."

Union members in Westinghouse plants are contributing two hours' pay a month to the AFL-CIO GE Strike Relief Fund.

Counts explained that his entrance into mediation of the GE dispute is a normal step taken when lower-level efforts are unsuccessful. The move, Counts said, was decided on before Javits proposed fact-finding.

IUE Pres. Paul Jennings said in a statement that while "full and binding arbitration of the issues, which we have proposed repeatedly, is a more desirable and effective course for settling this strike, we will be happy" to cooperate with the fact-finders.

He added: "With the strike now in its 11th week, the impact on workers, company and community, is most serious. While we desire to bring this conflict to a speedy conclusion, IUE is determined to continue the strike until a just settlement is reached. We stand ready to cooperate in any course that will bring this about."

7 Dailies Refuse GE Strikers' Ads

The Chicago Tribune changed its mind and carried the ad of unions on strike against General Electric, but seven other major dailies rejected it.

The Coordinating Bargaining Committee in the GE strike reports that the dailies are the Dallas Times-Herald, the Dallas Morning News, the Houston Chronicle. the Atlanta Constitution, the Baltimore Sun, the Pittsburgh Press and the New Orleans Times Picayune-Item.

The advertising agency seeking to place the ads for the unions said that in some cases advertising directors were overridden by higher executives and in at least one instance, the Atlanta Constitution, company attorneys claimed that carrying the ad would violate state law.

NEW YORK TEACHERS UNION Pres. Albert Shanker, right, presents a $40,000 check to Pres. Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers for the General Electric Strike Fund as Pres. Harry Van Arsdale of the New York City Central Labor Council (center) smiles his approval. The union local, said to be the nation's largest, previously contributed $10,000 toward its pledge of $1 per member in the AFL-CIO campaign of support for the 150,000 GE workers.

Transit Pact Covers 35,000 In New York

New York—City subway and bus unions reached a strike-averting contract agreement on New Year's Day and sent the terms to 35,000 union members for a secret-ballot vote.

Bargainers for the Transport Workers and the Transit Union recommended approval of new two-year contracts providing wage hikes of 8 percent this year and 10 percent more 18 months from now, plus other benefits valued by the two unions at an additional 6 percent.

The offers were made by the Metropolitan Transit Authority. which runs city subway and bus lines, and operators of five private bus lines in Manhattan and Queens. The proposals were made a few hours before a strike scheduled for 5 a.m. Jan. 1.

The strike call was canceled when the executive board of TWU Local 100 and representatives of two ATU locals voted their approval. Balloting on the offers may take about 10 days, the unions said.

The settlement was reached with the aid of three city mediators after the personal intervention of Mayor John V. Lindsay. The mayor proposed raises in bridge and tunnel tolls to help meet the cost of the new contracts but Authority members voted 5-1 to raise fares from 20 cents per ride to 30 cents, effective immediately.

The new pacts call for an 8 percent raise effective Jan. 1, 1970, and another 10 percent as of July 1, 1971, for authority employes. The authority agreed also to assume the employes' pension plan contributions, now 6.1 percent of wages, starting next July 1.

The authority's health and welfare fund contribution was raised from $300 a year to $400. Other gains include four weeks of vacation after three years of service effective next Jan. 1, improved sick pay, and a series of changes in working conditions.

TWU Pres. Matthew Guinan called the settlement a good one and recommended acceptance. It represents a long step toward wage parity between city transit employes and other municipal workers—a major union objective this year, he said.

Labor Board Orders Shop Stewards Rehired

The National Labor Relations Board ruled that United Aircraft Corp. grossly harassed 10 union stewards and drove them out of its Connecticut plants by the use of "false, biased, minimal or distorted" evidence.

In two separate decisions based on illegal firings in 1967, 1968 and 1969, the board ordered the big government contractor to reinstate nine members of the Machinists with backpay, to make a 10th steward whole for three days' lost pay, and to stop questioning employes coercively, threatening them with reprisals for being active in the union, or firing them in violation of their legal rights.

The decisions are the latest in a long series of NLRB and court actions based on IAM charges that the company violated a 1960 strike-settlement agreement.

One decision involved the firings or suspension of seven IAM stewards at the company's Pratt & Whitney engine plants in East Hartford, Manchester, Middleton and Southington, Conn., and its Hamilton Standard plants at Windsor Locks and Broad Brook, Conn. The other case concerned unfair treatment of stewards at the UAC plants in Middletown, East Hartford and Manchester.

In each case, management accused the stewards of doing union business on work-time. They denied it and were fired anyway after intensive grilling.

The board, upholding Trial Examiners Paul E. Weil and Ivar H. Peterson, ruled that company investigations were "actually conducted for the purpose of harassing the stewards, making them realize that their union activities were being watched closely, and to garner enough evidence to support subsequent discharges."

The board found that, although four stewards were "allegedly disciplined for conducting union business on company time for periods from three seconds to a few minutes," management "conducted widespread investigations lasting as long as two weeks, even though the evidence obtained was false" or distorted, in "an attempt to support its disciplinary actions against the stewards."

The NLRB reported that company investigators "behaved toward the employes being interviewed in an overbearing and intimidating manner, infringing on their rights by coercive interrogation."

The company's "demonstrated hostility toward unionism and proclivity towards violating the act" was noted by the board, which said that, because of UAC's unlawful conduct, whether or not the stewards actually engaged in union activity during work-time, "this was merely a pretext to conceal" the company's illegal motive in disciplining them.

Similar motivation was found by the NLRB in all 10 cases. It ordered the fired union members restored to their former jobs, or ones substantially equivalent, with all their pay for the time lost.

Harvard Accepts Pact To Upgrade 'Helpers'

Cambridge, Mass.—Pres. S. Frank Raftery of the Painters converted an invitation to speak at Harvard University into an agreement that will provide apprentice training and better pay for campus maintenance workers.

Raftery described the new pact after delivering the keynote speech at the 46th commencement of the Harvard Trade Union Program, a 13-week course in labor leadership attended by representatives of unions from many countries.

The new contract requires that the university substitute the term "apprentice" for "helper" in classifying the workers who assist skilled tradesmen from five crafts in doing maintenance work on the campus.

"Now," Raftery explained, "the present helpers will get formal apprentice training and they'll get regular increments [increases in wages] as they progress toward journeyman status."

The pact, he said, also provides increases in apprentice rates along with a 92-cents-an-hour wage increase for some 300 skilled journeymen over the next two years.

In his address, Raftery described organized labor in the United States as "the largest, most unified force for progress on the American scene" and the "most integrated of all mass institutions in our society."

More than 2 million Negroes are members of unions and "moving into leadership positions in their organizations in increasing numbers," he pointed out.

Raftery cited these figures to refute Administration "abuse" of building trades unions on the question of integration: a 15.7 percent increase in total registered apprentices between 1967 and 1969 and a 120 percent increase in Negro apprentices in that period.

In comparison to the job that labor is doing in bringing Negroes into its ranks, Raftery noted, "there is not a single black face to be seen on the boards of directors of 500 of the largest corporations in this country."

Court Urged to Uphold Dues Checkoff Order

power to order acceptance of that clause.

The court record showed that the company refused to bargain with the union for two years after the USWA won an election and was certified as the lawful bargaining agent Oct. 5, 1961. A trial examiner, the NLRB and a U.S. Court of Appeals found management guilty of refusal to bargain, and it finally came to the bargaining table after years of battling.

Another examiner ruled in 1965 that Porter did not bargain in good faith on the dues deduction clause, and recommended that it be ordered to do so. The board upheld that ruling also, and the Court of Appeals again enforced it.

Management and union eventually reached agreement on all contract terms but those of the dues clause, which the union said was vital because the Danville plant is 80 miles from the nearest union office at Roanoke, Va. The union continued its fight for the right to such a clause, and again was upheld by the board and the appeals court, which at this point ordered the firm to grant the checkoff clause.

An order requiring company acceptance of the dues checkoff clause, the federation brief points out, is "plainly necessary to carry out the remedial purposes" of the labor act. It said "this is not a case in which an employer had a number of reasons for refusing a checkoff proposal," some lawful and others not lawful.

"In this case . . . the company has placed itself in a situation where only acceptance of the checkoff clause could 'purge the stain of bad faith that has already soiled its position'" because the "only reason for opposition [to the checkoff] was to frustrate agreement with the union."

The Danville plant manager admitted, the record showed, that he had no business reason for refusing a dues deduction plan, but did so because he did not want to help the union collect dues. The union, he testified, could use its "economic strength" to win a checkoff if it wished. Unions in other company plants already have such a clause because they are strong enough to get it, he said.

The Election Stakes

THE BATTLE CRY for the Senate in 1970 could easily be "hold that line."

The statistics show the necessity. Present balance in the Senate is 57 Democrats, 43 Republicans. There are 35 seats up for grabs. Twenty-five belong to Democrats, only 10 to Republicans.

Of the 25 Democrats, 21 have been down-the-line progressives on domestic programs.

Republicans have to pick up only seven seats to grab control of the Senate. They are working on a target list of a baker's dozen Democrats they feel are vulnerable.

Ten of these Democratic seats are marginal on grounds of a winning margin of 55 percent or less last time around, or for reasons of special political problems that have cropped up in recent years, or both. The marginals, including the seat being vacated by Sen. Stephen Young of Ohio, are:

Vance Hartke, Ind., 1964 winning percentage 54.3 percent; Howard Cannon, Nev., 50; Joseph Montoya, N.M., 54.7; Quentin Burdick, N.D., 57.6; Young, Ohio, 50.2; Albert Gore, Tenn., 53.6; Ralph Yarborough, Texas, 56.2; Frank Moss, Utah, 57.3; William Proxmire, Wisc., 53.3; Gale McGee, Wyo., 54.

Among them, these 10 have a combined COPE voting record as of the end of 1968 of 497 "right" votes, only 63 "wrong" votes.

IN ADDITION to the 10 marginal seats, Republicans are gunning for Michigan Sen. Philip Hart (Housing Sec. George Romney, former Michigan governor, has been mentioned as a possible candidate); Joseph Tydings of Maryland and Harrison Williams of New Jersey—three of the Senate's key liberal leaders.

Of the 10 GOP Senate seats, seven are marginal, including that of Sen. Hugh Scott, Pa., who succeeded the late Everett Dirksen as Minority Leader. Scott nipped into office in 1964 with only 50.9 percent of the vote.

Other GOP marginal seats include Illinois, where Dirksen's appointed successor, Ralph Smith, must defend the seat Dirksen himself won with only 53 percent of the vote in 1968; Delaware, where retiring Sen. John J. Williams won six years ago with 51.7 percent; Arizona, where labor-baiting Paul Fannin just made it with 51.4. The list is rounded out by Sen. George Murphy, Calif., 51.5; Sen. Hiram Fong, Hawaii, 53; Sen. Winston Prouty, Vt., 53.5. Murphy and Fannin are among the most conservative members of the Senate.

THE BATTLE for control of the U.S. House of Representatives will be fought in some 80 marginal districts, held approximately 2-1 by Democrats, mostly liberals. It is in these that conservatives hope to make the gains that will put the House in their hands.

All but a handful of the marginal seats occur in major industrial states. Twelve are in New York, 10 held by Democrats, two by Republicans. Six are in Indiana, with a 3-3 split. There are four in California and Missouri, all Democrats; three each in Colorado, Illinois and New Jersey, again all Democrats.

The challenge in the House will be to retain the marginal seats held by liberals and perhaps to pick up some held by conservatives. The present House is on a tight-rope, as the recent 206-203 rollcall that gutted the 1965 Voting Rights Act shows.

A Word Edgewise:

Resolution for 1970 — Revival Of Civility in Political Manners

By John P. Roche

AS THE NEW YEAR overtakes us I have been meditating on the subject of resolutions. What should we do differently in 1970? Putting aside personal vows of penance and reform, let us look at our public life and see how we should change. Top priority, I think, should go to a revival of that old-fashioned virtue: civility. We need to improve our political manners.

This brings cynical laughs from radicals who think that civility is a bourgeois bag and good manners a mask for insincerity. They have a minor point, but fail to realize that if we lived in a universe of complete, unflinching honesty, we should probably all go nuts in a week. Civility, to put it differently, has closer links with compassion than with intellectual or moral dishonesty.

Indeed, what has impressed me about the militants—young, middle-aged, and old; black, brown, and pink—is that they are in search of "meaningful personal relationships," of "love" and "community," but consistently treat their opponents as things. What they consider honesty comes out as savage dehumanization. The police are "pigs."

The worst part of this is that it generates an equivalent response. If Panthers decide to kill cops, cops will set out to kill Panthers—the minute one dehumanizes conflict, the law of the jungle takes over. The rhetoric of violence creates a polarization that defies compassion and understanding—people are, in the old gangster movie formula, "rubbed out."

All human beings respond similarly. I have been teaching for over 20 years and have had some wild and remarkable students, but it still gets to me when someone treats me as a thing. Recently, for example, a young man told me I was just a "tool of the war machine."

I have been called a lot worse—and by experts—but I was disturbed. Not by the content of his message, but by my own reaction to it. I became cold, sardonic, mechanical—and then suddenly realized that this youngster was turning me from a teacher to a polemicist, in my book an unforgiveable pedagogical sin.

Those who follow this column know that I enjoy vigorous argument and that I have strong views on a number of subjects. If I didn't believe I was right, I wouldn't hold the views I do. But I do try to treat my opponents as human beings, not as ideological puppets. Where I have failed, I apologize—to dehumanize is the ultimate sin against moral dignity.

RADICAL STUDENTS are perpetually startled to learn that Herbert Marcuse and I spent 10 years in a peaceful collegial relationship at Brandeis. We disagreed on everything except the virtues of civility. In 1956 when Marcuse supported the Soviet suppression of the Hungarian Revolution, I was urging intervention (by the UN, not the Strategic Air Command—the UN still had some clout left over from Korea).

This led to a remarkable confrontation. Two of my anti-Communist radical colleagues came to my office with a simple program: "Marcuse must be destroyed." I suggested that they had lost the full flavor of the Moscow Trials ("Mad-dog Marcuse must be destroyed" would have been the appropriate form), that I was a college professor, not a secret policeman—and threw them out. They, of course, denounced me for lack of convictions.

John Dos Passos wrote somewhere—I think about the Spanish—that "good manners among people who believe in man's dignity are a matter of life and death." The democratic system of government has as its fundamental value precisely this belief in human dignity. Let us give it meaning in our political life.

Cellophane-Wrapped Organisms:

Food Poisoning Threats Persist Even With 'Clean' Packaging

By Sidney Margolius

JUST BECAUSE FOOD comes in a clean-looking package or cellophane wrapping, you can't take for granted it is really "clean." The widespread occurrence of salmonella infection, a form of food poisoning, has been traced at least in part to the increasing use of so-called "convenience" foods requiring little or no heating at home.

Ironically, one of the justifications claimed by the food industry and Agriculture Dept. propagandists for processed foods with their extra cost, is their "cleanliness" in contrast to the mythical "open cracker barrel" of old-time grocery stores.

But it turns out, cellophane can hide a multitude of organisms. You know whether or not your hands and kitchen are clean when you prepare food. You don't know the sanitary conditions in the food factory.

The facts are that over 2 million people get sick each year from contaminated food, and the chief culprit is the salmonella organism. Food poisoning is second only to colds as the most frequent cause of illness, government authorities say.

In many cases of healthy adults, salmonella produces only a 24-hour diarrhea. In the past and even now, relatively few cases have been diagnosed as salmonella, largely because public health authorities did not realize until the last several years the full extent of this form of contamination. But in infants and elderly people salmonella infection can be serious and even dangerous.

A few years ago, Dr. Ernest Ager of the Washington State Health Dept. called the salmonella problem "a national disgrace." Now that the extent of the problem is realized, the Food & Drug Administration and the U.S. Public Health Service are trying, rather desperately and anxiously with their limited funds and personnel, to control it. In 1969 FDA inaugurated a national center for microbiological analysis of food products.

In some cases industry has cooperated in the government's campaign. But in some cases such as that of suppliers of animal byproducts used in animal feed (which can start the chain of contamination) industry apparently has been disinterested.

In the past several years there have had to be recalls of widely-sold packaged products including dried milk, and products such as commercially-sold custard pies and chocolate candy. Dried milk and dried, liquid or frozen eggs used widely by commercial bakers and other food factories often are implicated in outbreaks of salmonella.

One of the reasons for the increased concern is that food no longer is sold mostly locally. Factories nowadays ship food products all over the country, with the resultant possibility of nation wide outbreaks of food poisoning.

Another problem is that once the salmonella organism gets into food-manufacturing machinery it is hard to eradicate.

Frozen prepared foods, the so-called "heat-and-serve" items are especially susceptible to microbiological contamination, reports Charles C. Johnson, Jr., a Public Health Service administrator. Furthermore, Johnson says, "We are actually doing very little in the way of standards" to assure their safety.

One of the difficulties is that ready-to-eat foods are not usually subject to high cooking heats before they are served at home. They may be merely warmed a little or even not at all. High heat does help control harmful bacteria.

There also are growing problems associated with the new infant food formulations, many of them using dried milk.

SALMONELLA INFECTION could be greatly reduced if the safety of frozen eggs, widely used commercially, could be assured, Johnson says. New York City, for example, now requires thorough pasteurization by local processors of such "broken out" eggs.

But such local control is not enough in an era when processed foods are shipped all over the country. A bill to require nation-wide regulation of egg products has been introduced in Congress.

Only eight states presently require pasteurization of egg products—Colorado, California, Georgia, Minnesota, Oregon, South Dakota, Utah and Wisconsin.

Passage of this bill, together with intensified efforts by FDA which already have helped control salmonella contamination of dried milk, would be a vital first step.

But while government intervention to require high sanitation standards in food and feed factories is of first importance, care also is needed in the home. Especially be careful with poultry.

The Agriculture Dept. advises serving food soon after cooking. If not, refrigerate promptly. You really don't have to wait for cooked foods to cool off completely before refrigerating. Food may not be safe to eat if held for more than three or four hours at room temperature, including preparation and serving.

In addition to general kitchen sanitation and personal hygiene, the department also advises keeping hot foods hot (above 140 degrees) and cold foods cold (below 40 degrees).

The Consumers' Association of Canada, which also has investigated the salmonella problem, warns that it is important to clean up right away after preparing poultry. Chopping boards and knives must be scrupulously cleaned before using for other foods. Packages and wrappings which have contained uncooked poultry should be rolled up in a newspaper before being put in the garbage can.

Lot of Razzle-Dazzle:

Nixon's Score on Civil Rights Shows 'Pretty Bad' First Year

THE ADMINISTRATION has turned in a "pretty bad" first-year record in behalf of minority group Americans, with more show than substance, the AFL-CIO director of civil rights declared.

Donald Slaiman said that unless the momentum of earlier administrations is again developed, "we will see a lot of razzle-dazzle, but a slowdown in minority progress." He made the statements on the AFL-CIO produced public service radio interview, Labor News Conference.

Even the "substantial amount of progress" in earlier administrations "wasn't enough," Slaiman said, despite the implementation of "excellent legislation" that helped stem unemployment and stimulate school desegregation, manpower and poverty programs.

He said that "significant gaps" in unfulfilled minority expectations existed when Pres. Nixon took office, but instead of pressing ahead, the Administration slowed "what was being done—on school desegregation—on voting—on training—on eliminating poverty—and on maintaining the kind of high-level employment situation that would produce more [job] opportunities for minorities."

Slaiman said the Administration's Philadelphia plan "is of questionable legality, of little practical value," and, "given the nature of the construction industry," will do little to "bring Negroes into permanent jobs." He stressed that the building trades unions had already gone forward with affirmative programs to recruit, train and place minority workers in permanent jobs.

He said the union-sponsored Apprenticeship Outreach programs have placed more than 5,300 minority youngsters in registered apprenticeships, many of them in such highly-skilled crafts as "electricians, the pipe trades, iron workers, sheet metal workers and carpenters."

SLAIMAN CHARGED that the Philadelphia plan is "a political gambit . . . a calculated attempt to confuse the public . . . about doing something on the job front to cover up a retreat in civil rights." He said he doubts that the "minority community really buys the idea that with this effort, the Administration is really doing something for minorities."

WHEN HERBERT HOOVER was President back in the late Twenties, it was a settled Republican conviction that if nature were left to its own devices, the economic problems of the country would be solved automatically. It didn't work out that way. The country suffered its greatest depression in its history and Hoover became a one-term President.

When Dwight Eisenhower was President, he too placed his trust in private enterprise and the bankers. Three recessions resulted. The country had the support of New Deal built-in stabilizers, and was too strong economically to suffer unduly except for the considerable numbers of workers who lost their jobs.

It has become clear that no administration can afford to let nature take its course without seeming to guide the economy in one way or another.

Nevertheless, there is a powerful, lingering Republican hangover to turn to private enterprise and depend upon it to solve the country's problems. Manpower training and the provision of jobs to meet the country's employment needs are examples of this urge under the present Administration.

Yet, many manpower experts, notably in the labor field, are by no means convinced that this reliance on business to do the job is completely justified.

Here are a number of their observations:

1. The number of hard-core unemployed who actually are being trained or upgraded in their skills as well as placed in jobs is open to question. It is impossible for neutral observers to get into most plants and observe what is actually going on.

2. Employers are now being paid and paid well to train workers—a job that at one time they had to do on their own. In too many cases, experts say, the level of skills is low, the time required for training too long and the pay levels are low.

Except in highly organized industries where union cooperation is involved, pay levels of the minimum $1.60 an hour or only slightly higher are common.

That businessmen like to be paid for what they normally would do on their own, is indicated by a movement among some business groups to get tax incentives for employment and training programs.

3. Again, the role of organized labor in training unskilled workers has been underplayed. There are now 12 to 15 national-on-the-job training contracts that cover up to 25,000 workers that are being carried on by unions.

4. How well business is carrying out its part in the manpower program is open to serious doubt.

Some months ago, the Washington Post published a study disputing the success of the Labor Dept. hard-core jobs drive being carried on by JOBS—Job Opportunities in the Business Sector—based on an internal study within the Labor Dept. itself.

The study cited lags in several cities, failure to meet the training and job targets of their federal reimbursement contracts.

More recently, the Los Angeles Times published a story the opening paragraph of which said:

"Federal programs designed to create 'instant jobs' for the hard-core unemployed have provided private companies with huge sums of taxpayers' money but have produced very few jobs."

The article charged that nine companies in the Los Angeles area had received $5 million from the Labor Dept. to train 3,426 workers but had so failed to deliver the goods that only 199 jobs had been provided, some of them paying as little as $70 a week.

The accuracy of these charges has never been disputed, although shortly thereafter, the Labor Dept. conceded that it was dissatisfied with the results of projects it has funded and was notifying contractors that "appropriate legal and administrative actions will be taken to enforce full and complete performance."

The Labor Dept. may be placing too much emphasis in the ability of private business, to do the training job that is needed in the United States. The facts indicate that federal responsibility is still paramount.

WITH MORE SHOW than substance, the Administration rounds out its first year with a "pretty bad" civil rights record, AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman, center, told William Eaton, left, of the Chicago Daily News and Frank Swoboda of Business Week magazine, on Labor News Conference. The interview is broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m. on the Mutual radio network.

Independent Agency Urged for Consumers

Establishment of a strong, independent consumers' agency was urged by the AFL-CIO in testimony before a House subcommittee on government operations shortly before Congress adjourned.

Federation Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said that labor favored an agency outside the White House because it would be freer of political pressures and less dependent on any incumbent President.

He said the Administration's split-level proposal for an Office of Consumer Affairs in tandem with a Consumer Protective Division in the Justice Dept. was a step in the right direction. But the effort "falls short of a satisfactory solution."

"If the Administration bill were enacted," Biemiller said, "the Office of Consumer Affairs would be trying to represent consumer viewpoints not directly to agencies and the courts, but to the Dept. of Justice—which in turn could accept or reject the views of the office."

This would give the Justice Dept. veto power over the consumer office, he observed.

Citing other weaknesses in the Administration bill, Biemiller urged the subcommittee to reject the proposal. The basic problem, however, is the structure for consumer representation in the Nixon proposal, he noted.

Labor supports the amendment proposed by Rep. Benjamin S. Rosenthal (D-N.Y.) which calls for the independent consumer agency.

Even a substitute bill offered by Rep. Florence P. Dwyer (R-N.J.) and Rep. Leonor K. Sullivan (D-Mo.), which would set up a unified office of consumer affairs in the White House, is preferred by labor over the Administration's plan, Biemiller said.

But of the two alternatives "we believe a strong independent agency, operating outside the White House, would be a better solution," he said.

"An independent agency would be under less pressure to accept an 'overall' Administration viewpoint which compresses the consumer view into an amalgam that reflects other agency interests as much as, or even more than, the consumer interest," he asserted.

"The principal loss of placing the agency outside the White House," Biemiller observed, "would appear to be less visibility and a less advantageous vantage point for coordinating the various government consumer programs."

"But there are distinct and overbalancing gains in setting up the agency on a completely independent basis," Biemiller stressed.

He cited the key factors as more freedom from political pressures exerted on the White House and the President and the ability of the independent agency to criticize and evaluate other government agencies.

Oakland Area Crafts Renew Training Pact

Five AFL-CIO county building trades councils in the Oakland, Calif., area were awarded a new $250,888 contract to prepare 200 minority youths for apprenticeship training.

Trades councils from the counties of Alameda, Contra Costa, Marin, Santa Clara and San Mateo will participate in the Apprenticeship Outreach program.

In its previous Labor Dept. contract the Bay Area Construction Opportunity Program, which the five councils operate, exceeded its goal of readying 200 youths by placing 302 as apprentices in the trades.

They included 154 carpenters, 11 cement masons, 17 electricians, 5 iron workers, 5 operating engineers, 22 painters, 12 in the pipe trades, 10 plasterers, 2 roofers, 14 sheetmetal workers, 4 tile setters and 46 in miscellaneous trades.

The Labor Dept. also awarded its first Outreach contract in Alaska. A $52,199 grant will go to the Anchorage Building & Construction Trades to train 30 disadvantaged youths for apprenticeships.

Gill Named to Head Federal Labor Unit

W. V. Gill, a career Civil Service Commission official, has been named executive director of the new Federal Labor Relations Council.

The council, set up under Pres. Nixon's executive order on labor-management relations in the federal service, is the policy and appellate body in the government's labor relations program.

The chairman of the Civil Service Commission, Robert E. Hampton, heads the council and Labor Sec. George P. Shultz and Budget Dir. Robert E. Mayo are members.

Seeks Employer Contributions:

'Right-to-Work' Group Asks New Restrictions on Unions

The Fannin measure, backed by costly full-page newspaper advertisements paid for by the National Right to Work Committee, would have removed a union's tax exempt status if it endorsed or opposed a candidate or carried on voter registration drives.

The successful floor fight against the move was led by Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.), who pointed out that the committee and business organizations have the same type of tax exempt status as unions.

He emphasized that federal law already bars unions and corporations from contributing to candidates and parties from their treasuries, but that voluntary contributions to COPE are legal as are certain voluntary techniques used by businesses.

In his pitch for funds from businessmen to fight the union shop Gurney noted that "your personal contribution is fully tax-deductible—and your company or foundation can make a tax-deductible contribution as well."

Gurney identified the "test case" being advanced by the "right to workers" as one involving 40 Detroit teachers "who have refused to buckle under to AFL-CIO demands that they pay money to the union or lose their jobs."

He said that a suit would be enlarged by the foundation's lawyers into "a national test case to challenge the constitutionality of the unions spending compulsory dues for politics."

"That's what this law suit is all about," he claimed, "the right of an individual to contribute or not to contribute to any party or any candidate, no matter what the union prefers."

The case referred to by Gurney is one involving a group of Detroit teachers who have challenged a contract negotiated by Teachers Local 231 covering some 11,000 teachers in the city's public schools.

The complaining teachers, mostly members of the Detroit Education Association which was previously expelled from the Michigan Education Association, object to an agency shop clause, effective Feb. 1, 1970. It will require them to pay a service fee to the local equal to the amount of dues if they choose not to join the union.

The case is to be heard by the Wayne County (Mich.) Circuit Court on Jan. 12. The same court already has upheld the legality of a similar agency shop clause maintained by the MEA in several contracts it has. Another court has upheld the agency shop clause of State, County & Municipal Employes in Michigan.

A representative of Local 231 said the challenge of the dissident teachers originally involved the constitutionality of the agency shop and had nothing to do with political spending.

Gurney said the goal of the foundation is to get the U.S. Supreme Court to revise a 1961 ruling—Machinists v. Street—"into a firm decision to stop unions from using compulsory dues for politics."

In that case, involving the union shop clause on railroads, the court upheld enforcement of the union shop even though it decided that workers might avoid having their dues used for political activities with which they disagree.

The court made no effort to define "political spending."

The court suggested several methods by which union members might notify their unions of objections to specific expenditures. A union attorney involved in the case said the decision never resulted in "any such objections that I know of."

Meanwhile, the newsletter of the National Right to Work Committee indicated that its next major push in state legislatures will be for the enactment of "Little Fannin Amendments."

It said it is drafting a model bill for states aimed at denying the union shop to all unions "which use any part of their dues, fees or assessments for political purposes."

Rejection of R-T-W Aids New Mexico

Albuquerque, N.M.—This city is getting a big new industry, and New Mexico's repeated rejection of union-busting "right-to-work" laws is one of the factors that helped bring it about.

The Albuquerque Tribune recently front-paged the announcement that the Lenkurt Division of General Telephone & Electronics will build a manufacturing plant here expected to employ 2,000 workers by 1975.

It quoted the firm's president, C.W. Hunter, as praising the qualities of New Mexico and its people which led to the decision to locate there.

One of the reasons he cited, the newspaper reported, was "the lack of right-to-work laws" in the state.

Los Angeles Teachers To Vote on Merger Plan

Los Angeles—Two organizations of public school teachers here agreed to combine, subject to membership approval, to give teachers a stronger voice in dealing with the school board and superintendents.

Executive board members of AFL-CIO Teachers Local 1021 and the Association of Classroom Teachers—an affiliate of the National Education Association—approved merger terms and called for a poll of members the week of Jan. 19. If a majority of each group approves, the formerly separate units will become the United Teachers of Los Angeles effective Feb. 1.

The presidents of both the American Federation of Teachers and the NEA voiced no objection. AFT Pres. David Selden called the merger "a promising experiment in teacher unity." NEA Pres. George D. Fischer said the merger "demonstrates that the goals teachers share" on behalf of pupils "are far more important than the partisan organizational interests that divide us."

Fischer added "there can be no doubt that one day soon all teachers in America will have one organizational voice."

Selden asked more than a year ago for talks looking toward merger, or at least closer cooperation, between AFT and NEA. The latter organization brushed off Selden's approach before Fischer took office.

On the Los Angeles development, Selden said the AFT has "offered its complete support to the United Teachers of Los Angeles" because through such action "teaching can be made attractive once more, class size can be reduced, classroom hours cut." Teacher status can be improved, salary and fringe benefits can be made comparable to those of other professions, he said.

The 19,200-member ACT and the 3,000-member AFT local represent more than 80 percent of the 25,000 teachers in the Los Angeles school system, the nation's second largest. Neither organization has a contract now, and state law merely requires school boards to "meet and confer" with employe groups.

The two organizations staged the city's first school strike for two days last September and have a tentative pledge from the school board to consider a written proposal in the spring.

The merger plan provides an interim governing arrangement until officers and board members are elected next November. ACT Pres. Robert R. Ransom will be acting president of the United Teachers. Local 1021 Pres. Larry Sibelman will be executive vice president, with ACT's Donald R. Baer as executive director.

Dues will be 1.5 percent of the beginning salary for teachers, now $7,230 a year, or about $108. The United Teachers will be affiliated with both NEA and AFT state and national bodies. Individual members can join either the NEA or AFT state units.

The merger is the second of its kind in the nation. The first was last fall in Flint, Mich., with a combined membership of 1,770 union and non-union teachers. Merger terms have been discussed in other areas also.

Labor Urges End to Fees On Medicare

program was set up in 1966 and was raised to $4 in 1968.

"The latest, nearly one-third jump in the elderly person's payment," Seidman said in a statement, "is due largely to the continued, unconscionable sky-rocketing of doctors' bills."

What Congress must do, he declared, is to enact legislation to combine Medicare's hospital care and medical insurance programs "to permit the entire financing of medical care before retirement."

He noted that this is one of the major reforms in a bill introduced in the last session by Rep. Jacob H. Gilbert (D-N.Y.) which organized labor and senior citizens are backing.

Until Congress adopts the reform, he added, "it should freeze Medicare's medical insurance payments at their present $4 level."

Deploring the announced increase in the medical insurance fee, Seidman pointed out that it cancels out part of the 15 percent boost in social security benefits enacted as part of the new tax law.

The extent of the cancelling out, he noted, is demonstrated by the fact that "for couples getting the minimum social security benefit, the eat up more than one month's benenew medical insurance charge will fit check each year."

In Supreme Court Brief:

Labor Asks Reversal Of Picketing Curbs

The AFL-CIO has asked the Supreme Court to reaffirm the right of a union to picket in front of a store, even if the sidewalk is privately owned.

A 1968 Supreme Court decision upheld this right in a similar situation and labor attorneys consider the present case even stronger.

But the case, stemming from a Retail Clerks strike in Mobile, Ala., is being followed with special interest because of the changes in the Supreme Court during the past year. Two of the four justices who made up the 6-3 majority in the earlier case are no longer on the Supreme Court—Earl Warren and Abe Fortas. With one vacancy, the vote of the new chief justice, Warren E. Burger, could be decisive.

The case has taken five years to work its way up to the Supreme Court. It started when Retail Clerks Local 458 in Mobile was forced to strike for an initial contract after winning bargaining rights in a National Labor Relations Board election at the Weinacker's general store.

A big parking area separated the public streets from the entrance to the store and when pickets used the walkway adjacent to the store, the employer obtained an injunction prohibiting "trespassing" on the property.

The injunction was appealed, but it was not until the fall of 1968 that the Alabama Supreme Court handed down its ruling that the injunction was valid.

Asking the Supreme Court to overturn the Alabama court's ruling, the AFL-CIO said the injunction was "incompatible" with the U.S. Supreme Court's 1968 decision in Amalgamated Food Employes v. Logan Valley Plaza.

That landmark case upheld peaceful, informational picketing of a non-union store in a privately-owned shopping center. The majority opinion, written by Justice Thurgood Marshall, said the constitutional right of free speech was involved.

Any other decision, Marshall wrote, would mean that businesses situated in the suburbs could "largely immunize themselves" from picketing "by creating a cordon sanitaire of parking lots around their stores."

In the Alabama case, the NLRB has also filed a "friend of the court" brief supporting the union position. The labor board argued that the state courts had no right to bar picketing in the Alabama strike situation because the field is pre-empted by federal labor law.

The AFL-CIO brief stressed that any attempt to distinguish the Alabama case from the earlier decision on the grounds of a distinction between a multi-store shopping center and a single store surrounded by a parking lot is "unsound."

If the court were to split 4-4 on the issue, the effect would be to leave standing the decision of the Alabama court since it takes a plurality to override a lower court decision.

PRINTING PRESSMEN in Baltimore do their best to keep warm as they picket the city's daily newspapers after negotiations for a new contract broke down. Members of the other newspaper unions refused to cross the Pressmen's picket line and publication was suspended at the Sunpapers and the Hearst News-American.

Pressmen Get Strike Support In Baltimore

Baltimore—A strike by the Baltimore newspaper Pressmen against this city's major daily newspapers has been pledged the full support of other AFL-CIO unions here.

Pres. Dominic Fornaro of the Baltimore AFL-CIO said at a news conference that the central labor body's 180 affiliates would show their support with pickets and money.

The Pressmen's union on Jan. 2 voted 221-5 to strike the newspapers. The following day, publication was suspended by the Sunpapers for its morning, afternoon and Sunday newspapers, and by the News - American, a Hearst - chain afternoon and Sunday newspaper.

The Pressmen's contract expired New Year's Eve, and 276 of the union's members were directly affected by the negotiations. Two days later, representatives of the union and the publishers broke off talks after meeting only three minutes.

Both sides got together again briefly at the request of a federal mediator, but the negotiations reached an impasse and were discontinued. The Pressmen's union said it is seeking wages comparable to those paid at Washington's major daily newspapers, where a two-year contract went into effect last October.

Editorial and commercial department employes at the Sunpapers, who belong to the Washington-Baltimore Newspaper Guild, voted overwhelmingly to honor the Pressmen's picket lines.

The contracts of the Typographical Union and the unaffiliated Mailers at the two newspaper companies also expired Dec. 31. Spokesmen for the two craft unions said most of their members declined "on an individual basis" to cross the picket lines.

Full-Crew Needs Cited As 2 Jets Avoid Crash

A near midair collision between United Air Lines and Seaboard World aircraft proves the "absolute need" for three-pilot crews on short-range B-737 jets, the Air Line Pilots told the National Transportation Safety Board.

A crash of the planes, together carrying 59 passengers, was avoided, ALPA said, only because the third member of the United B-737 cockpit crew—L. P. Maher—saw the oncoming Seaboard DC-8.

The union, which is engaged in a campaign to make certain that there is a three-man crew aboard the 737s, submitted details to the board during recent hearings on the problem of midair collisions.

Ironically, the near collision over Tannersville, Pa., occurred the day after the hearings opened.

An ALPA report pointed out that Maher saw the DC-8 through murky clouds crossing the path of the 737 on a "direct collision course." He hit the shoulder of Capt. R. A. Lemmon, at the controls. Lemmon pulled his plane over the Seaboard flight "by an estimated 20 to 50 feet."

In his statement, Lemmon said he was sure his plane would have struck the other aircraft, except for Maher's observance. He said he could clearly see the letters "EA" of the word "SEABOARD" on the other plane's cockpit window.

Other statements by the 737 crew indicated the plane "buffeted badly." There were no injuries to passengers but two stewardesses were slightly injured.

Seaboard Capt. Joseph C. Szaflarski said he could clearly identify the United plane, then it disappeared. Both he and his copilot felt for an instant that their plane would be struck, Szaflarski said.

The union emphasized that "the third member on the B-737 was not on board this airplane by federal regulation or requirement, but was only there as the result of a demand for his presence by ALPA."

Last February, a Special Review Board established by the government at ALPA's insistence, ruled that the B-737 should have a three-member cockpit crew. But its decision was temporary. The issue is to come up again early in 1970.

Meanwhile, the Air Transport Association, speaking for managements, still contends the three-man crew on B-737s is not needed for safety. Some Federal Aviation Administration officials have sided with management.

"There are 59 people who would probably dispute that position and who owe their lives to the courage of the Special Review Board and the alertness and presence of third crew member Maher," ALPA concluded.

Sylvester Graham, Ex-Staffer, Dies

Butte, Mont.—Services were held here for Sylvester Graham, a veteran field representative of the AFL-CIO, who died Dec. 25. Graham, 70, was stricken with leukemia.

He had served for 22 years with the AFL-CIO and the former CIO before his retirement in 1964. Graham had been an organizer for the Mine, Mill & Smelters Union in 1936 and served for five years as president of the Montana CIO.

Graham also had been a regional director for the CIO in Montana and Wyoming in the early 1950s.

Shultz Urges Easing Of Reins on Money

Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz became the first Cabinet-level member of the Administration to call upon the Federal Reserve Board to relax its tight money policies.

Shultz told reporters at a news conference that the board's policies were "too tight"—that while the economy needs restraint, it doesn't need a "stranglehold."

But the secretary's remarks were quickly disowned by an unnamed Treasury Dept. official who told the Washington Post that Shultz did not express the Administration view.

Shultz indicated that he favored restrictive monetary policy as a weapon against inflation, but that the policy should not be as "drastic" as it has become.

Noting that the nation's money supply has not shown any growth for a number of months, Shultz warned that the board's extreme policies threaten "to accelerate the signs of a slowing economy."

"We don't want the economy to go into a tailspin," he added.

The stringent policies of the board, Shultz contended, are in conflict with Administration fiscal policies. These policies, he said, are beginning to produce results in the form of a leveling off in price increases.

In answering questions, Shultz refused to use the term "recession" and declined to endorse an opinion of Milton Friedman, a University of Chicago economist, that Fed policy already has created the climate for an economic slump.

When asked if his views were in conflict with the Administration viewpoint on monetary policy, Shultz suggested that the reporters talk to other officials.

The Treasury Dept. official sought out by the Post expressed the view that "with prices so high and inflationary pressures so strong, talking about easing money just feeds inflationary expectations."

"The President is breaking his back to produce a credibly balanced budget," he said. "If we can get strong fiscal policy then it follows we can think of easier money. But not until then."

Abe Savage Dies, Publicist for AFM

New York—A. L. Savage, longtime public relations director for the Musicians and AFM Local 802, died at sea while en route from Tokyo to San Francisco.

Savage had retired from active service with the AFM in 1968 and was returning from an extended visit to Japan when he was stricken. He was 64.

Savage was appointed public relations director of the union in 1967 after serving in that capacity for Local 802 in New York City for 15 years.

Pres. Herman D. Kenin of the Musicians said of "Abe" Savage that the union had lost "a conscientious associate and a devoted supporter of organized labor."

Textile Union Charges 'Brown Lung' Cover-Up

The American Textile Manufacturers Institute is planning a massive cover-up of the "brown lung" problem that confronts hundreds of thousands of workers in the cotton textile industry, it was charged by Pres. William Pollock of the Textile Workers.

Pollock said the institute's employment of the Industrial Hygiene Foundation, Inc. of Pittsburgh to "study" the problem of byssinosis "is a clear signal that the industry is engaged in a frantic effort to conceal the fact that 'brown lung' has already taken years of useful life away from many thousands of cotton textile workers and threatens the life span of additional hundreds of thousands presently employed in the industry."

It was this Industrial Hygiene Foundation, Inc., said Pollock, that denied the existence of "black lung" among coal miners and the cancer-producing properties of asbestos dust. The diseases have since been recognized as occupational hazards in the coal mining and asbestos industries.

Speaking to a conference of the union's synthetic fibers division in Washington, Pollock noted that the union recently wrote officials of the American Textile Manufacturers Institute offering cooperation in an objective study of "brown lung."

Officials of the ATMI declined the union's offer on the ground that the institute was going to conduct its own study. It then announced it had engaged the Industrial Hygiene Foundation, Inc., to conduct the industry study.

Pollock said, "We remember all too well the reassurance given by the Industrial Hygiene Foundation's medical director, after a study financed by the Quebec Asbestos Mining Association that there was 'strong evidence against the carciogenicity of asbestos' and that the 'experience of persons exposed to asbestos dust is not worse with respect to lung cancer than that of the unexposed population.'

"The fact that this conclusion was totally false was small comfort to the families of thousands of asbestos workers who have since died of lung cancer and related diseases."

In an editorial a year ago, Pollock said, the foundation called "black lung" a "red herring" and advised coal companies that no such disease existed.

Railway Clerks Move Into New Headquarters

Chicago—The Railway & Airline Clerks have moved into the union's new seven-story headquarters building—the O'Hare International Transportation Center.

New address for the BRAC is 6300 River Road, Rosemont, Ill. 60018. The phone number, Area Code 312, is 692-7711.

The union had previously been headquartered in Cincinnati.

Veto Battle Looms On Education Funds

vote in the Senate, was deliberately put off until Jan. 19, when it will be the first order of business at the start of the second session.

The reason for the delay was to avoid a "pocket veto" between sessions, when there would be no opportunity for a vote to override.

The additional money, particularly for education, had substantial Republican support in both the House and Senate despite the Administration opposition. But White House aides are working to rebuild party lines on the issue of overriding a veto.

A top White House staffer, Counsellor to the President Bryce N. Harlow sent a memo detailing the Administration's opposition to the legislation to Republican congressmen and senators.

His accompanying letter expressed the hope that 1970 "will indeed be a banner year . . . for you personally, and for our party as well."

Noting the likelihood of a vote on overriding the veto, Harlow added, "I am sure you will consider this matter with great care, and shortly we hope to discuss it with you by telephone."

A House-Senate conference committee trimmed back the appropriations bill after White House spokesmen began warning of a veto. But the cuts in the final version weren't deep enough to satisfy the Administration.

Ordinarily, there is no problem about Congress appropriating too much money. If the President doesn't want to spend it, normally he can just order it returned to the Treasury.

Government attorneys, however, have reportedly advised the President that it would be mandatory to pay out the money provided in the various grant programs which earmark money to states, localities or school districts under congressionally-written formulas for specific purposes. The question has never been tested in court.

White House officials indicated that the increases over the budget figure for mandatory programs included $104 million for the Hill-Burton Hospital Construction program, some $300 million for aid to elementary and secondary education, another $398 million for the "impacted" school aid program in districts serving children of servicemen and federal employes, some $200 million added for vocational education, and about $40 million for library aid, as well as a number of smaller programs.

The White House memo argued that the President would have to cut other needed programs if he were required to exceed his budget for education and health.

It contended that the national budget has already been subjected to "inflationary assaults" including such "uncontrollable" costs as an $800 million increase in the cost of interest on the national debt, higher medicare payments and other items.

'I'll Take Care of Your Friend, Too!'

Open Housing Law Now Fully Effective

The final stage of the 1968 open housing law went into effect this month, more than doubling the number of housing units covered by the labor-supported ban on discrimination in sales and rentals.

Some 34 million single-family homes were brought under the federal law, which applies when sales or rentals are made through real estate brokers. Earlier stages of the law covered apartment houses of more than four units and homes in developments.

While its administrative role is limited to housing covered by the 1968 law, the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development considers that race discrimination is barred on all housing in the United States on the basis of an 1866 civil rights law which the Supreme Court upheld nearly two years ago.

In a statement marking the final stage of the 1968 law, HUD Sec. George Romney warned that "housing discrimination is a serious and divisive problem in the United States" and "a strong factor in isolating our urban minorities from their fellow Americans."

He pledged that HUD will administer the law "to move swiftly and decisively toward a genuinely open society in America."

When the legislation was before Congress, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany termed its passage "absolutely essential" to the realistic achievement of school desegregation and equal opportunity. Meany stressed also that "to have meaning . . . open housing must go hand in hand with enough housing and housing available at a price level workers can afford."

At a news conference, HUD Assistant Sec. Samuel J. Simmons said the agency expects a substantial increase in complaints of housing discrimination this year as the result of the expanded coverage. He said there were 927 complaints filed during the first 11 months of 1969, of which 242 were dismissed because of lack of jurisdiction.

Under the law, HUD or a state agency investigates each complaint and tries to resolve it through conciliation. If conciliation fails, a complainant may file suit in federal court or the Justice Dept. may bring a suit to eradicate a "pattern of discrimination."

Last year, HUD said, its Office of Equal Opportunity attempted to conciliate 169 complaints, and completed action on 143 of them. Of these, it said, 94 were successfully resolved, 16 were partially successful and 33 were unsuccessful. It referred 16 of the complaints to the Justice Dept. for court action and 27 individual complainants took their cases directly to court.

The department said it has distributed more than 600,000 leaflets or pamphlets explaining the fair housing law.

4 Pickets Hit By Gun Fire in Hospital Strike

San Francisco—Police protection for striking members of the Service Employes was asked after a shotgun blast fired by an unidentified gunman wounded four pickets in front of Ygnacio Convalescent Hospital.

Two business agents for Hospital Employes Local 250 and two members were peacefully picketing the institution in Walnut Creek, Contra Cosa County, when a man with a shotgun leaped out of a passing auto, fired a blast and drove away.

Leg wounds were suffered by Business Representatives Avery Carter and Willie Price and pickets George Thompson and Mrs. Exie Williams. Other union members took them to Kaiser Hospital, where they were treated.

The assault was the latest in a series of incidents since contract negotiations broke down Dec. 4 and 55 union members voted to strike. The union offered a reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of the runaway terrorist and rallied all its members to the support of the strikers.

Local 250 members include licensed vocational nurses, nurses' aides, cooks and other kitchen workers, and housekeepers. They struck when management refused to discuss any wage increases in a new contract after the old agreement expired in November.

In an earlier incident, a charge of brandishing a gun was filed against a security guard hired by the management. Union Sec.-Treas. Timothy J. Twomey said the guard, one of a number of "rent-a-cops" hired by management, threatened to shoot a volunteer policeman, called to the line by a woman picket.

$50 Million Fund Sought For Low-Income Homes

The National Corp. for Housing Partnerships has initiated a $50 million public offering as the first step toward raising $1.8 billion to finance the construction of low- and moderate-income housing across the country.

The corporation, set up under the Title IX of the 1968 Urban & Housing Development Act, registered with the Securities & Exchange Commission for the sale of the subscriptions.

The subscriptions will be confined to business corporations, labor organizations and financial institutions with substantial assets, "whose primary interest in subscribing is promoting the construction of low- and moderate-income housing rather than return on investment," the registration statement to the SEC said.

No sales will be made to individuals and a minimum investment of $100,000 will be required.

All incorporators of the housing partnershirp, including AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, were appointed by the President. They will serve as directors of the corporation until the first annual meeting of stockholders.

A number of investment securities firms are being invited to assist the corporation in soliciting the subscriptions without compensation other than expenses.

Of the $50 million sought in the subscription drive, about $2.5 million will be used to capitalize the corporation which will serve as the general partner for the partnership and defray expenses to date.

The balance of the proceeds will be used to create limited partnership interests in the partnership.

The partnership will join with local developers, investors and non-profit or community groups throughout the country to help sponsor the construction of housing units or the rehabilitation of older structures.

An aggregate investment of about $1.8 billion is expected to be raised overall with the combination of capital investments, local capital and federally-guaranteed private mortgage financing.

At current construction costs, the total $1.8 billion investment could provide about 120,000 housing units, the corporation estimated.

The corporation is the first set up under the 1968 housing act. The section of the law which paved the way for the formation of the corporation was an outgrowth of a two-year study of national housing problems by a President's committee that included labor, business and community leaders.

Four Craft Unions Set Talks on Jan. 19

Four shopcraft unions and the nation's railroads have agreed to tend the status quo in their bargaining dispute until at least Jan. 19 when they will resume negotiations.

The agreement on continuing the status quo means the unions will not strike and the railroads will not lock out workers or arbitrarily set new rates or working conditions. Both sides are legally free to resort to self-help under the Railway Labor Act.

Members of three unions—Machinists, Boilermakers and International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers—voted to accept an agreement reached Dec. 4. However, members of the Sheet Metal Workers rejected the proposal.

2.4 million in the construction, mining, transportation, communications and retail trade. Their average increase is estimated at 7.1 percent, or 33.1 cents an hour.

BLS said collective bargaining will have more effect on wage changes in 1970 than in 1969, a year of "relatively light" bargaining action.

Since wage changes during the first year of multiyear agreements typically are larger than those in following years, the trend will be to raise the average effective wage hike in 1970 above the 1969 level, it said.

The BLS report was based on contracts covering 1,000 employes or more. It gave these figures for contract expirations of AFL-CIO affiliates: January, 80,000 members of the Ladies' Garment Workers; April, 70,300 rubber workers at Big Four plants and 20,000 Service Employes in New York City apartments; May, 11,500 in three unions at International Paper Co. plants; June, 17,700 members of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers employed by Pacific Gas & Electrical Co.; June, 16,100 members of the Retail, Wholesale & Electric Co.; June, 16,100 hospitals; August, 37,800 Meat Cutters at major packing plants; September and October, 12,150 Shoe Workers and Boot & Shoe Workers at two big chains; December, 23,000 Retail Clerks in Illinois and Indiana.

Philadelphia Plan Assailed As Masking Rights Retreat

GE Spurns New Bid for Arbitration

By Eugene A. Kelly

The General Electric Co., faced with pressure from 30 U.S. mayors to settle a strike of 150,000 employes, again rejected arbitration of the issues in dispute and clung to its rejected take-it-or-leave-it wage offer in stalled negotiations.

The company said in full-page newspaper ads that "arbitration is not the answer" to public appeals for settlement of the 12-week-old strike of 14 unions.

It listed these reasons: unions have historically been opposed to arbitration of contracts; arbitration cannot substitute for management responsibility; "serious negotiations" are the real solution.

The unions replied in a statement by Chairman James Compton of the AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee that "GE strikers also say they want a sound settlement so we can all get back to work soon."

Compton, saying GE's "smokescreen of arguments against the principle of impartial arbitration should fool no one," analyzed the company's position as follows:

"GE's repeated refusal to arbitrate is an acknowledgement that it is afraid to put its offer to any test of equity.

"This is borne out by its rejection even of fact-finding, as proposed by many responsible men."

The CBC chairman declared "we repeat our proposal for binding arbitration of all issues. We welcome fact-finding by responsible parties to spotlight each of the

Meany Calls Job Quotas Unworkable

The Philadelphia plan won't help a bit to increase the number of minority-group jobs in the construction industry and is simply a "concoction and contrivance" designed to mask the Administration's overall retreat on civil rights, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

Meany, in a speech at the National Press Club in Washington, said "I have seen more misinformation and confusion about the Philadelphia plan from columnists, editorial writers and public officials than anything I have seen or heard in a long time."

The plan, which sets up government-determined "goals" for minority-group hiring on major federal construction jobs, would have been killed in the Senate by a rider to an appropriations bill on the ground that racial quotas in hiring are a violation of the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

Rider Removed

However, the rider was removed in subsequent votes of the House and Senate after a vigorous push from the Administration which included a White House press conference by Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz and Assistant Sec. Arthur Fletcher.

Meany described as "just plain, ordinary bunk" many of the press accounts of the plan, including one columnist's description of the congressional action as "the most important civil rights vote in the history of the country."

On the contrary, Meany said, the plan "served its purpose when it got the Madison Avenue publicity

For 'Moderate' Living Standards:

Urban Family Income Needs Rise Above $10,000 Level

A city family with two children needed an annual income of $10,077 in the spring of 1969 just to maintain a "moderate standard of living," according to a Labor Dept. survey.

That's $1,000-a-year more than it would have cost two years earlier, in the spring of 1967.

Today, the family's income needs would be even higher, the Bureau of Labor Statistics notes. Merely taking into account the rise in the cost-of-living to last November would raise the "moderate" budget for a family of four to $10,300. And in some of the biggest cities, the budget cost would be above the $11,000 mark.

Even a bare-bones "lower standard of living" would have required an income of $6,567 as of last spring—and $6,700 as of last November. The comparable budget was priced at $5,915 in the spring of 1967.

For a higher standard of living—still well below luxury levels—the family with two children needed an income of $14,589 last spring and $15,000 as of last November. The comparable budget in the spring of 1967 was priced at $13,050.

Even the lowest of the three budgets requires more money than most American workers earn.

The latest government statistics put the average weekly earnings of production and other nonsupervisory workers in private industry at $117.25.

So even if the average rank-and-file employe worked a full 52 weeks, his annual earnings would be only $6,097. Unless there was another wage-earner in the family or a second job, a family at this level would be more than $600 short of the amount needed for a low-income budget as of last November.

This is a budget which the Labor Dept. earlier described as "austere."

Its middle-level budget — requiring an income of some $4,200 more than the average wage—is generally described as providing "a modest but adequate standard of living."

As in the past, costs varied significantly from city to city, higher in the big metropolitan areas and substantially greater in Alaska and Hawaii.

The family used as the model for the three budgets consists of an em-

Job Expansion Falters After Early '69 Surge

By Duane Emme

The nation's job picture was marked by two sharply contrasting trends in 1969, according to the Labor Dept. A year-end review of the employment scene also uncovered several unusual labor force developments.

During the first part of the year, the report said, "employment rose at a very rapid pace, and unemployment remained at or near post-Korean War lows."

But by year's end, it added, "employment growth had slowed substantially and joblessness was slightly above early 1969 levels."

The overall unemployment rate averaged 3.5 percent in 1969, which the Bureau of Labor Statistics considered an insignificant change from the 3.6 percent average for 1968. The rate averaged 3.8 percent in 1966 and 1967.

The two-sided picture for the year is reflected by changes in the jobless rate that occurred during the year.

BLS figures show that the rate averaged 3.3 percent in the January-March period, matching a 15-year low reached in 1968, but then climbed to a 3.5 percent average in April-June and to 3.7 percent in July-September. The average for October-December was 3.6 percent.

Chicago Minorities Pact Hailed as Pattern-Setter

The "Chicago plan" to step-up employment and training of Negro and other minority group workers in the construction industry is a "significant forward step," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said, and a possible guide for other areas of the nation.

The agreement, setting an immediate target of 4,000 job and training opportunities, was signed in Chicago's City Hall by the Chicago & Cook County Building Trades Council, the employers' association, and the Coalition for United Community Action, which includes black neighborhood groups.

"Its most important attribute," Meany said, "is that this multi-employer, area-wide agreement is truly a hometown product, developed by men aware of the problems, needs and practicalities of this area.

"It is an achievable program, that rests four-square on mutual trust. As such, it is vastly superior to any government-imposed quota system—which is, of course, artificial and discriminatory."

Meany's comments, contrasting the Chicago plan with the Labor Dept.'s government-dictated Philadelphia plan, were made in a letter to C. J. Haggerty, president of the ployed husband aged 38, a wife not employed outside the home, an 8-year-old girl and a 13-year-old boy.

Over the two-year period from the spring of 1967 to the spring of 1969, the survey showed that consumption costs—which include most non-tax items—rose 8.3 percent for the moderate budget and personal taxes were up 11.7 percent.

Lower-income families had to spend a larger percentage of their earnings on medical care—8 percent of the lower budget as compared with 5.5 percent of the moderate budget and 4 percent of the higher budget.

Medical care costs in the moderate budget jumped 13.8 percent in the two-year period, even though the budget assumes that 44 percent of the families have all their medical insurance paid by the employer and that an additional 26 percent have half the cost paid.

Food costs for the moderate standard of living were $2,288 last spring, up 8.7 percent from two years earlier. Housing took $2,351, a 5.4 percent increase, and the cost of transportation climbed 7.8 percent to $940. The cost of clothing and personal care rose 11.2 percent to $1,095.

Two-Year Rise

The increase over the two-year period was largest in the metropolitan areas. There, the moderate budget was up 11.1 percent from 1967. In nonmetropolitan areas—the smaller cities—the cost rose 10.6 percent over the two years.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics said its current updating is based on preliminary data reflecting costs in 39 metropolitan areas, four regional classes of nonmetropolitan areas and in the urban United States as a whole.

"GE IS OUR ENEMY, TOO," Cesar Chavez, center, tells farm workers at Delano, Calif., rally to support General Electric strikers. Chavez, who heads the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, reported nearly $1,000 collected for GE strikers. Farm workers, on strike themselves more than four years, are helping on GE strike and boycott picket lines as well.

Farm Workers 'Share' To Help GE Strikers

Delano, Calif.—After more than four years on strike against California grape growers, union farm workers have a deeper faith in the trade union movement than ever.

They proved it last week by contributing nearly $1,000 to the General Electric Strike Relief Fund.

"We have little money, but we share it gladly," Cesar Chavez, director of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, told a mass meeting in Delano.

"To this money we add our hearts and our minds, our picket signs and our bodies on the boycott and picket lines to help win a fair contract for GE workers," Chavez declared. He added:

"Other trade unionists have joined with us unflinchingly since the beginning of our own strike and boycott, and they are with us still. This is our chance to show our gratitude and our determination to continue the fight until both battles are won."

Nearly $700 was collected by UFWOC ranch committees all over California. Passing the hat at the Delano meeting, attended by about 700 persons, brought the total to $987.92.

"That may not seem like a great deal of money these days," said William L. Kircher, AFL-CIO organizing director. "Coming from people who have so little, whose own need is so great, it is an enormous gift."

Kircher, who reported on GE strike and boycott developments at the Delano meeting, said "the response was overwhelming."

"It proves once again that farm workers are fully and totally committed to trade unionism to improve not only their own lives, but the lives of their fellow men," Kircher said.

Public Health Unit Recognizes SEIU

New Orleans—Service Employes Local 275 has been recognized by the U.S. Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare as exclusive bargaining agent for nonprofessional and non-supervisory employes of the New Orleans Public Health Service Hospital.

The union won a representation election last April but the medical director declined to recognize it on the ground that less than 60 percent of the 352 eligible workers voted. SEIU pointed out that 177 of 279 workers, a clear majority, voted for the union. HEW headquarters in Washington agreed with the union's contention that more than 60 percent of the eligible voters did participate, when absences due to illness, vacations and the like were allowed for.

The election was held under Federal Executive Order 10988 governing votes in federal service.

Labor Dept. Reports:

Economy Not Hurt By Dock Strikes

Three recent longshore strikes had "minimal" economic impact even though each had been delayed by a Taft-Hartley injunction on grounds it endangered the nation's economy, a Labor Dept. study has found.

Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz cited the finding as a further proof that major strikes do much less harm to the economy than is usually predicted before they occur.

The strikes studied took place in East Coast and Gulf ports for the periods Dec. 23, 1962 to Jan. 27, 1963; Jan. 11 to Mar. 6, 1965; and Dec. 20, 1968 to various dates between Feb. 15 and Apr. 13, 1969.

The walkouts involved members of the Longshoremen who sought and won new gains in wages, benefits and the determination of work crew sizes.

The three strikes were chosen for scrutiny, the department said, because "they appear to be archetypical examples of the use of Taft-Hartley Act emergency procedures and because port stoppages have potentially pervasive impact throughout the economy."

Although each walkout was held up by an 80-day "cooling off" injunction issued under the law, the study found, "The strikes had no visible impact on the U.S. economy as a whole—industrial production, retail sales, national income or total employment."

It was further noted that "in general, U.S. foreign trade patterns during and after these three periods failed to reveal any long-run effects which could be directly attributed to the strikes."

The report said that the average net loss in trade balance was up to $10 million a day during the period of the 1962-63 and 1965 strikes, and up to $5 million in the 1968-69 strike.

It pointed out, however, that "none of the total net losses appears large in comparison with total U.S. foreign trade—$41 billion in 1963; $49 billion in 1965; and $70 billion in 1969."

After questioning exporters and assembling data for the periods following each strike, the study concluded that there was "no evidence of a permanent loss of export markets" because of the walkouts.

In summarizing the economic impact of the strikes as "minimal," the study found that there were harsh effects on some port neighborhoods; port-supported businesses such as restaurants and bars; and truckers, importers and exporters.

But in assessing the impact on the entire economy, it said that "with few exceptions such as sugar cane and parts for some foreign-made vehicles, the strikes did not appear to generate shortages of materials or components in this country."

Many companies prepared for the strikes by stepping up business and orders, the report observed. Also, it said that firms found other means of transportation to ship their goods.

"It is worth noting," the report said, "that the 80-day 'grace period' which resulted from the injunctions may have contributed to the reduction of the strike impact by providing a clear signal that anticipatory activity was needed and by allowing an appreciable period of time to engage in such activity."

The steel strike study found that "the economic impact of strikes on the economy are usually seriously exaggerated" in terms of losses of production, employment and wages.

Taken together, Shultz said, the two studies indicate that despite warnings of dire economic effects during maior strikes, such results are "kind of difficult to find" once the walkouts are ended.

Firm Agrees to Reopen Plant Shut to Bar Union

New York—A clothing manufacturer who closed his plant two years ago after it was organized has agreed to reopen his place of business and offer jobs to the 150 employes he laid off, the Clothing Workers announced here.

The union's agreement with the Murray-Kent Co. included the dropping of unfair labor practice charges against the firm for closing its plant in Murray, Ky., to thwart the union. The National Labor Relations Board accepted the settlement and dismissed a complaint issued Sept. 25, 1968, by an NLRB regional director.

The settlement was negotiated by ACWA Vice Pres. William C. Hall, manager of the union's Southwest Regional Joint Board, St. Louis, and Vice Pres. Jacob Sheinkman, head of the union's law department staff here.

The company, which makes work clothes in five plants across the country, agreed to offer reinstatement to all employes of the Kentucky plant; to pay them $100 each, and to negotiate with the union on terms of a first contract.

Plant workers joined ACWA after a 1966 organizing drive. Murray employes stopped work Dec. 8, 1967, for the customary year-end inventory. On the day after Christmas that year they received a letter from management announcing the permanent closing of the Kentucky plant "for economic reasons."

Only the union-organized plant of the Murray-Kent chain was singled out for closing, the union learned. The four non-union plants remained in operation.

Management refused to discuss its decision when Hall asked for information on the "economic factors" it mentioned.

When the company refused to reverse its unilateral action in throwing 150 employes on the job market, the union filed an unfair labor practice charge with the NLRB, and the regional director issued a complaint.

Trial Examiner Louis Libbin ruled last Apr. 22 after hearings that the decision to close was reached for unlawful reasons—to avoid dealing with the union and in violation of employe rights under the law. He advised the board to order the plant to be reopened. He recommended that all the laid-off employes be rehired; that they be made whole for their lost pay, and that the company bargain with ACWA.

The board was preparing an order to bargain when the union and management notified it that a settlement had been reached. The board's order took note of the agreement and approved the dropping of charges.

issues. We are prepared to negotiate face to face with GE in any public arena so that all can see how false are GE's ads."

Meanwhile there were these other developments in the strike that started Oct. 27 at more than 200 GE locations:

- A mayors' committee met with company and union representatives in New York to urge more bargaining and less rhetoric.
- The AFL-CIO reported continued progress in its campaign for donations to the GE strike relief fund and support by the public of the boycott campaign against GE products.
- GE lamp plant managers sent letters to employes "suggesting" they return to work, and GE management met with Schenectady, N.Y., community leaders to propose a secret ballot vote on the company's last offer. The meeting was closed to the press and public.

Business Mgr. Joseph Mangino of Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers Local 301, Schenectady, held an open meeting with 100 civic leaders and proposed a secret ballot vote of GE stockholders on acceptance of either one of two union contract offers or, as an alternative, that all unsettled issues be submitted to arbitration or to a panel of fact-finders.

The community leaders reserved a decision, IUE reported.

As pickets marched in frigid weather at GE plants, members of Teamsters Local 317 joined the picket line of other striking union members in Syracuse, N.Y. The Teamsters' pact expired Jan. 13.

Milwaukee unionists reported that two school board members objected to acceptance of a GE bid for $38,000 in school lighting fixtures, and action was postponed.

Dir. J. Curtis Counts of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service asked small committees from labor and management to meet with him at 7 p.m., Jan. 15. IUE Pres. Paul Jennings said the meeting, with top management officials, is "welcome" but gives no indication that "instant miracles" may result.

The Communications Workers took sizable ads in three daily newspapers saying "It's time for GE to settle this strike."

The union noted that after nearly three months of the strike, "we think it's about time that reasonable people on both sides . . . find the way to bring the dispute to a satisfactory settlement."

CWA said "the unions, in our opinion, have shown a reasonable approach. Their proposals . . . are in line with the going rate in other major industries."

It continued: "As citizens interested in economic progress, we think GE's top management should take a fresh look at the strike, the issues, and most of all, the attitudes of the people . . . involved."

The Supreme Court turned down the General Electric Co.'s latest appeal from a lower court ruling against illegal company labor practices.

The justices refused a company request that they review an order compelling GE to admit a union time-study man to a GE distribution transformer plant at Hickory, N.C. It was the latest in a series of orders from the National Labor Relations Board that the company appealed and lost in the last six months.

The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers brought an unfair labor practice charge against the Hickory plant when GE management refused to let a union engineer check time and motion studies and area wage rates in 1966.

A trial examiner and the NLRB itself upheld the union and GE appealed. The 4th Circuit Court of Appeals at Richmond, Va., enforced the order which the Supreme Court now has declined to hear arguments on.

An appeals court panel headed by Chief Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr. held last June 12 that IUE Local 182 did not waive its right to its own time studies when it signed a contract with GE three years ago.

It ruled also that the union could not properly evaluate grievances under its contract because it "lacked sufficient information and data effectively" to represent its members in the grievance processes.

The decision noted "strong public policy to make the grievance procedures . . . the means for accomplishing public peace. . . . Access to the information" needed to "make them fully effective is in the interest of an enlightened employer."

As to area wage data which GE uses to set rates in its Hickory plant and others, the court said the union is entitled to know the identity of the plants surveyed because GE claimed that based upon these data, the employes involved in wage grievances were not underpaid.

Under such circumstances, the judges held, "it was incumbent on GE to disclose proof of the accuracy of its position."

Two other recent Court of Appeals decisions upheld the right of unions to engage in coordinated bargaining with GE. A third affirmed the right of IUE Local 1507 to make voluntary collections on company property for striking farm workers in California.

Machinists Get New Offer In TWA Dispute

A scheduled walkout by 15,000 members of the Machinists against Trans World Airlines was delayed 24 hours when management made a last-minute offer in negotiations that have extended over a period of 14 months.

That moved the new deadline to 3 a.m., Jan. 15. Talks were continuing at offices of the National Mediation Board on new terms of a contract to replace one that expired Dec. 31, 1968.

IAM members service 244 TWA planes carrying nearly 40,000 passengers a day on domestic and overseas flights.

The union said TWA is the last major U.S. airline that has not reached contract agreement for the 1969-71 period except National Airlines. The latter line fired 1,000 mechanics and ground service workers a year ago and is resisting a court order to reinstate them.

Settlements with other air carriers have provided wage hikes of up to 35 percent over three years, plus major improvements in pensions, health services, vacations and holidays. United and Northwest managements recently agreed to contracts raising top rates to $5.62 an hour by 1971. TWA pays $4.14 an hour, the union said.

13 COPE Conferences Slated on '70 Elections

The high stakes that hinge on the outcome of the 1970 elections will form the central theme of 13 regional COPE conferences scheduled to get under way Jan. 30.

A renewed effort to initiate effective voter registration campaigns will be stressed at the conferences by the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education.

The importance of getting workers to the polls and electing candidates friendly to the objectives of labor cannot be emphasized enough, said COPE Dir. Al Barkan.

He noted that many liberal members of the House and Senate face major challenges in the elections next fall.

As in past years, the COPE conferences will feature panels of area congressmen and senators to discuss legislative goals and accomplishments. They will also be available to answer questions from the delegates.

The schedule for the COPE conferences:

Jan. 30—At New Orleans for Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi and Oklahoma.

Feb. 7 — Jacksonville, Fla., for Alabama, Florida, Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina and Tennessee.

Feb. 11—Cincinnati for Indiana, Kentucky, Ohio and West Virginia.

March 2 — San Antonio for Texas.

March 11—Hartford, Conn., for Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island and Vermont.

March 15—Chicago for Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin.

March 19—New York for New Jersey and New York.

April 3—Philadelphia for Delaware, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Virginia and the District of Columbia.

April 7—Minneapolis for Iowa, Minnesota, North Dakota and South Dakota.

April 11—Kansas City for Kansas, Missouri and Nebraska.

April 28—Portland, Ore., for Alaska, Idaho, Montana, Oregon and Washington.

April 28—Denver for Colorado, New Mexico, Utah and Wyoming.

May 2—San Francisco for Arizona, California, Hawaii and Nevada.

Thomas E. McDonald, Cleveland Leader, Dies

Cleveland—Thomas E. McDonald, veteran officer of the Cleveland and Ohio AFL-CIO and the Cleveland Building & Construction Trades Council, died here at 75 after a long illness.

McDonald had served as manager of Iron Workers Local 17 for 35 years. He was president of the Cleveland Federation of Labor from 1952 to 1955, and became board chairman of the Cleveland AFL-CIO Council after merger.

Labor-OEO Training Set In Midwest

Minneapolis — A four-state program to train more than 100 labor union members to work with the poor and deprived will be supervised by the Labor Education Service of the University of Minnesota.

The Midwest OEO Labor Leadership Project is financed by a grant from the Office of Economic Opportunity. Don Stevens, chairman of the board of trustees of Michigan State University, will take a one-year leave of absence as education director of the Michigan AFL-CIO to become project director.

Prof. John Flagler, Labor Education Service director, said three state field representatives will work with Stevens on the training program. They are Len Kieffer of the Carpenters, Minneapolis; Mrs. Nellie Wilson of the Wisconsin AFL-CIO staff, and John Norris, former education director of the Indiana AFL-CIO.

The appointment has the approval of a labor advisory committee that includes the presidents of four state central bodies—Willis Zagrovich, Indiana; David K. Roe, Minnesota; Wallace J. Dockter, North Dakota; and John W. Schmitt, Wisconsin, along with Julius Rothman, president of the Human Resources Development Institute, and George Guernsey of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education.

The program will give selected union applicants 20 days of resident training in community action programs and pay their lost time and living expenses.

The Threat of Recession

DESPITE WHAT appears to be a mixed bag of figures and indicators, liberally confused by interpretations and analyses, a very serious danger of recession is posed by the Administration's economic policies.

Now, as the White House prepares its new budget and various economic and other messages, the word is leaking out that there may be a need for new taxes ranging from continued or increased excise taxes that were due to expire to conjecture about a "value added" tax—in simpler terms a national sales tax.

All of this is proposed in the name of ending inflation, a situation that can be traced back directly to price increases designed to zoom profits and to a still-expanding boom in business investment in new plants and equipment.

The Administration's first approach to the inflation problem was to impose tight, severe, across-the-board economic restraints that are threatening to bring on a recession—if in fact the country is not already sliding into a recession in terms of the overall trend in economic growth.

The latest figures from the Dept. of Labor show, for example, that payroll employment—jobs—has been at a virtual standstill in terms of growth since October 1969. For the second half of 1969 payroll employment rose by a mere 375,000 compared to a 1.5 million increase in the first six months of the year.

This is a direct result of what happens when the government applies economic restraint across the board, tightening the money supply and allowing interest rates—the price of money—to soar to the highest level in the nation's history.

There are methods of handling the problem of inflation, of profit-generated price increases, without squeezing the entire economy or threatening to let it slide into recession. The use of selective restraints and controls would prevent the critical depression in residential construction, the harmful cutbacks in meeting the needs of state and local governments.

And adding to or expanding the use of regressive tax measures that pile an even heavier burden on those least capable of carrying it is surely neither good economics nor social justice or equity.

Congress on the Record

A SPECIAL FOUR-PAGE section of this issue is devoted to the voting records of congressmen and senators.

The issues chosen as key votes for the first session of the 91st Congress reflect the broad concerns of the labor movement. A vote against better education, against tax justice, against equal opportunity is an anti-labor vote in the AFL-CIO's book, just as is a vote to curb unions.

Issues of equal importance will be voted on during this second session and will, of course, be included in the final report on the record of the 91st Congress.

Shifting Policy on Middle East Treats the Winners as Losers

By John P. Roche

IF ONE BELIEVES, as I do, that American policy in the Middle East has not been "unbalanced," what can he make of the current efforts of the United States government to work out a joint policy with the Soviet Union? The USSR has not only issued the Arabs their hunting licenses, but has armored them as well. While abstractly admitting Israel's right to exist, the Russians have done everything in their power (short of direct intervention) to create the preconditions for Israel's destruction.

The Johnson Administration started with the fact that Israel won the war in 1967 and insisted that—while our good offices were available to aid in peacemaking—the losers had to come to terms with the winner. When we did make proposals regarding Israel's future—or those of the Arab states—we discussed them in advance with the nations concerned.

The Nixon Administration, in contrast, has worked up and submitted to Moscow, London and Paris a whole series of proposals to pacify the Middle East without any prior consultation with Jerusalem. All are in essence designed to make the winner come to terms with the losers.

Why? In historical terms begging Moscow to join in such a plan resembles a request from the FBI to the Mafia to cooperate in suppressing gambling. There would not be a major Middle Eastern problem if the Soviets had not loaded up the Arabs, encouraged their revanchism, and then —after they lost—reloaded them. Why then should the United States make the slightest effort to rescue the Russians from the consequences of their sinister miscalculations?

The immediate answer is because we want to substitute "negotiations" for "confrontation," because we want peace. Fine. Everybody wants peace—presumably—so why shouldn't the Soviets and their Arab clients substitute negotiations with Israel for confrontation? Maybe it is hard on their pride, but people with that sort of pride should not start wars.

No, the answer must be broader than that. It seems to begin with the proposition recently stated by U Thant that "the cold war is now coming to an end and a new era of negotiations" and detente between Washington and Moscow is in the offing.

All that is needed, Thant suggested, to bring about this new era is for the United States to liquidate its commitments in the Middle East and Viet Nam. (The UN Secretary-General has so far not suggested that a "coalition government" between the Israelis and Al Fatah would solve the Middle Eastern problem, but the opportunity may present itself.)

I regret to say that every bit of evidence I have seen indicates that the cold war is not about to end. On the contrary, just as it shifted form when Khrushchev replaced Stalin, I think it is entering a new strategic phase in which the prime Soviet objective is to destroy the credibility of American power.

AT ONE LEVEL, they are producing the giant SS-9 missiles like sausages (in Stewart Alsop's vivid phrase) and are forging a ballistic defense system—not, I suspect, to launch any first strike, but to convince Germans, Japanese and others that the vaunted U.S. nuclear umbrella is worthless.

Soviet refusals to aid the negotiations on Viet Nam provide further insight—they want one signal communicated throughout the world: "The United States is an unreliable ally."

Our performance in the Middle East must bring joy to Soviet hearts: after Israel clobbered every Soviet client within reach, the United States has moved to restore Moscow's credit in the Third World and to strengthen one of the top anti-Americans in a fair-sized league, Egypt's Nasser.

Let me be clear. I want genuine detente, but I am unconditionally opposed to a unilateral detente in which we are supposed to sacrifice Israel or South Viet Nam on the altar of "great power responsibility." And that is the name of the present game.

Report on the 91st Congress

By Andrew J. Biemiller
Director, AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation

THE 91ST CONGRESS opened with a newly elected Republican President in the White House and the Democrats in control of both the Senate and the House of Representatives. It was the first such division of power since 1848.

Friction developed at once. Pres. Nixon's legislative recommendations dribbled to the Capitol, and Congress showed no speed in deliberations.

Although the session was the sixth longest in history, it adjourned with the smallest legislative output in years. Quantity and quality, however, are not the same and many of the actions merit a "well done."

For example, the Tax Reform Act of 1969 stands as the most sweeping rewriting of the tax code since 1912, when the 16th Amendment to the Constitution first gave Congress the power to levy and collect taxes on income.

True, the oil lobby managed to protect much of the oil depletion allowance and Congress failed to adopt an adequate capital gains tax. However, the act is a good start toward tax justice with some loopholes closed, others reduced.

THE AFL-CIO offered a comprehensive tax reform package, to raise $15-17 billion in new revenue and provide $8 billion in relief to low- and middle-income families. The House Ways & Means Committee produced its own reform bill.

But the 10 percent surtax was about to expire. The Administration insisted it be continued before Congress tackled tax reform. The AFL-CIO and many House members believed such action would doom real tax reform. Leaders of both parties pledged that reform would follow immediately after the surtax bill and it squeaked through, 210-205.

In the Senate, Sen. Paul Fannin (R-Ariz.) tried to remove labor unions from tax exempt status if they supported political activities, including voter registration. The Senate defeated his proposal, 59-27.

Sen. Albert Gore (D-Tenn.) sought tax relief for low and middle-income families by increasing the personal exemption to $800. The final bill provides exemptions of $750 by 1973.

The President threatened a veto because of a 15 percent increase in social security benefits. However, such an increase passed the House by such an overwelming majority that the President decided not to risk the fight.

ONE OF THE GREAT problems that confronts Congress is national priorities. This Congress did shift Administration priority by increasing education and health funds in the appropriations bill for the Labor-HEW Departments. The fight to override the threatened veto will set the tone for 1970.

Shortly before his death, Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen announced that Pres. Nixon would appoint the presiding judge of the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals, Clement Haynsworth, as an Associate Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany immediately wired the President that Haynsworth had shown a clear anti-labor, anti-civil rights bias while on the court.

Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.) was floor general in that fight. His investigation of Haynsworth's finances showed the judge had sat in cases where he had a personal financial interest. The minority leader, Hugh Scott (R-Pa.), the minority whip, Robert P. Griffin (R-Mich.), and the chairman of the Republican Senate Policy Committee, Margaret Chase Smith (R-Me.) voted against confirmation.

Authorization for the Office of Economic Opportunity expired on June 30, 1969, so congressional action was necessary. The White House asked for a two-year extension but failed to fight vigorously against weakening amendments. On the floor, Rep. Edith Green (D-Ore.) and Rep. Albert H. Quie (R-Minn.) were soundly beaten in an effort to turn the program over to the states.

The Administration came up "soft" on the key civil rights issue, playing into the hands of segregationists seeking to gut the 1965 Voting Rights Act.

CONGRESS PASSED two important labor measures: The Federal Construction Safety Act authorizing the Secretary of Labor to promulgate safety standards for all federal and federally assisted construction, covering about 40 to 50 percent of all construction workers; the Federal Coal Mine Health & Safety Act provides for the promulgation of safety and health standards in the coal mining industry and extends workmen's compensation to miners suffering pneumoconiosis.

Congress, however, left a number of important labor bills for 1970: extending Fair Labor Standards coverage and increasing the minimum wage to $2 an hour; manpower development and training, bargaining rights for farm labor.

There are also many other urgent problems that demand congressional attention including: welfare improvement, adequate housing, Social Security reform, consumer protection and protection from air and water pollution.

Much remains to be done. The sparring will continue, and the AFL-CIO will be fighting for the legislative program adopted by the last convention.

By Alexander E. Barkan
Director, AFL-CIO COPE

IN A SENSE, the story of the importance of the 1970 elections to workers and their unions can be found in the voting records carried on these pages.

The issues listed are among the most crucial voted on in the first session of the 91st Congress. The story they tell is one of attempted retreat from social welfare responsibility by the conservatives in Congress, and a counter-pull by congressional liberals in their effort to retain or expand the gains of recent years in many areas of American life—education, voting rights, urban aid, war on poverty.

They tell the story, too, of an imminent change in the character of the Supreme Court, for the very nomination of Judge Haynsworth—though rejected—presages the type of nominee we can expect as more vacancies occur.

Finally, one issue, the Fannin Amendment in the Senate—promoted at the behest of the National Right to Work Committee and calculated to drive unions out of politics—suggests a far broader attack on the labor movement should conservatives gain control as a result of next November's elections.

They want to prohibit multi-union coordinated bargaining and place unions under the anti-trust laws. They want to dismantle the National Labor Relations Board and replace it with a so-called "labor court." They want to enact a national open shop law. In short, they want to achieve in a few quick, cruel strokes what they have been unable to achieve in 70 years of constant and costly effort.

THEY SEE 1970 as the year of their golden opportunity, for if they can capture Congress all the elements of their success will have converged. Already the national administration is at variance with many of the goals of the labor movement. The Supreme Court faces an inevitable rightward turn. The federal agencies are being stacked with leaders who oppose the very regulatory process they are charged to enforce.

Only Congress, at this time, can be looked to for support of the goals and aspirations of working people and their unions.

And so the labor movement faces its stiffest political challenge in 1970. The arithmetic of the challenge is quite precise. In the U.S. Senate, 35 seats are up, 25 Democrats and 10 Republicans.

Of the 25 Democrats, 21 are solid liberal friends of working people who have gone down the line on all or most of the key issues of recent years. Ten of these 21 are marginal on grounds of a winning percentage of 55 or less last time around or for reasons of special political problems. On official AFL-CIO voting records, these 10 have a combined score of 497 "right" votes, only 63 "wrong" votes.

In addition to the 10 marginals, Republicans have set their sights on unseating three other progressive leaders in the Senate. They need capture only seven seats to tie the Senate in a 50-50 knot and, since the Vice President holds the balance of power in the Senate, control the Senate itself.

In the House, the story is similar. The outcome in November in some 80 marginal districts, held approximately 2-1 by friends of working people and their unions, will determine the true nature of the House. The present 245-189 Democratic margin is illusory. Majorities to block cut-back legislation or to advance progressive legislation are not easy to come by.

COMPLICATING THE PICTURE in 1970 is the unusually important character of state legislative elections. Forty-five states will elect legislatures this year—and legislatures sitting in 1971 will redistrict congressional seats on the basis of the 1970 census. Thus, the legislatures will have a decisive impact on the make-up of Congress for the next 10 years. Some legislatures already in conservative control have drafted redistricting plans to eliminate liberal congressmen. They are only awaiting re-election this year to put these plans into effect.

The next three pages carry labor's report card on the first session of the 91st Congress.

Congressmen have been judged on 10 key issues and senators on 11—"R-right" or "W-wrong" on the basis of the position the AFL-CIO took on the legislation.

Alongside the voting records are brief descriptions of the issues—what the vote was about and why it was important to the labor movement and the nation.

A congressman or senator may claim he supported labor's position because he voted for final passage of a bill. But in most cases, the key vote was on an amendment that would have seriously weakened or greatly improved the bill. The votes used here are those considered most significant.

How Your Repres

1. Aid to Education

One of the great breakthroughs of recent years was legislation providing federal aid to education. It has aided more than 90 percent of all American school districts, with particular emphasis on poverty areas.

One of its strengths had been the ability of school administrators to plan several years in advance for the use of expected federal funds.

However, Rep. Green (D-Ore.) proposed an amendment limiting extension of the school aid plan to two years instead of five and giving states control over part of the federal funds. Her amendment was approved 235-184, Apr. 23, 1969.

For—wrong. Against—right.

2. Education Funds

The Administration budget called for totally inadequate funding of federal aid to education—less than half the amount Congress had authorized to be spent.

The House Appropriations Committee recommended an additional $121 million for education aid. But the gap between that amount and the need would still have been too wide in the opinion of labor and education groups.

The AFL-CIO helped rally support for an amendment by Rep. Joelson (D-N.J.) to add an additional $894.5 million for education programs. It was approved 294-119, July 31, 1969.

For—right. Against—wrong.

3. Farm Subsidies

Some large farm owners get vast subsidy payments from the government. Sen. Eastland (D-Miss.), for example, receives approximately $150,000 a year in subsidies. Rep. Conte (R-Mass.) proposed limiting subsidy payments to $20,000. This was approved 225-142, May 27, 1969.

4. Surtax

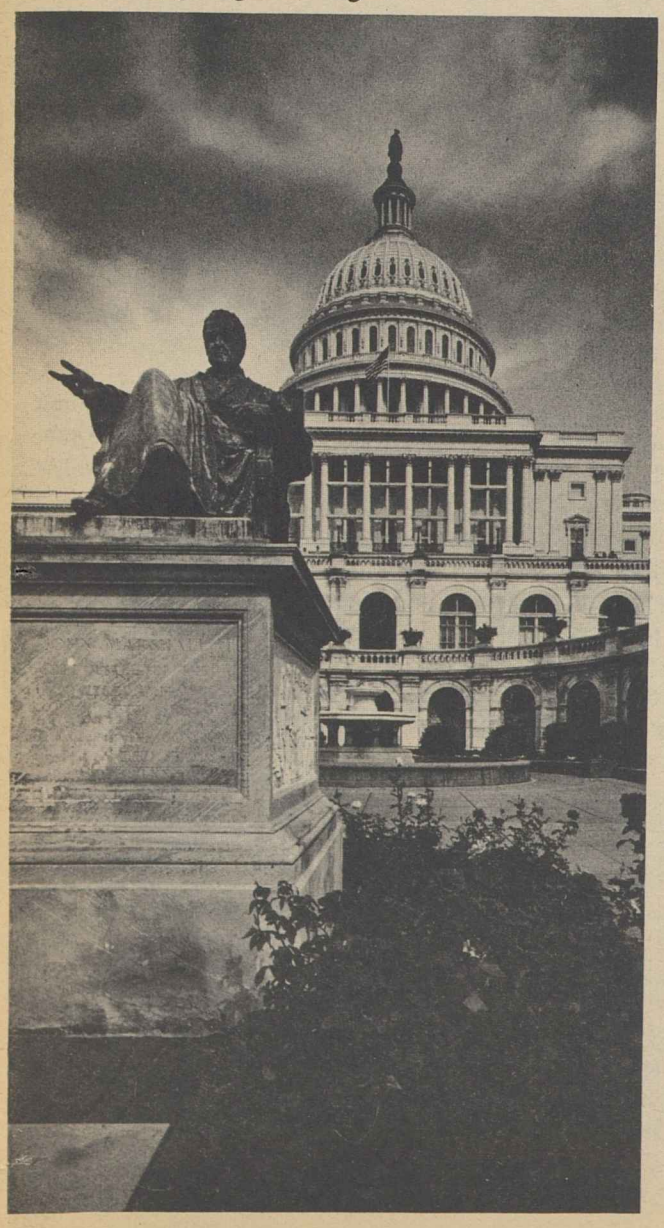
Over opposition of labor and other tax reform forces, the House extended the surtax on income tax one year without including meaningful tax reform.

However, the margin was so close before the vote that it brought firm pledges from House Ways & Means Chairman Mills and Pres. Nixon to consider tax reform immediately.

This paved the way for reforms and the $750 personal exemption in the final tax measure signed into law. The measure passed June 30, 1969 by a vote of 210-205.



For—wrong. Against—right.

5. Tax Reform

After months of hearings, the House came up with a tax bill that would narrow some existing loopholes, provide some tax relief for each taxpayer and eliminate taxes entirely for many poor families.

Rep. Bush (R-Tex)., who declared the measure was too harsh on the oil industry, made an effort to kill the bill by having it recommitted to the Ways & Means Committee. His motion was defeated 345-78 on Aug. 7, 1969.

For—wrong. Against—right.

6. Peace Corps

The Peace Corps has made friends for America all over the world. It was one of the most popular new programs of the 1960s. Despite its success, some conservatives have sought to cut back its funding. Rep. Gross (R-Iowa) proposed an $11.1 million reduction in Peace Corps funds. His proposal was rejected 186-144, Sept. 8, 1969.

7. Electoral College

The 1968 presidential election, with the threat that it would be thrown for decision into the U.S. House because of a third-party candidate, renewed interest in long-delayed electoral reform, primarily in direct election of the President and abolition of the Electoral College. The House Judiciary Committee reported a bill to this effect, backed by committee leaders of both parties.

The House eventually passed the committee bill but first had to deal with a proposal by Rep. Dennis (R-Ind.) which would have retained the Electoral College. The Dennis proposal was rejected 246-162, Sept. 18, 1969.

8. Voting Rights

The Voting Rights Act of 1965 helped add one million voters to the registration rolls in seven southern states. It has been one of the most successful human rights laws of recent years.

Rep. Ford (R-Mich.) introduced—as a substitute for a simple five-year extension of the present act—an Administration proposal that seriously weakened voting rights protections by abolishing close supervision of Deep South states where in the past coercion and subterfuge had kept Negroes from voting. It was adopted 208-203, Dec. 11, 1969.

For—wrong. Against—right.

9. School Desegregation

The House had voted to prevent HEW funds from being withheld from school districts with so-called "freedom of choice" plans. These plans are a device to avoid school desegregation. They have been ruled illegal by the U.S. Supreme Court.

Later an effort was made to reverse the original House action. Rep. Flood (D-Pa.) tried to block this reversal but failed 216-181, Dec. 18, 1969.

For—wrong. Against—right.

10. War on Poverty

The effort to scuttle the war on poverty has been constant. Despite this, the anti-poverty program has had some successes, and one reason for them has been the presence of a central authority, the Office of Economic Opportunity, that can coordinate the various anti-poverty programs.

Rep. Ayres (R-Ohio) tried to fragment the anti-poverty program by turning it over to the states and reducing the authority of the OEO. His plan was rejected, 231-163, Dec. 12, 1969.

For—wrong. Against—right.

How Your Senators Voted

1. Filibuster Rule

The Senate muffed a chance to change its filibuster rule at the start of the 91st Congress. Shortly before he left office, Vice Pres. Humphrey ruled that only a majority vote was needed to act on a change in the Senate's rules at the start of a new Congress. If the Senate had sustained this ruling when it was appealed, the power of a minority to keep the majority from acting on legislation could have been curbed. But on Jan. 16, 1969, the Senate refused to sustain Humphrey's ruling by a 53-45 vote. For—right. Against—wrong.

2. Food Stamps

Millions of poor Americans are ill-fed. A proposal by Sen. McGovern (D-S.D.) called for free food stamps for families with monthly incomes under $60 and authorized $1.25 billion for this program for fiscal 1970. The proposal was accepted 54-40, Sept. 24, 1969. For—right. Against—wrong.

3. Poverty-Legal Services

Conservatives opposed to the war on poverty sought to give governors absolute veto power over legal services projects for the poor. A proposal by Sen. Murphy (R-Calif.) to this effect was approved 45-40, Oct. 14, 1969. For—wrong. Against—right. (Murphy's amendment was later knocked out of the final bill.)

4. Poverty—Funding

Congressional conservatives have steadily chipped away at funding for the war on poverty, reducing the effectiveness of its programs. An amendment by Sen. Nelson (D-Wis.), adding $400 million to the amount the Appropriations Committee had recommended, was approved 60-32, Dec. 16, 1969. For—right. Against—wrong.

5. School Desegregation

The House passed an amendment to prevent cutting federal funds to school districts refusing to desegregate. Despite Supreme Court decisions, the House plan said federal funds could not be denied school districts permitting so-called "freedom of choice" plans. Sen. Scott (R-Pa.) proposed an amendment to nullify the House action, and the Senate approved it, 52-37, Dec. 17, 1969. For — right. Against — wrong. (The House subsequently concurred. See House vote No. 9.)

6. Money for Cities

Many progressive programs have suffered deep fund cuts during 1969, among them programs to aid our choked, blighted cities. Sen. Hart (D-Mich.) tried to increase appropriations for urban renewal by $587.5 million. His proposal was rejected 36-34, Nov. 10, 1969. For—right. Against—wrong.

7. Haynsworth Nomination

A consistent pattern of anti-union decisions, hostility to civil rights progress and gross insensitivity to conflicts of interest led the AFL-CIO and civil rights groups to oppose Pres. Nixon's nomination of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., to the Supreme Court. On Nov. 21, 1969, the Senate rejected the nomination by a 55-45 vote. For—wrong. Against—right.

8. Tax Reform—Exemptions

The $600 personal income tax exemption has been long outdated and is obviously inadequate. As a major measure of tax reform—one of the biggest issues in Congress and the nation—Sen. Gore (D-Tenn.) proposed increasing the personal exemption to $800. The Senate approved the Gore amendment 58-37, Dec. 3, 1969. For—right. Against—wrong. (The final bill changed this to a three-step increase to $750.)

9. Tax Reform—Voter Registration

Some tax-exempt foundations help to finance voter registration activity, particularly among the rural and urban poor. They can continue to do so, for non-partisan registration drives carried on in two or more states, thanks to an amendment by Sen. Yarborough (D-Tex.). It was approved 53-35, Dec. 4, 1969. For —right. Against—wrong.

10. Tax Reform—Minimum Tax

For years, many wealthy individuals have ducked taxation entirely or, by using various tax loopholes, have paid absurdly little. Sen. Kennedy (D-Mass.) proposed a four-bracket graduated minimum tax to get a fair share of these escaping dollars in place of the inadequate five percent minimum tax approved by the Senate Finance Committee. However, the Kennedy proposal was rejected 52-24, Dec. 6, 1969. For—right. Against—wrong.

11. The Anti-COPE Amendment

Prompted by the National Right to Work Committee, Sen. Fannin (R-Ariz.) introduced an amendment to the tax bill to deny tax exemptions to presently exempt organizations which engage in political activities, even non-partisan registration drives. The Fannin proposal was aimed squarely at the labor movement. The amendment was rejected 59-27, Dec. 8, 1969. For—wrong. Against—right.

Meany Hits Double Standard:

Philadelphia Plan Held Tied Up With Nixon's Southern Strategy

The following is excerpted from an address by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to the National Press Club in Washington, D.C. on Jan. 12, 1970 on the "Philadelphia plan."

THE ONLY SOUND METHOD to bring minority representatives into the skilled construction trades is the comprehensive program outlined by the building trades and backed up in every way by the AFL-CIO. That is the apprenticeship program, the inviting into the unions of the qualified journeymen under the same terms as anyone else and upgrading those already employed in the building trades at a lower category. This would take care of those who are above what we call apprenticeship age.

The Philadelphia plan is directed solely to construction, sponsored and financed in some way by the federal government. It can be applied only on a job basis, which means, in some cases, employment for a few months. It would not bring a single minority worker into the area labor force. If you want to help these minority people get into these jobs, you have got to get them into the area labor force.

In this city there are thousands of building trades mechanics. They are here. The contractors know they are here. The unions know that they are here and there are some non-union people, of course. But they are here and they are available. And this is the establishment, if you want to put it that way. This is where you have got to get the minority workers, into that group, so that they will be available for employment when it comes along just the same as anyone else.

When we contemplate the record of this Administration in the civil rights field, the softening on voters' rights, delayed desegregation of the schools in the South, the attempt to put Strom Thurmond's baby on the Supreme Court, the cutting back of programs that could be helpful to the black community—it would seem that this attempt to use the building trades as a whipping boy could be designed to give the Nixon Administration a few brownie points to offset their shortcomings in the civil rights area as a whole.

There is a rather strange contrast in the attitude of the Secretary of Labor as expressed in an interview just about three days ago. He pointed with pride to the increased minority employment in the three big textile giants in the Carolinas—J. P. Stevens, Burlington and Dan River Mills.

And they, of course, they have no Philadelphia plan for them. They have what they call a little persuasion. They got a promise that they would try to do something. So the report came in. In six months, minority employment in the mills of these groups—maybe 40 or 50 but controlled by these three companies—had risen nine-tenths of 1 percent, reaching an overall ratio as of Sept. 30 of 18.3 percent under the pressure of the Labor Dept.

Nobody would be ahead of them—no manufacturers, no industrial set up, not the auto workers or anyone else.

And what does that mean? That means that the building trades of this country have provided more jobs for more minority people at manual occupations at high wages than any other industry in this country.

Still, they try to make a whipping boy out of them because the percentage of the skilled trades is not as high as they would like to see it. Well, we would like to see it higher. And the unions in the skilled trades are doing what they can to make it higher.

But if they take the building trades and say, "oh, we don't want to talk about laborers; we don't want to talk about plasterers; we don't want to talk about bricklayers; we don't want to talk about anybody where the percentage is good. We only want to talk about those fellows like the plumber and the iron worker."

Well, why not try that on Mr. J. P. Stevens? Why not try that on Dan River Mills? And Burlington Industries? Why not break them down and find out how many white faces are at the top and how many black faces are at the top—among the skilled mechanics and the supervisory help.

No, this would not fit in with the "southern strategy," I am afraid.

WE WELCOME in the AFL-CIO any plan that will increase the number of minority group people in the highly skilled trades. We could use them. We need them. The Philadelphia plan, with its individual contract basis, will make no contribution whatsoever toward that end because it is quite possible for a contractor to fully comply with its commitments without bringing a single new employe into the area-wide job pool.

So I can say to you we don't like this plan. We feel it is political in nature. We feel that it was set forth on the basis of very poor information. We are quite sure that it served its purpose when it got the Madison Avenue publicity job that was done on it. We, of course, will have to watch it and see how it goes. We won't get in its way. We know it will fall of its own dead weight.

In the meantime, we expect to move forward on the plan that we have. We make no apology for our attitude and our work in this field. We make no attempt to deny that there was discrimination in unions—lots of unions in this country; that the trade union movement in this country really is a picture of the whole country. We have southern members. We have members with all sorts of prejudices, not just prejudice against the color of a person's skin. And we have unions that have lived in the fear of unemployment; fear of short work all their lives.

Those unions today have plenty of members in the minority groups. They are training them, training more and they are going to continue to do this . . . we are going to push forward on the plans that we have to bring new apprentices into this field, to upgrade those who are already working at the trade. . . . And we are going to try and upgrade those who have some knowledge and have had some experience and see if we can't bring them in as journeymen.

We are going to push forward with that program and we will just keep a wary eye on the Philadelphia plan.

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE WORD "ECOLOGY," meaning the relationship between man and his environment, used to be a pretty fancy one but is now quite commonplace. It appears in many news stories that warn against man's destruction of the very earth on which he lives and the horrible toll of pollution on his health and living conditions.

So aware have many Americans become of these warnings that headlines are daily appearing telling of the things that are likely to happen to us if we don't stop plundering and wasting our national resources, polluting our environment and the steps that we ought to take if we are to survive for very much longer.

On top of all this has come greater awareness in Congress of the water and air pollution crimes that daily are being committed in the United States. As a result we have the Clean Water Restoration Bill of 1965 and the Clean Air Act of 1967 and numerous eloquent and convincing speeches in the Congressional Record about the evils of pollution.

All this should convince us that we are on our way to solving one of the most important problems of our times.

But, are we?

Experts in the field are far from convinced that we are.

They reason that we are not making substantial progress and that, in fact, there is still a slow, but continuing, deterioration of our environment.

Their reasoning is based on the fact that our legislation, progressive though it may be, does not go far enough, does not provide proper nationwide or statewide standards, does not provide adequate enforcement and that to compound these weaknesses does not produce sufficient funds to meet the urgency of the job that is needed.

Take the Clean Water Restoration Act of 1965. Originally, it was to have been funded at a rate of $1 billion for fiscal 1970 to aid cities to set up sewage disposal plants. Yet both the Johnson and later the Nixon Administrations asked for only $214 million.

"The Crusade for Clean Water," set up by organized labor and similar minded organizations persuaded Congress to appropriate $800 million, but there is no guarantee that Pres. Nixon will spend it all. Actually, it has been estimated that American cities need $5 billion a year to do the job right.

In addition, 1970 is the last year for which Congress has funds for implementation of the act. A new intense battle for renewed authorization is the prospect for this year.

THE CLEAN AIR ACT of 1967 is a measure that was supposed to clean up the air we breathe. Although cleaning up air pollution is not as costly to the government as cleaning up dirty water, less than $100 million has been appropriated, which is far from enough. Moreover, the act will terminate before June 30 of this year and will have to be extended. Another battle can be expected.

Now in conference in Congress is an oil pollution bill designed to prevent, among other things, the kind of oil spillage that brought disaster to beaches at Santa Barbara, Calif., and that frequently hits other beaches as careless or indifferent captains clean tankers at sea or dump bilge water without regard for what it will do to bird or fish life.

What is largely at stake is the willingness of Congress really to face up to the urgent demands of pollution control and cure, the willingness of states and local communities to do their share in improving conditions, not merely holding the line, and the determination of the Administration to do more than make eloquent promises of better days ahead.

Perhaps, even more important, is the willingness of American industry to face up to the fact that it is the prime contributor to the degredation of our environment, to spend the money needed to clean up its own dirt and to support congressional legislation that is adequate to do the job in areas where industry cannot.

Finally, on the personal level, there is the willingness of millions of Americans to forego throwing their beer cans out of car windows or leaving picnic grounds looking like the local dump.

'Vital Human Needs' at Stake In Congress-Nixon Showdown

CONGRESS WILL NOT be sidetracked from its drive to meet "really vital human needs" by threats of presidential vetoes or other attempts to clamp down on federal expenditures, organized labor's chief legislative director said.

That issue "will be joined—literally—on the opening day of Congress" when the Senate takes up the Labor-HEW appropriations bill "under the threat of veto by the President," said Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation.

The Senate won't "back down," he predicted, saying it will "pass the bill in exactly the same form that it passed the House in late December." The two-thirds majority of both houses needed to override a veto "can be found," Biemiller said. He was interviewed on the AFL-CIO produced radio program, Labor News Conference.

Biemiller said there may be "some slashes in the military budget and possibly the space budget" this year. "There is still a lot of fat" in those budgets, he noted, "particularly in Pentagon funds," and "there could also be very considerable savings" in research and development expenditures.

"WE WELCOME those savings and hope they will be translated into meeting social and economic needs" here in the United States, he asserted.

Biemiller, a former two-term congressman from Milwaukee, said that key AFL-CIO aims in Congress this year include improvement of social security protection for widows, the Hill-Burton Hospital Act and the welfare system.

VETO THREATS or other attempts to clamp down on federal expenditures won't sidetrack Congress from its drive to meet "really vital human needs," AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, center, declared on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were William Eaton, left, of the Chicago Daily News and Kenneth Crawford of Newsweek magazine. The program is broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on Mutual radio.

BRONZE PLAQUE dedicated at Temple University commemorates the historic International Labor Conference in 1944 which led to the adoption of ILO's Declaration of Philadelphia. From left are AFL-CIO Vice Presidents Lee W. Minton and Jacob S. Potofsky, ILO Sec.-Gen. David A. Morse, Deputy Under Sec. of Labor George H. Hildebrand and U.S. employer delegates to the ILO Edwin P. Neilan and George Bucher.

Historic ILO Doctrine Marked in Philadelphia

Philadelphia—In 1944 the International Labor Organization convened in Temple University's Mitten Hall to adopt the far-reaching Declaration of Philadelphia.

Today, a plaque presented recently by the AFL-CIO commemorates the site of the historic meeting. The plaque is the result of a proposal adopted last May at the conclusion of the International Conference on Human Rights, Human Resources and Social Progress, which also convened at the university during the 50th anniversary of the founding of the ILO.

University Pres. Paul R. Anderson noted in an address at the unveiling of the plaque that the Declaration of Philadelphia is totally relevant to today's problems.

The declaration reads in part that the ILO recognizes a solemn obligation to further programs that will achieve:

"Full employment and the raising of standards of living . . . policies in regard to wages and earnings, hours and other conditions of work calculated to ensure a just share of the fruits of progress to all . . . the effective recognition of the right of collective bargaining. . . ."

The declaration further calls for:

"The extension of social security measures to provide a basic income to all in need of such protection and comprehensive medical care.

"Adequate protection for the life and health of workers in all occupations.

"Provision for child welfare and maternity protection.

"The provision of adequate nutrition, housing and facilities for recreation and culture.

"The assurance of equality of education and vocational opportunity."

The declaration continues to express the timeless truths, Anderson added.

"However, its timeliness is due also to the regrettable lag between humanity's advanced insights and its all too recalcitrant resolve to act on them," he lamented.

Among dignitaries present for the unveiling was Dir.-Gen. David A. Morse of the ILO, who later discussed his experiences in accepting the Nobel Peace Prize for the ILO in Oslo, Norway.

AFL-CIO Vice Presidents Jacob S. Potofsky and Lee W. Minton represented the federation.

The plaque reads:

"On this site at Temple University there was convened the 26th session of the International Labor Conference which adopted on May 10, 1944, the Declaration of Philadelphia setting forth the principles of social justice that alone can safeguard lasting peace."

It also notes the 50th anniversary of the ILO and the awarding of the Nobel prize.

Air Line Pilots Fill Public Relations Post

Francis E. Martineau has been named director of public relations for the Air Line Pilots, the union announced. He has been serving as executive director of a joint management-ALPA safety foundation. ALPA Pres. Charles H. Ruby said that Capt. Harry H. McKee, acting public relations director since the death of Edward Modes, will continue as the union's coordinator of field activities in the public relations department.

Air Line Union Talks Stalled With National

Chicago — Air Line Employes have voted by an 8-1 ratio to strike National Airlines Jan. 30 unless the big air carrier begins bargaining in good faith on a contract for 3,500 station agents, ticket and reservations agents and clerical workers.

The legal path to a strike was cleared Dec. 30 when the National Mediation Board withdrew a proffer of arbitration. After the strike authorization vote the board called an emergency meeting of both sides but the strike deadline still stands, under the Railway Labor Act.

National also is engaged in a labor dispute with the Machinists. Management locked out 1,000 ground service crews Jan. 21, 1969, and has refused to reinstate them in spite of an order by the 5th U.S. Court of Appeals, New Orleans.

Its plans for Miami-London flights have been delayed by the refusal of British airline unions to handle National flights into London.

Unemployment Rate Holds:

Stalled Job Growth Signals Showdown

Signs of a slowdown in the nation's economy were apparent in December even though the overall unemployment rate remained unchanged at 3.4 percent, the Labor Dept. reported.

A "year in review" analysis, released by the Bureau of Labor Statistics along with its monthly report, also brought into focus a lag that began in mid-1968. (Story, Page 1.)

The monthly report revealed that non-farm payroll employment in December totaled about 70.6 million seasonally adjusted, a decrease of about 14,000 from November.

Modest job gains in state and local government (40,000) and services (25,000) were offset by declines in trade (40,000), construction (15,000) and manufacturing (30,000).

It was the fourth successive monthly drop in factory employment and most of the decrease, as it has been in recent months, was in the vital durable goods industries.

After allowance for strikes, BLS said, payroll employment rose by only 375,000 in the second half of 1969, compared with a 1.5 million increase during the first half of the year.

At Standstill

"Since October, payroll employment has been at a virtual standstill," the bureau observed.

The December report also showed a continued drag in the workweek and earnings, which the Labor Dept. has in the past cited as evidence of an economic slowdown.

The seasonally adjusted average workweek for rank-and-file workers was down one-tenth of an hour to 37.5 hours. Since September the workweek has fallen by three-tenths of an hour. It is at its lowest level since the government started keeping such statistics in 1964.

The average workweek in manufacturing rose by one-tenth of an hour to 40.6 hours seasonally adjusted but the figure still remained below what it was earlier in 1969, BLS said.

Overtime hours in manufacturing dropped one-tenth of an hour to 3.4 hours. With the exception of April 1968 when work hours were abbreviated by civil disturbances, factory overtime was at lowest level in two years.

Harold Goldstein, assistant BLS commissioner, noted that all of the decline in factory overtime occurred in the durable goods sector. Since September, overtime in durables has dropped by a full half-hour.

Average hourly earnings for rank-and-file workers were down 1 cent from November to $3.11, after climbing by 1 cent between October and November. Average weekly earnings rose slightly to $117.25 in December due mainly to the slightly longer workweek in manufacturing.

Although the overall jobless rate was the same as in November, the BLS report pointed to increases in several key rates for individual groups.

The rate for blue-collar workers edged up one-tenth of 1 percent to 4.3 percent. This rate was up seven-tenths of 1 percent from December 1968.

Higher Rate

BLS also reported that the jobless rate for non-farm laborers—the unskilled category among blue-collar workers—rose by two-tenths of 1 percent to 7.2 percent in December, 1.1 percent higher than the same month in 1968.

In manufacturing, the jobless rate was 3.7 percent last month, down one-tenth of 1 percent from November but still nine-tenths of 1 percent above December 1968.

The unemployment rate for teenagers (11.9 percent) was up three-tenths of 1 percent from November. On the other hand, the rate for Negro workers (5.5 percent) was down by seven-tenths of 1 percent.

Jobless rates for adult men (2.2 percent), adult women (3.4 percent) and white workers (3.2 percent) were virtually unchanged over the month.

The civilian labor force was 81.5 million seasonally adjusted in December, up about 250,000 from November and 600,000 over the year.

'69 Employment Pickup Falters After Hefty Surge in First Half

Unemployment rates in 1969 for adult men (2.2 percent) and adult women (3.7 percent) were virtually unchanged from 1968. The high jobless rate for teenagers improved slightly, dropping from 12.7 to 12.2 percent.

Although the non-white unemployment rate dropped more sharply than that for whites in 1969, it remained more than double the white rate, as it has been for recent years.

Slight Decline

The non-white rate declined from 6.7 percent in 1968 to 6.4 percent in 1969, while the white rate edged down insignificantly from 3.2 to 3.1 percent.

Unemployment averaged about 2.8 million for the year, the same as in 1968. In both years the total broke down about the same—1 million adult men, 1 million adult women, and 850,000 teenagers.

The number of persons unemployed for 15 weeks or longer fell by 35,000 in 1969 to 375,000. The average duration of joblessness for those out of work dropped from 8.5 to 7.9 weeks.

Total employment averaged about 77.9 million last year, about 2 million more than in 1968, although as the Labor Dept. pointed out, most of the gain occurred in the first half of the year.

The increase exceeded that of 1968 and 1967 but about matched growth achieved in 1966 and 1965, BLS said.

Harold Goldstein, assistant BLS commissioner, pointed out that adult women workers accounted for 1.1 million of the 2 million increase in jobs even though they make up only about a third of the labor force. Adult men accounted for 530,000 of the increase and teenagers about 340,000.

Non-farm payroll employment averaged 70.1 million in 1969, an increase of about 2.3 million over the previous year. The increase was slightly above the gains of 1968 and 1967 but nearly a million less than in 1966.

Growth Areas

All major industry divisions showed employment growth, but services, trade and government accounted for most of the total advance in keeping with a trend of recent years.

Manufacturing jobs increased by about 350,000 in 1969 to an average of 20.1 million for the year. Although the increase was greater than 1968's, it was below the average 485,000 annual increase for 1961-1968.

In the case of payroll employment, the report also showed most of the gain occurred in the first half of the year. It cited a 140,000 year-to-year gain in construction, "all of which occurred in the first half of 1969."

The average workweek for rank-and-file production workers declined for the fourth consecutive year, edging down one-tenth of 1 hour in 1969 to 37.7 hours.

Earnings Up

Gross weekly earnings for these workers averaged $114.60 for the year, up $6.90 from 1968. The gain was attributed entirely to a rise of 19 cents in average hourly earnings.

The civilian labor force averaged 80.7 million for a pickup of 2 million over the 1968 average, the largest annual increase since 1947.

However, the Labor Dept. said that "the bulk of the increase occurred early in the year, when tight labor market conditions and favorable employment opportunities drew a large number of workers into the labor force."

Noting that three-fourths of the labor force advance took place among women and teenagers, the department said that the increase for adult males—about 500,000—"represented their smallest proportion of overall labor force growth since 1966 when there was a decline in the civilian labor force."

Meany Hails King For Aid to Labor

The late Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., had a "fundamental belief in the common cause of the civil rights and labor movements," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said.

In a birthday tribute to the slain leader, Meany recalled King's "eloquent" statement of this principle to the 1961 AFL-CIO convention and stressed that King was in Memphis "to help support AFL-CIO members on strike for human dignity" when he was shot.

King, along with "our mutual great friend," A. Philip Randolph, demonstrated that "when civil rights groups and organized labor work together in a non-violent way for human betterment, both win—and America wins."

Philadelphia Plan Assailed As Masking Rights Retreat

job that was done on it." In actual practice, he said, the plan "will fall of its own dead weight."

"Perhaps the greatest drawback to the plan," he said, "is that it diverts attention from the real solid task of training and qualifying minority workers for a permanent place in the ranks of skilled workers, available and qualified for employment on all of the construction work in an area, not just the federally-financed work."

Such a solution is offered, Meany said, by the Apprenticeship Outreach program inaugurated by the AFL-CIO and its affiliates two and one-half years ago. In contrast to Outreach, he said, the Philadelphia plan has these shortcomings:

- The plan applies only to construction work and then on a job basis, which could mean employment for only a few months, while making no provision for getting minority-group members into permanent places in the area work force.
- A contractor could comply with the Philadelphia plan by transfering workers from private jobs to government jobs, without bringing any new workers into the work force at all.
- A "good-faith" effort is all that is needed for compliance, and a contractor could dismiss the responsibility with "one phone call to some source."

"The only sound method to bring minority representatives into the skilled construction trades is the comprehensive program outlined by the Building Trades and backed up in every way by the AFL-CIO," Meany said. "Even Sec. Shultz, after singing the praises of this [Philadelphia] plan, recognized its limitations just a few days ago when he strongly endorsed what he called an area-wide, multi-employer program.

"This is what we have. This is what Outreach is. But it was started under a previous Administration. It started under a different Secretary of Labor, and of course, it doesn't have the attraction of being something that can be attributed to this Administration," Meany observed causticly.

"And when we contemplate the record of this Administration in the civil rights field—the softening on voters' rights, delayed desegregation of the schools in the South, the attempt to put Strom Thurmond's baby on the Supreme Court, the cutting back of programs that could be helpful in the black community—it would seem that this attempt to use the Building Trades as a whipping boy could be designed to give the Nixon Administration a few Brownie points to offset their shortcomings in the civil rights area as a whole."

Recession, Inflation At the Same Time?

The Nixon Administration's anti-inflation policy isn't working because the key problem is "profit inflation," not catch-up wages, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said.

In answer to a question at the National Press Club, he warned that the Administration policy could bring about "a very strange phenomenon—a recession and inflation at the same time."

While "that's going to take a lot of doing," Meany observed, "it looks like Nixon may be able to do it."

Meany also contrasted the Administration's attitude toward the Building Trades with its approach to three big textile firms in the Carolinas—J. P. Stevens, Burlington and Dan River Mills. He said Shultz had pointed with pride to a six-month report that minority employment in those mills had risen nine-tenths of 1 percent, reach an overall ratio as of Sept. 30 of 18.3 percent under the pressure of the Labor Dept. "Big Deal. They came up to 18.3 percent in their employment of minority groups. This could be compared to the employment in Philadelphia of the Building Trades of over 30 percent minority-group members."

But the 30 percent minority-group involvement in the trades in Philadelphia is called meaningless, Meany noted, because it includes the membership in the "trowel trades," while the Philadelphia plan is "directed especially to iron workers, plumbers, carpenters, steam fitters, sheet metal workers and electricians."

Meany said the charge is often made that blacks are not admitted to the highly-skilled trades but only to the low-wage, dirty jobs. "First of all," he went on, "there are no low-wage jobs in the building trades. Lower paid at $7 an hour is not too much lower paid. And as far as dirty jobs are concerned, there are no clean jobs. They are all dirty."

Meany called for a similar breakdown by skills on employes of the southern textile mills. "Well, this isn't done," he said. "They don't break down the figures. They take the whole thing en masse and if you took the whole thing en masse, the Building Trades would be No. 1 in this area in the country.

"Nobody would be ahead of them—no manufacturers, no industrial set-up, not the auto workers or anyone else.

"Still, they try to make a whipping boy out of them because the percentage of the skilled trades is not as high as they would like to see," Meany said. "We would like to see it higher and the unions in skilled trades are doing what they can to make it higher."

And if breakdowns according to skills are going to be made, Meany said he'd like to see the same done for the textile mills, but "this would not fit in with the southern strategy" of the Administration.

Meany also refuted the figures of minority-group membership in the Philadelphia Building Trades on which the Philadelphia plan was based. The Labor Dept. set the figures for the Iron Workers at 12 minority-group members out of 850, or 1.4 percent.

"Our official union records show a different picture," Meany said. "We show that there is not one Iron Worker local union in Philadelphia, there are five. The total membership is not 850, it is 3,575, of whom 690, or 19 percent, are from minority groups."

He also challenged the statement that 302 Iron Workers from minority groups were available for union membership in Philadelphia. Meany said the union president John H. Lyons, wrote to Shultz asking for names and addresses and pledging that these persons would be given every assistance in securing employment.

Shultz responded that it would be impractical to provide the names, Meany said, "because of the nature of the information-gathering techniques used by the Dept. of Labor." Meany said it therefore "seems reasonable to suggest that the Secretary of Labor might look over the fact-finding process that prevails in his department."

He said the labor movement had no apology to make for its commitment to civil rights and the stories which said the Philadelphia plan was splitting labor away from civil rights groups were not true. Meany traced labor's close ties with civil rights groups in various legislative programs, including its 1963 insistence on getting a fair employment practices clause into civil rights legislation at a time when the Kennedy Administration gave up on being able to get it passed.

The clause was included in the 1964 Civil Rights Act, Meany said, but the power to issue cease-and-desist orders to enforce it was stricken from the bill. That fight is still going on, he said.

"At the present time, the AFL-CIO and all of the civil rights groups are fighting side by side to re-establish these powers under the bill and the Nixon Administration, including the Secretary of Labor and the Assistant Secretary of Labor, are opposing these powers."

In contrast to the publicity surrounding the Philadelphia plan, Meany said the Outreach Program is progressing steadily, with minority-group participation in apprenticeship up to 9.4 percent from the 2.5 percent of 1960.

VOTER REGISTRATION efforts of organized labor for the 1970 elections are discussed by LaRoy H. Purdy, assistant to the president of the Communications Workers, and national COPE Dir. Al Barkan, right. Purdy is on loan to the AFL-CIO to direct the COPE registration campaign. He held the same post in 1968 when 4.5 million persons were added to voter rolls.

Chicago Minorities Pact Hailed as Key to Jobs

AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

Meany noted that the agreement is "substantially in line" with the policy set by the building trades unions at the department's recent convention "and with the continuing policy of the AFL-CIO."

He promised the continuing cooperation of the federation's Dept. of Civil Rights in making the program work.

"The Chicago agreement may well serve as a guide to Building Trades councils in other areas as they implement your convention policy," Meany added.

He suggested that the department send copies of the agreement to its affiliated councils "for their study and consideration, for it is a worthy extension of Operation Outreach, which has already proven itself."

Six Months of Negotiations

In Chicago, delegates to the Building Trades Council unanimously endorsed the plan. Its key points had been proposed earlier by the unions and employers, but rejected last fall by the community action coalition. With help from Mayor Richard J. Daley, talks were resumed and agreement reached, ending six months of sometimes bitter confrontation.

Robert McGlotten of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights helped bridge the gap between the black community groups and the construction industry unions and employers.

With the proviso "if general business conditions permit," the parties to the agreement "hope to achieve . . . over a period of not more than five years, a level of minority group employes proportionate to their percent in the community at large."

It stresses that neither skill standards nor collective bargaining provisions will be discarded or diluted in working toward greater minority group employment.

The first-stage target of 4,000 jobs contemplates:

- Recruitment of 1,000 workers, already possessing the skills of their trade, who will be accepted into the unions as full journeymen.

Last September, before the community action coalition agreed to the program, a construction industry labor-management committee opened a recruitment center for journeymen in the black community.

- Workers with at least two years of experience in a craft but with less than journeymen skills will work a 30-day probationary period and then be slotted into the appropriate step of the apprenticeship scale, as determined by the Joint Apprenticeship Committee for the craft. Alternatively, a special training program will be set up.
- Inexperienced young men from 17 to 23 would be eligible for a one-month pre-apprenticeship training program, similar to the Outreach program, to prepare them for apprenticeship tests.
- An on-the-job training program in industries where this is practicable for persons who do not wish to take the apprenticeship test or who fail the test.

The community groups would be expected to recruit applicants for the various programs—a source of difficulty in earlier efforts to increase minority membership in the skilled crafts. Applicants would have had to have been residents of Chicago for over one year.

An administrative committee for the program will include two union representatives, two employer representatives, two coalition representatives and the mayor or his designated representative. Each craft would have its own operations committee of four coalition representatives (who would be expected to be knowledgeable in the craft or industry involved) and two representatives each from the union and employers.

Fund-Raising Operations

Any action by the administrative committee would require approval by at least five of the seven members. The committee's functions would include fund-raising to finance the programs developed by the operations committees, including recruitment, counseling and staffing.

Thomas J. Murray, president of the Chicago Building Trades Council, termed the agreement "historic." He added:

"We are confident that if economic conditions permit, we will move ahead rapidly in bringing more minority youth into our industry. We will do this without diluting our standards, conditions and agreements."

Gerard Rancourt Dies, Canadian Labor Official

Montreal—Gerard Rancourt, 52, executive vice president of the Canadian Labor Congress, died here Jan. 12 following a lengthy illness. He had been elected to the CLC office in May 1968 and his last official duty was to represent the CLC as the fraternal delegate to the recent AFL-CIO convention.

His union activities dated from 1947 when he became an organizer for the Clothing Workers. Prior to that he had served in World War II with the Royal Canadian Air Force and as an organizer in the political field for the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation.

He later joined the staff of the Textile Workers Union of America and was active in organizing throughout Quebec, becoming secretary of the Montreal Labor Council and the Quebec Federation of Labor.

CLC Pres. Donald MacDonald said in tribute: "He made a great contribution to the Canadian labor movement at both the national and international levels. Few individuals have been so well equipped to serve in developing understanding and cooperation between the trade union members in Quebec and those in other parts of the country."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland sent messages of condolences to Mrs. Rancourt and to Sec.-Treas. William Dodge of the CLC.

Meany and Kirkland noted that Rancourt "made a valued contribution" as a fraternal delegate to the AFL-CIO convention. "He was a warm and fine man and we shall miss his friendship," they added.

Kirkland Tells Seminar:

Need for Mediators Likely to Increase

Orlando, Fla.—The changing nature of the workforce isn't likely to put professional mediators out of work during the decade ahead, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland assured the staff of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

In fact, there may be more need than ever for the practical, "unpolarized" middleman who is armed with "a thick hide." But the mediator's concern, Kirkland suggested, will more than ever be directed to the still growing areas of public employment and other service fields.

Others From AFL-CIO

Kirkland was keynote speaker for labor at a week-long seminar for the federal mediation staff. AFL-CIO Organizing Dir. William L. Kircher also addressed the group and other sessions were scheduled to hear Pres. John F. Griner of the Government Employes and AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger, along with business and government officials.

During the 1970s, Kirkland predicted, "the proportion of the workforce that makes its living from private, profit-making industries will continue to decline."

The non-military, private sector of the economy actually stopped producing new jobs—except for replacement turnover—some 20 years ago, Kirkland noted. And "in large areas of manufacturing, mining and transportation, private industry has been engaged instead in the process of destroying jobs—particularly blue-collar jobs."

Within the shrinking or static sectors of private industry, he observed, the proportion of supervisory, professional, technical and white collar jobs is rising at the expense of production and maintenance workers.

"In terms of employment, the growth industries of today and tomorrow will be in the public, nonprofit and service sectors," Kirkland stressed.

That's the growth sector in union organizing as well, he said, and during the 1970s will be where the action is "in terms of organization, collective bargaining and disputes."

"Money in the pay envelope" will continue to be the top issue in bargaining, Kirkland predicted. But increased leisure time will "assume a growing importance."

The workyear has already been reduced by more paid vacations and holidays and "this broad trend will continue," Kirkland suggested. He added, "It may well translate itself into a broad new movement to reduce the workday or workweek and give impetus to a drive for the four-day week."

Unions Will Adapt

Within the trade union movement itself, Kirkland saw continued adaptation to the "continuing concentration of industrial power and the growth of conglomerate and multinational corporations."

The trade union response, he said, is likely to include mergers, broadening of jurisdictions and coordination of bargaining and other functions among unions.

In all phases of American life, he suggested, there is need for the special talents and skills of the mediator.

"The greater the tendency towards polarization in our society—the more energetic the militancy, the more rabid the commitment, the harder the position and the less negotiable the demands—the more crucial becomes the presence of . . . the practical person, unintoxicated with sacred principles and zealous only for a resolution of the immediate issue at hand."

It may be "unfashionable," Kirkland noted, but "most of our ends must be gained, sooner or later, by the process of negotiation, compromise and agreement."

CIVIL RIGHTS ISSUES affecting labor and the nation are covered during a four-day seminar at the Labor Studies Center for the federation's Executive Council and members of its civil rights committee. Addressing this session is Prof. F. Ray Marshall of the University of Texas. Other lecturers included Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman, Bayard Rustin of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, Rep. Henry B. Gonzalez (D-Tex.) and key officials in labor and government.

States Fail to Give Needed Boosts In Jobless Benefits and Injury Pay

Changes made by 1969 state legislatures in unemployment insurance and workmen's compensation laws have made little progress toward achieving benefit standards urged by every President since Dwight D. Eisenhower.

Failure of the states to advance significantly in either area is revealed in articles in the January issue of the Monthly Labor Review, the publication of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The articles are based on surveys conducted by Joseph A. Hickey, an unemployment insurance specialist in the Manpower Administration, and Florence C. Johnson, a labor standards adviser with the Office of Employment Standards.

The standards, most recently urged by the Nixon Administration, call for states to pay benefits for both unemployment and on-the-job injuries that are equal to at least two-thirds of the average gross weekly wages of all covered employes in the state.

The AFL-CIO has long maintained that these and other standards for unemployment insurance and workmen's compensation must be established under federal law if workers are to be adequately protected.

Hickey's survey revealed that despite changes enacted by 41 state legislatures in 1969 there are now only three states that pay maximum jobless benefits meeting the two-thirds standard: Connecticut, Hawaii and Rhode Island.

The survey shows, in fact, that only 21 states pay maximum benefits that meet a standard of one-half the average gross weekly wages of covered employes. Only two additional states came into that category as the result of 1969 legislation.

In other areas, Hickey reported that 17 states increased maximum jobless benefits; nine states made changes in disqualification sections of their laws; and many states made amendments related to qualifying, financing and administration.

He noted that there was "little significant activity" by the states to bring additional workers under unemployment insurance. About 17 million workers are not covered by jobless benefits.

After comparing current state unemployment insurance laws with those existing at the end of 1967, Hickey concluded "that improvements have not kept pace with changing economic conditions."

In her article, Mrs. Johnson pointed out that by the end of 1969 only six states—Arizona, Connecticut, Hawaii, Maine, Massachusetts and Rhode Island—met the two-thirds standard for workmen's compensation benefits.

"In addition to providing adequate cash benefits," Mrs. Johnson wrote, "an effective workmen's compensation law should limit the waiting period between the time of injury and the payment of benefits to three days or less, with retroactive payment to date of injury if disability continues for two weeks."

Prior to 1969, she said, only seven states met this standard—Connecticut, Delaware, Hawaii, Oregon, Rhode Island, Wisconsin, and Wyoming—and only Minnesota and Montana joined the list in 1969.

The most significant changes in workmen's compensation laws, Mrs. Johnson said, included improvements in occupational disease coverage and Wyoming's extension of its law to cover such diseases. It had been the only state without such coverage.

Also, she noted that West Virginia, New Mexico and Ohio extended their laws to cover "black lung" disease among coal miners and that Nebraska, New Hampshire and New Mexico enacted new rehabilitation benefits for injured workers being retrained.

Strike Time Shows Sharp Drop for 1969

Strike man-days "declined substantially" in 1969 in comparison with the past two years, according to preliminary estimates of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Time lost because of work stoppages amounted to 23 one-hundredths of 1 percent of total working time compared with 28 one-hundredths of 1 percent in 1968 and 25 one-hundredths of 1 percent in 1967.

Although the number of new stoppages, 5,600, was a record high in 1969, the number of workers involved in strikes, 2.5 million, was about 100,000 less than those involved in work stoppages in 1968.

Also, BLS said, the 45 million man-days attributed to 1969 strikes was well below the 1968 decade-high of 49 million.

The largest strike in 1969, that of 150,000 workers against General Electric Co., was still in effect at the end of the year, BLS noted. Other large strikes affected petroleum refining (49,000 workers) and the bituminous coal industry (46,000 workers).

Defense Dept. Accused of Double Standard on Labor

Orlando, Fla.—AFL-CIO Organizing Dir. William L. Kircher accused the Defense Dept. of a double standard towards unions and collective bargaining.

When a union is strong enough to shut down production of an item the department needs, Kircher noted, Defense Dept. officials will "in a very friendly manner" ask the union for special relief in the name of "national security." And normally the union tries to cooperate.

But, Kircher told a staff seminar of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, the department takes a different attitude to a struggling union like the Farm Workers, whose strength lies in public support of a consumer boycott.

By vastly increasing its purchases of grapes since the boycott started, "the Defense Dept. has become a major adversary on the side against the workers' right to have a union."

The department's excuse, Kircher observed, is "that they just discovered that our men in the armed forces like grapes."

United Air Lines Pact Includes 40% Package

Chicago — The Air Line Employes signed a new three-year contract giving United Air Lines flight simulator operators a wage and benefit package of 40 percent over three years.

Pres. Victor J. Herbert said management agreed to a top monthly wage of $1,139, or $13,668 a year by 1972. Lead men will get an additional $50 a month to a new top of $14,268, he said. Other improvements include a ninth paid holiday, better vacations, a comprehensive dental plan and improved insurance and pension benefits.

The union bargains for more than 10,000 employes of nine major airlines. It is an affiliate of the Air Line Pilots.

Number of Poor Drops But Negro Families Lag

The number of poor persons and families in the United States declined in the 1960s but Negroes did not emerge from poverty as rapidly as whites, according to a study published by the Bureau of the Census.

It totaled the number of poor persons at 25.4 million in 1968, a drop of 14.1 million from 1959, and poor families at about 5 million in 1968, down 3.3 million from 1959.

The bureau defines the poor as those living on income that is less than poverty levels set for single persons and families of various sizes in cities and on farms.

Its formula for setting poverty levels was recently revised and updated to give added weight to changes in the cost of living. The poverty threshold for a non-farm family of four was $3,553 in 1968 and $2,973 in 1959; the corresponding figures for such a family on the farm were $3,020 in 1968 and $2,081 in 1959.

In enlarging on the picture of poverty in the nation, the study noted that Negro families made up about 27 percent of the total of poor families in 1968, while in 1959 they constituted about 22 percent of the total.

Also, the bureau pointed out, there was a 42 percent drop between 1959 and 1968 in the number of white families living in poverty, while the decline for poor Negro families was only 27 percent.

The study further showed that poor white families are not as deeply impoverished as poor Negro families:

In 1968, incomes received by poor white families were, on the average, $900 below the poverty line, whereas the average deficit for Negro families was about $1,250.

Senate Defies Veto Threat, Hikes School, Health Fund

DON'T BUY GE PRODUCTS, shoppers on Long Island are urged by members of unions in the Long Island AFL-CIO. The unionists carried signs and handbilled shoppers at the Walt Whitman and Green Acres shopping centers at Huntington and Valley Stream, N.Y. They said customer reaction at the two centers was generally sympathetic to labor's nationwide boycott of GE, which forced 150,000 employes to strike for an acceptable contract.

Showdown Due On Vote to Override

By David L. Perlman

Supporters of more money for education and health programs won a key vote in the Senate—74-17—and prepared for the showdown on overriding a presidential veto.

Despite the veto threat, a majority of Senate Republicans joined all Senate Democrats in passing the appropriations bill carrying $1.1 billion more than the President asked for aid to education and $200 million above his budget request for health programs.

Earlier, the House had approved the extra money by a 261-110 vote, also above the two-thirds majority that will be needed to override a veto.

Republican congressional leaders and White House lobbyists are using a "back the President" argument in an effort to convince a substantial number of GOP congressmen to switch sides on the veto vote.

Pres. Nixon is expected to veto the appropriations bill soon after it reaches his desk. The White House charged that it is too costly, "misdirected" and inflationary.

A strong coalition of education groups, including the AFL-CIO, has warned that schools across the nation will face a grave financial crisis without the money provided by the bill.

They answer the inflation argument by noting that Congress has already cut $5.6 billion from the President's budget request—more than four times the amount added for education and health.

The House will vote first on overriding the veto—on Jan. 29 according to a tentative timetable. If the veto is overridden there, the final showdown will be in the Senate.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, differences over language in an unrelated part of the appropriations bill had delayed sending the measure to the White House. However, the vote on approval of the money portion of the bill was firm and final.

Budget Curb Key to Nixon 70s Program

By Saul Miller

Pres. Nixon said the 1970s presented the challenge to create a "new America," but warned that it would have to come about only through balanced federal budgets.

The President told the 91st Congress in his first State of the Union address that he was still awaiting congressional action on "more than two-score" legislative proposals he sent up in 1969 and said he will offer a "dozen more major programs" in the current session.

But his only specifics in a generally philosophical statement of the Administration's position on the new decade and the approach of the nation's 200th birthday was a doubling in the upcoming budget of funds on law enforcement and a five-year $10 billion program to build modern municipal waste treatment plants "in every place in America where they are needed."

He said that in the areas of clean air, clean water, open spaces "I shall propose to Congress . . . the most comprehensive and costly program in this field ever in the nation's history."

The President singled out three areas of "urgent priorities" in his to-be-proposed legislative program: total reform of the welfare system, reform of all institutions of govern-

'More Must Be Done':

Meany Asks Boost In GE Strike Funds

By Eugene A. Kelly

GE strikers need more money, and they need it now, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in a letter to the officers of all national and international unions, state and city central bodies and directly affiliated local unions.

"The morale and fighting spirit of the strikers is wonderful," Meany reported. "During one of the most bitter winters in recent memory, the picket lines have remained solid and the strike will not be broken."

Now, as the walkout of 150,000 members of 14 unions headed into its fourth month, "the needs of the strikers grow more acute, so more must be done."

Speaking for the strikers and their families, the federation president said, "I want to warmly thank all who have given" to the AFL-CIO GE Strike Relief Fund.

He urged those unions that have not met the original quota of a donation of $1 per member to act quickly. He called on those unions that have surpassed their quota to "please try to help some more."

Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland previously transmitted checks totaling $2 million to the strikers, but the need is mounting, they said, as GE continues to resist settlement of union contract proposals and pickets huddle around stoves and shanties at plant gates in 135 U.S. cities.

Meanwhile negotiators for unions in the Coordinated Bargaining Committee, and management representatives met with Dir. J. Fred Counts of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service at frequent intervals in New York City.

Both sides agreed to Counts' request that they issue no public

Anthony J. DeAndrade, president of the Printing Pressmen and an AFL-CIO vice president, died unexpectedly Jan. 20 of an apparent heart seizure as he was returning from lunch to the union's Washington office. He was 73.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland said in messages of sympathy to the family and to IPPAU officers: "He was a great trade unionist and all of us who knew him share your sorrow."

Buying Power Of Workers Less in 1969

By Duane Emme

The buying power of rank-and-file workers' pay checks was less in 1969 than in 1968 even though take-home pay averaged nearly 5 percent more over the year, the Labor Dept. reported.

The reason for this, the Bureau of Labor Statistics said, was the biggest annual leap in the cost of living since the Korean War inflation in 1951.

A BLS analysis of what happened to prices and earnings over the year accompanied its monthly reports for December.

Key Economic Indicators Back Up Labor Warnings of Recession Risk

The government's latest economic reports document repeated labor warnings on the "dangerous direction of Pres. Nixon's economic policies," AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger declared.

Four key indicators showed the extent of the nation's economic slowdown, while another—the Consumer Price Index—told of a continuing rise in the cost of living.

Goldfinger, in examining the indicators and the further increase in the cost of living, said the reports prove that "unfortunately, the Administration's very tough squeeze on the American economy is continuing."

This squeeze, he said, "which includes tight money and the highest interest rates in 100 years spells further threats in 1970 to production and employment."

This economic picture underscored a recent remark by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany that the nation could be heading for "a recession and inflation at the same time."

The paradox is not without precedent, economists have pointed out. They recall that it occurred to some extent in the 1957-58 recession while Pres. Eisenhower was in the White House.

In summary, this was the content of various reports:

Painters Shift Fund Assets to Housing Trust

Pres. S. Frank Raftery of the Painters has announced that the union will soon begin allotting a fixed monthly percentage of the money that flows into its pension fund assets to the financing of new housing.

The allotment, to be determined by actuaries, will be made through the AFL-CIO Mortgage Investment Trust set up as a service to federation affiliates in investing pension, welfare and retirement funds in housing. All investments are placed exclusively in federally-insured or guaranteed mortgages.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, chairman of the trust's board, called the Painters' plan an important step toward helping make the trust "a national force in the financing of vitally-needed, federally-insured housing."

In announcing the union's plan, Raftery said, "We safely and easily can put our money to work in federally-insured mortgages and, simultaneously, create jobs for our members for years to come."

He expressed hope that unions not yet making use of the trust would do so since it offers "security, reasonable yield, social contribution and trade union self-interest, all in one package."

THE TREASURY DEPT.'S gold medal of merit was presented by Treasury Sec. David M. Kennedy to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany for leadership in helping expand the department's U.S. Savings Bond payroll plan. Meany spoke at an annual meeting of the Treasury's Industrial Payroll Committee in Washington.

Meany Renews Support For Bond Savings Plan

Labor is "proud of its association" with the U.S. Savings Bond payroll plan and will continue to devote its fullest efforts to expanding the program, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said.

At the same time, he pointed out, there must be "similar efforts" by businesses and the government if the plan is to be explained and extended to an increasing number of workers.

Meany spoke at the annual meeting of the U.S. Industrial Payroll Committee of the Dept. of Treasury where he was presented with the department's gold medal of merit for leadership in helping expand the Savings Bond program.

In making the presentation, Sec. of the Treasury David M. Kennedy said Meany's consistent support and leadership had helped to spread the plan to cover millions of workers in hundreds of industries.

An inscription accompanying the award praised Meany's "zeal" in backing Savings Bond purchases and encouraging the nation's workers to build personal security. "Both the labor community and the nation have benefited by his devoted service," it added.

Meany said labor has supported the Savings Bond payroll plan "from its very beginning" because it is the easiest, most convenient way of regularly saving money for most wage and salary workers.

Meany deplored the fact that at times during the past 20 years the interest rate on bonds lagged in comparison with rates on other investments, thus causing public interest in the purchase of the bonds to decline.

Noting that Congress recently raised the interest rate on the bonds from 4.25 to 5 percent to put them "at least within the range" of other rate returns on small investments, Meany said the job now is to revive public interest and involvement in the program.

For its part, he said, the AFL-CIO will strive to get all of its affiliated unions, state and city central bodies to assist in obtaining bond payroll deduction plans for all of their members, as well as distribute information on the advantages of buying bonds.

However, he continued, the business community must join the effort if the plans—which now cover only about 35 percent of workers in private employment—are to be extended to many additional employers.

"We of the AFL-CIO have an important stake in the program," Meany concluded. "Wage and salary workers are the major buyers of U.S. Savings Bonds. . . . I can assure you that we will do our part in helping to expand this program of investment in the future of America."

Health Cost Challenged At Consumer Assembly

American consumers aren't getting their money's worth for their health care dollar, Consumer Assembly '70 was told.

Nelson Cruikshank, president of the National Council of Senior Citizens, said at the three-day conference that the U.S. health care system does, however, do very well what it is designed to do: make money for the holders of medical degrees.

"The system operates largely as a profit-making industry," he stressed, calling it an antiquated, piecework set-up functioning in an era when a modern, comprehensive system is needed.

Cruikshank's remarks came during a panel discussion on "The Consumer's Stake in Health Services," moderated by Jacob Clayman, administrative director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. The conference was sponsored by the Consumer Federation of America.

"The consumer is at the mercy of today's inadequate health care system," Cruikshank said, because he cannot judge the quality of care he is getting.

It has been evident for more than a generation that prepaid group practice by doctors and other health professionals is far more efficient than the current fee-for-service health care system, Cruikshank noted, but only in recent years has this concept received serious consideration.

Meanwhile, it has become more and more obvious that the present system brutally excludes those most in need of services, he said.

Thomas G. Moore, Jr., executive director of the labor-backed California Council for Health Plan Alternatives, said that even though the consumer is spending more for health care, he is getting less. This is because the system is organized for practically every purpose except patient care, he added.

"In California, where organized labor spends approximately $750 million annually for health in negotiated benefits, we find we are bargaining every year for more and more money for health just to stay even," he said.

Moore predicted that a national health insurance program will be adopted within a few years.

"Health care is a right of all Americans. Congress has said so," he stressed.

The organization of the health industry will depend on consumer action at the community level, Moore said in declaring that "it is time for the rising consumer demand for more and better health services to become specific."

In other areas of consumer affairs, speaker after speaker at the assembly called on the 750 delegates to take up the challenge to spearhead a new "coalition of concern" in the decade ahead.

Consumers were urged to organize themselves politically in order to change the way economic decisions are made in the nation.

The conference was transformed into a special hearing of the consumer subcommittee of the Senate Commerce Committee with Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) as acting chairman.

Speakers asked Congress to add "truth-in-pricing" requirements to the Fair Packaging & Label Act of 1966.

Such a provision would require retailers to list the price per pound, pint or other appropriate unit of packaged groceries.

Mrs. Doris Behre, president of the Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, testified that a one-eighth ounce of chives sells in the supermarkets for 69 cents. At this rate, it would cost $88.32 a pound, she observed.

H. J. Henry Retires, Federation Staffer

Springfield, Ill. — Henry J. Henry, AFL-CIO staff representative in this area for 15 years, got a watch and the thanks of union members at a retirement party given him by the Sangamon County AFL-CIO. But Henry will stay in Springfield and continue helping those who need his services, he said in a farewell speech.

In Wake of 'Camille':

Insurance Abuses Hit Storm Victims

Biloxi, Miss.—Federal laws are needed to correct abuses by the insurance industry in the wake of widespread disasters like Hurricane Camille, the head of the Mississippi labor federation told a Senate subcommittee hearing on disaster relief.

Pres. Claude Ramsay of the State AFL-CIO, saying he spoke for more than 25,000 union members who live in the Coast counties hardest hit by the Aug. 18 hurricane, urged action by Congress to prevent mistreatment of storm victims—bungling by federal officials in serving those in need of help and sharp dealing by insurance claim adjusters who act "like vultures or scavengers."

"They descended on the stricken area in droves shortly after the hurricane hit," Ramsay told Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.) and other subcommittee members and staff.

"Their obvious motive was to settle claims as quick and cheap as possible."

It is "common knowledge" in Mississippi that thousands of home owners received nothing from many companies, though they had been paying insurance premiums for years, Ramsay related. He pinpointed the problem:

"The gimmick centers around whether your home was destroyed by wind or by water.

"The homeowner had to prove the wind got there first, otherwise his claim was disallowed."

Many disaster victims "lost all of their worldly possessions; thousands suffered severe property damage, and several lost their lives in the worst natural disaster ever to hit the continental United States," he testified.

Ramsay described the area as being "in a virtual state of ruin today. Outside of much debris having been cleared, the area is much the same as it was on the morning of Aug. 18."

Damage to homes, public buildings and stores will exceed $1 billion, Ramsay estimated. He said the Red Cross expects its spending for emergency relief—food, clothing, shelter—will reach $20 million when all reports are in.

Ramsay and other union officers spent full time with Red Cross disaster relief personnel for some two weeks. They met with labor leaders across the Gulf Coast, coordinating assistance to storm victims.

Several central bodies advertised extensively to tell union members where to go for help. Such teamwork "aided in the rehabilitation" of many sufferers, Ramsay said.

He called a report by the American Friends Service Committee and the Southern Regional Council on the federal response to the disaster "factual and true." The report cited "all sorts of bungling" by federal officials in dealing with victims of the disaster.

"In addition to this bungling," Ramsay said, "the insurance industry of the nation has created a situation that amounts to a national scandal."

He agreed there is "much room to improve the functions of the various federal agencies, and there is certainly need for federal legislation to deal with disasters of this kind in the future," especially as to insurance.

After the hurricane, Ramsay reported, the Mississippi State Insurance Commission allowed insurance firms a 50 percent premium increase in the hardest hit counties, a 30 percent boost in the next tier of counties, and 12 percent in northern Mississippi counties.

"The people of Mississippi are apparently powerless to prevent this gouging by the insurance industry and must look to Congress for relief," Ramsay declared.

Two Mississippi grand juries have conducted investigations into the insurance "scandal" and state legislators are drafting bills to be introduced, but Ramsay said "the fact remains that no state legislature is in a position to deal with the real problem." Needed to control abuses, he said, is regulation of insurance practices by a federal agency like the Interstate Commerce Commission.

He thanked the American Red Cross and labor organizations for their help toward rehabilitation. The Red Cross alone spent more than $16 million and the national AFL-CIO raised at least $1 million of this amount, he observed.

Two groups of municipalities and broadcasters raised more than $1.5 million by a "We Care" telethon from a Jackson station but most of the money is still in the bank, drawing interest, he reported.

Union Fine for Crossing Picket Line Ruled Valid

A $242 fine, imposed by a Communications Workers local union on a member who repeatedly crossed the picket line of a sister CWA local, was not unreasonable or unlawful, a National Labor Relations Board examiner ruled.

Examiner Herbert Silberman recommended that the NLRB dismiss a charge by the fined member that CWA Local 2100 in Baltimore was guilty of using "restraint and coercion" because a trial board, later sustained by the union members, voted to fine him more than the $190 gross wages he was paid for working behind the picket line.

The NLRB general counsel argued in pressing a complaint that the fine was 130 percent of the member's gross earnings, and therefore "unreasonably large." Its imposition, and the union's determination to file a civil suit to collect it, added up to a violation of the Taft-Hartley law, counsel claimed.

Silberman rejected the argument that it is unlawful for the union to impose a fine that is "punitive."

In making this argument, he said, the NLRB counsel overlooked the dictionary definition of the word fine and also misconstrued a Supreme Court ruling in the Allis-Chalmers case.

Silberman concluded: "I reject the suggestion . . . that any fine which exceeds by 25 percent the earnings of the member during the time he was engaged in the offense charged by the union automatically is deemed unreasonable regardless of the circumstances. . . . I find that the fine . . . has not been proved to have been unreasonable in amount."

The offense the member was accused of was crossing a picket line of CWA Local 2390, which represents telephone equipment installers.

Meany Asks Boost In GE Strike Funds

statements and print no ads tending to widen the gap between parties to the strike, which started Oct. 27.

The unions expressed the hope that the news "blackout" would have better results than a December blackout which produced a second GE contract offer not much more acceptable than its first offer last August.

The Wall Street Journal reported that the GE strike is "beginning to have a sharp nationwide impact, some of whose effects may linger for years."

A large Chicago GE appliance dealer told the paper "we're literally out of business, and have been for the past month or six weeks." Carrier Corp., a GE supplier, reported it laid off 350 workers at its Syracuse, N. Y., air conditioner plant. Retailers told of a shortage of repair parts.

And a union picket in Schenectady, N. Y., where 13,000 GE workers are on strike, told the New York Daily News that when the strike ends, "we won't be able to look at another hamburger."

In the same city, the wife of striker Floyd Schaefer wrote a letter to GE Board Chairman Fred J. Borch saying her husband's investment in GE—his life—is returning fewer and fewer benefits every year.

In other GE strike developments:

- GE asked the Supreme Court to review an Appeals Court decision of last October that GE's "one offer" approach is not lawful because it makes good-faith bargaining impossible. The system, called Boulwarism after GE ex-official Lemuel Boulware, has produced the current strike, and others before it, unions say.
- Increases in the cost-of-living index for November and December would have reduced GE's proposed wage offer by 4 cents an hour, a union spokesman noted.

If the trend continues, the entire GE wage proposal would have been wiped out in one year, he said.

- GE was ordered by an arbitrator to pay $100,000 to several hundred members of Local 320 of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers in Syracuse, N. Y., for locking them out in its cathode ray tube department in 1965.

IUE said the ruling points up the need for a better grievance procedure in GE contracts.

Schenectady strikers, who tired of reading GE ads and Chamber of Commerce petitions about labor "bosses" keeping workers out on strike against their will, left the picket lines to march downtown to CofC headquarters.

The pickets, 5,000 strong, stood in the bitter cold chanting "Up the Ante." They sang a few union songs and, satisfied that company "bosses" had time to get the message, went back to picket stations at GE's main plant.

The news wire that links offices of the striking unions reported Schenectady area strikers have started a campaign to cancel subscriptions to the daily Union Star. The paper called on Pres. Nixon in a front page editorial to invoke the Taft-Hartley Act against the strikers.

In Chicago, students from eight area colleges formed the Youth Committee to Support the GE strikers. They distributed leaflets to downtown shoppers and took a supply of lapel buttons to distribute on campus for those who donate $1 for the strikers.

Labor Dept. Establishes Trade Adjustment Post

Herbert N. Blackman has been named Deputy Assistant Sec. of Labor for trade and adjustment policy. This is a new post created by Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz.

Blackman, an international economist, was formerly the administrator of the Bureau of International Labor Affairs.

Shultz also appointed Charles D. Stewart as acting Deputy Assistant Secretary for International Affairs. He replaces Darwin M. Bell, who joined the International Labor Organization in Colombia.

Back-to-Work Bid Scorned at GE's Largest Appliance Center

By Harry Conn
Press Associates, Inc.

Louisville, Ky.—General Electric bills its massive Appliance Park plant here as the "world's largest" appliance manufacturing center.

On 922 acres, the self-contained manufacturing community is designed to produce ranges, refrigerators, freezers, air conditioners, washers, dryers and small kitchen appliances.

GE didn't completely stop production when the strike started on Oct. 27 and its workers walked off the job. A few appliances are coming off the assembly line, mostly turned out by management and salaried people.

But the company knows, the workers know and the community knows that GE's claim of production is a sham. The company's primary objective is to break the strike so that it can get production.

At each of the entrances of the plant is a large sign that reads: "This Plant Is Open. All Employes Are Urged to Report to Work."

It is a plain and simple fact that despite a massive back-to-work effort by management, the workers are "sticking to the union."

The major union at Appliance Park is Local 761 of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers with 14,727 members.

"Since the strike started," Local Vice Pres. Carl H. Snider reports, "we have signed up 1,800 new members. Of course, some members have quit to take other jobs but they are not going back to work at GE."

Joining Local 761 on strike are the 320 members of the Kentucky Skilled Craft Guild, a local unaffiliated union, and 80 members of the Firemen & Oilers. The only other union at the plant, the Plant Guards, is not striking.

"You know, we've been through strikes against this company before," Snider said, "but never have we had the support we have now. This is the first strike that we haven't had to call up people and ask them to man picket lines. They are volunteering for the four-hour shift three times, four times a week."

Local 761's modern headquarters, a quarter of a mile from the plant, is teeming with activity. Workers in the hall are not only collecting benefit checks — just raised from $12 to $20 a week— but are volunteering for all sorts of jobs.

An indication of the organization is the mass of automobiles parked in the snow-covered parking lot. Strikers, wearing bright yellow jackets with the word "Parking" on them, direct the heavy traffic.

GE is using almost every device it can dream up to get its workers back on the job. It runs newspaper advertisements almost daily. So-called "Issue-Grams," sometimes three a week, are sent to the workers' homes. Strikers also receive the "Appliance Park Headliner" and letters from the labor relations manager, J. R. Clark.

"Behind all this is the veiled intimidation attempting to frighten the workers into returning," Snider said. "There are the TV cameras taking pictures of pickets from a van. Then there are the so-called parabolic microphones that pick up conversations on the picket lines."

Snider said while he couldn't prove these audio eavesdropping gimmicks were in use he knows how the system operates and is convinced they have been used.

The workers are getting union messages through daily "Strike Line News," a mimeographed sheet, and literature from the AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee, plus union meetings.

The electronic gimmicks are standard talk on the picket lines. "GE can come up with all these things they can dream up," said Local Member Ronald Abersold, "but it won't help them a bit."

Abersold, who has 15 years seniority in refrigerators, keeps a close watch on what is happening in his department. He's convinced that production is about one-tenth of normal.

In the cold, near-zero weather, Abersold said that he and his fellow strikers "are damn determined." He said most of the workers were set for the strike and will "see it through no matter how long it takes."

Fellow picket Charles Rea, who also has 15 years in refrigeration, agrees, saying, "We'll stay out until we get what we need."

Another picket, George Mobias, is a member of the Kentucky Skilled Craft Guild, a tool and die maker. He expressed his solidarity in the strike in this way: "We're going to stick it out as long as IUE does."

At another entrance, William Hudson, 15 years in ranges, and two fellow strikers, Marvin Miles and R. E. Brown, were amused by the GE use of a freight train it moves in and out from company property.

"Most of those cars are empty," said Hudson laughing, "and they move it back and forth to make it look like there is production."

The pickets are set for more months of cold weather. Each entrance has a picket shack heated by a gas heater fed by bottled gas.

"Talk about unions in politics," one of the strikers said, "we might not have these shacks if we hadn't taken political action."

Labor-supported Todd Hollenbeck was elected the county judge and sets policy on use of county property.

The strikers are bolstered by the support of the AFL-CIO and the boycott against GE products. No prospective buyer of appliances escapes without getting a leaflet asking that he buy no GE products until after the strike.

Jerry Thompson, president of the Louisville AFL-CIO, has set up a strong program to support the boycott throughout the area.

"When you write your story," Snider said, "tell labor union members a couple of things for us. Tell them that our spirits are high and we're going to win. And thank them for the support they are giving us."

GE Dividend Check Buoys Strike Fund

New York—The Citizens Committee to Support the GE Strikers received a General Electric Co. dividend check in the mail. It was small, but it had a large impact.

Sent from Schenectady, N.Y., it said "Pay to the order of Elizabeth M. Eger, c/o Mrs. Elizabeth E. Nordgren, Durham, N.H., $1.30." On the back, the check was endorsed with the notation "Pay to the order of Citizens Committee to Support the GE Strikers."

Paul H. Douglas, former Illinois senator, is chairman of the committee.

Feinstein Elected By Leather Goods Union

New York—The Leather Goods, Plastics & Novelty Workers elected a new leadership team to be headed by Pres. Charles Feinstein at a special one-day convention here, Jan. 19.

Elected unanimously along with Feinstein were Sec.-Treas. Harry Frankel, Executive Vice Pres. Benjamin Feldman and Vice Presidents Raymond Dooley, Frank Casale, Ben Stango, Nathan Katz and Irving Zeichner.

Delegates also elected a 23-member executive board, representing every geographical area where the union has representation. The board will meet early next month to formulate new policies.

Its members are: Lawrence Auterino, Randolfo Bobe, Ralph Cennamo, Domenic DeBendetto, Domenic DiPaola, Peter Donatello, Max Goodheim, Jesse Greenwald, Harry Grosskopf, Fred Halstead, Edward Hudyka, Anna Marshall Manuel Morreira, Harriet Pulak, Julius Rosenbluth, Ben Rudnick, Charles Szabo, Morris Silcoff, Simon Tansky, Anthony Varrone, Louis Warshavsky, Isidore Wasserstein and Lou Zatt.

The theme of the convention, held for the specific purpose of electing officers for terms ending in June 1972, was set by Feinstein in an acceptance speech.

Reflecting on the unity demonstrated at the convention in sharp contrast to past controversy and division, he pledged an administration based on loyalty to the union and dedicated to its future.

Priority goals of the union, he emphasized, must be an intensive organizing drive and adoption of programs to cope with the flood of cheap-wage imports that are destroying jobs in industries where the union has jurisdiction.

Feinstein also urged the board to restructure existing union departments and establish new ones "all to the end of giving our members the kind of representation and facilities and services they need and must have."

Matthew DeMore, former secretary-treasurer of the Machinists, who presided at the election convention, was presented with a scroll in recognition of his contribution.

In another action, the convention designated Jack Wieselberg as secretary-treasurer emeritus. He has retired after more than four decades of service in the union.

Feinstein, a former union vice president and director of its welfare and pension funds, succeeds Norman Zukowsky in the presidency.

Hard Work, Funds Key to Elections

Following is the transcript of a new film produced by the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education for use in the 1970 regional COPE conferences.

ANNOUNCER: Here in Washington, D.C., at the headquarters of the AFL-CIO, Pres. George Meany and National COPE Dir. Al Barkan discuss the coming elections.

The challenges and the stakes, they agree, make 1970 the Big One.

BARKAN: Pres. Meany, in the audience watching this film are the people who will be responsible for the COPE field work in the 1970 elections. I know they have two questions uppermost in their minds, on which they would like your views:

How do we win? How crucial are this year's elections?

MEANY: Well, first of all: There is no simple solution, no magic formula for winning elections. The answer is simply: Hard work.

Now the people who did the COPE job in 1968 know that, Al. That's how we built our unions and that's how labor was successful in the last presidential election.

It's worth taking a look at what happened in that election. Remember all the news predictions that we were beaten—that our members had deserted us for George Wallace?

Well, COPE recruited over 72,000 pre-election workers and added 4.6 million voters to the registration rolls. On Election Day, nearly 100,000 trade unionists were mobilized in a massive get-out-the-vote drive that came within a hairbreadth of electing Hubert Humphrey. Through the specialized use of campaign material and literature, amounting to millions of pieces, the Wallace appeal was blunted.

COPE did a tremendous job against overwhelming odds, with little or no outside help, and kept the Congress from going conservative.

So, I don't have to tell the men and women, who led that effort in the field, that there is no substitute for hard work when it comes to winning elections.

This year is no exception. If anything, the work will be harder. The voter registration drive will be more difficult because, for one thing, voter apathy is greater in off-year elections.

And there's a real danger here. We know that many of our members just don't get as excited about congressional elections as they do during a presidential election. And because of this, fewer of our members go to the polls in congressional years.

But the conservative vote always comes out, and a combination of high voter turnout by conservatives and low voter turnout by our members, hurts good candidates. This is something we have to prevent.

That is why COPE's annual registration system is so important. That means checking union membership lists against official registration files. And then going to work to get the unregistered registered.

Well, now, how do we do this? Through hard work, personal contact, phone calls, door knocking and follow-up inquiries. That means organizing the registration drive at work, in the union hall, and in the precincts where workers live.

You will be hampered by archaic state laws designed to keep many people from registering and voting. The law is a barrier wherever complicated and inconvenient registration policies are found, like the practice of:

- Closing registration books months before an election.
- Confusing and conflicting rules on absentee voting.
- Restrictive residency requirements.
- Restricted registration hours in almost inaccessible downtown locations.
- Denial of door-to-door or mobile registration systems.

COPE will furnish information on voter registration and election laws because knowledge of these laws is necessary to conducting a successful voter registration drive. And, wherever possible, we must work to simplify the laws and make registration an aid to voting rather than a barrier to voting.

The next big need is money.

Voter registration drives cost money. So do campaigns.

For example, John Lindsay's election in 1969 as mayor of New York City is reported to have cost over $2 million.

A single congressional candidate in a rural midwestern district spent over $75,000 in a special election last year, and even then his victory was only marginal.

COPE helps labor's friends, who face stiff election challenges. We do it with the money raised in the "give-a-buck-to-COPE" campaigns.

This year, 21 out of the 35 United States senators up for election are our good friends. Every one of them is involved in a very close race for re-election.

In the House of Representatives, there are at least 100 friendly members who come from close marginal districts and who face tough election fights for survival.

These are our incumbent friends who need money. We need money to defeat our incumbent enemies, too.

And the state houses and governorships are crucial, too, if the people are to be represented fairly in new congressional districts that will be set up for the 1972 elections. Every one of these campaigns costs money.

Millions will be matched against the candidates we support. But with hard work and a COPE dollar from every union member, we can win.

Al Barkan and his staff will be sending you information and assistance on conducting the COPE dollar drive. It is absolutely essential that this drive be the most successful ever.

BARKAN: Pres. Meany, let's turn to the issues of the campaign. In a sense, I guess, it is the second question I asked: How crucial are these elections?

MEANY: They just couldn't be more important.

Just think about what would happen if we lose the Congress. Last year, we saw an all-out effort to stop labor's political activity, even to prevent us from conducting non-partisan voter registration drives. It was defeated. But its promoters are just waiting for another chance and they'll get it if the Senate and House fall to the conservatives.

They have other proposals as well—to outlaw coordinated bargaining, to dismantle the National Labor Relations Board, to place unions under anti-trust laws.

Here is a book full of their proposals—proposals of the United States Chamber of Commerce—to reform the labor laws. And I can tell you that everything they do in the way of reformation will be disastrous as far as we are concerned.

All of these proposals, and others like them, could become law if the conservatives gain control of the Congress.

And then, there's the other side of the coin . . . all the needed legislation that just wouldn't stand a chance in a conservative Congress.

And this legislation is as crucial as air and water are to life. Today dirty air and dirty water are jeopardizing our very lives and the balance of nature itself. And the next Congress must face up to those problems.

Then there are the hard facts of life that we don't all share in the wealth, power and privileges of America. This fact has led to division and turmoil among the people.

Half-hearted, under-financed piecemeal programs to eliminate barriers to education and to end the urban crisis, poverty, slum housing, discrimination and hard-core unemployment, must be made realistic. They started well in the early '60s, then faltered and they haven't achieved their goals.

Now the Congress and the states must measure up to the needs of America. Full funding and full implementation of these programs is needed, along with tax systems that equitably distribute the burden of providing for them.

So, social progress and tax justice are issues in this 1970 campaign, too. Their achievement is crucial to the direction this country will take—whether it will move ahead on the path of democracy, justice and progress, or whether it will veer deeper into the ruts of reaction, violence and civil strife.

Underlying the issues at stake in this year's elections are our fundamental values for life, democracy and freedom.

To make certain that trade unionists know the issues and the stakes of the election, COPE will be sending factual material to you for distribution to your rank and file members throughout the year. I urge you to make full use of it, to become familiar with the issues and to pass the material on to others who may not have the facts. This campaign must be based on facts, not propaganda, for facts help win elections too.

The best yardsticks of how your elected officials performed are their voting records. Once again, COPE will distribute the voting records of congressmen and senators on key issues.

In the 1970 elections, it is fair to say that such key issues will include tax justice, social security, the poverty program, hunger, education, job training, voting rights, crime control—and, of course, the Haynsworth nomination.

Of course, there are also important issues on which no vote will be taken, like tight money, high interest rates, excessive profits and inflation. The candidates will have to be heard on these issues, and we'll know them by the positions they take.

Finally, elections are won by getting the most votes.

That is why COPE runs its get-out-the-vote drive. Every year this drive has improved.

Nothing should be spared in launching it this year. We have a tested and proven system that enlists the efforts of all segments of the labor movement, from the local union level, through the city and state central body, to the international union level. Get-out-the-vote organization manuals. promotion literature and manpower enlistment programs will be available for your use.

But a successful get-out-the-vote drive, as we all know, requires massive amounts of time, effort and voluntary manpower—hard work. But in the end, it is the vote that counts.

No one ever said making democracy work is easy. But it is certainly worthwhile.

And the one organization in America that can do this job is COPE.

We proved this in 1968 when thousands of our members all pulled together, registering their fellow workers, informing them about issues and candidates, getting out the vote on election day.

This is the job we must do again this year, every single one of us. And that means you.

BARKAN: Thank you, Pres. Meany.

Support the Strikers

THANKS to the generous response of affiliated organizations, large and small, and of countless individual union members, the AFL-CIO GE Strike Relief Fund has already turned over to the striking unions two checks for $1 million each. More money continues to arrive daily and the drive has already raised more than any previous strike relief campaign. The strikers appreciate this fine support and I want to warmly thank all who have given.

But much more money is needed immediately.

The morale and the fighting spirit of the strikers is wonderful. During one of the most bitter winters in recent memory, the picket lines have remained solid and the strike will not be broken.

Now, with the strike in its 13th week, the needs of individual strike families are becoming more numerous and more acute.

I am keenly aware that many affiliates have already met the quota of $1 a member or will shortly do so. Some have actually exceeded this initial request. Many state and local central bodies have combined fund raising with their boycott campaign.

But the needs of the strikers grow and so more must be done.

As I said when we started this fund-raising operation:

THIS IS MORE than another big strike. It is a strike that involves the future of collective bargaining, not only in General Electric, not only in the electrical industry, but everywhere in America.

If General Electric should prevail, if the strikers should be forced to submit to the company's terms, every union would feel the impact.

It is a strike we cannot afford to lose; it is a strike we will not lose.

At this writing, GE remains intransigent. The strike goes on and the big need is money—help for the strikers.

So my plea is simple:

- The GE strikers need your help.
- Please try to meet the quota requested in my original appeal.
- If you have already met that quota, please try to help some more.

The courageous men and women on the GE picket lines, nearly 150,000 strong, deserve our full and complete support for themselves and for the entire labor movement.

Please act promptly. Send your checks to the AFL-CIO GE Strike Relief Fund, care of Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, at AFL-CIO headquarters in Washington, D.C.

Death of Two Million Biafrans Caused by 'Politics of Inaction'

By John P. Roche

BIAFRA finally went under. The breakaway Ibos regime, outnumbered and outgunned, had fought desperately for its autonomy. But, despite Biblical reassurance, Goliath usually has an unbeatable edge over David.

No neat account can be made of the rights and wrongs. The Federal Nigerian government was asserting the principle of majority rule; the Ibos demanding protection for minority rights which would have destroyed Nigerian sovereignty. Though the participants were black Africans, the terms of the dispute were familiar to Sixteenth Century French Huguenots (demanding absolute guarantees against Catholic power) and to Nineteenth Century Poles (attempting to prevent Russian "cultural genocide").

Historically, there has been no workable compromise—we in the United States fought one of the bloodiest civil wars in history to determine the location of final power. To be a little bit sovereign is like being slightly pregnant.

So much for history, so much for logic. The implications of Biafra must be explored on a different level. In human terms what has occurred in the past three years is simply monstrous.

Reliable British sources indicate that over 2 million Ibos have died, the bulk of them women and children who have starved to death. (Nigerian losses have also been severe, but do not approach the same order of magnitude.)

Starvation has been used as a weapon by both sides; by Lagos to weaken the Biafran capacity to resist; by the Biafrans to generate sympathy and support from the world outside.

In terms of human suffering, using the admittedly inadequate index of mortality figures, the war in Nigeria was the worst event of the 1960s. (Probably second was the virtually unknown Sudanese pacification of the three southern provinces —the Arab regime moved ruthlessly against the black inhabitants—with a death toll now estimated at over 1 million.)

Yet, in a world full of international and regional organizations, nobody did anything about it.

The Red Cross and various religious groups tried valiantly to succor the starving, but, while too many human beings were dying, the issue could not even get discussed at the United Nations and was buried quietly by the Organization of African Unity. The reasons for this were not hard to discern but a universal unwillingness to tangle with the explosive minority question has turned the eastern region of Nigeria into a vast graveyard.

Since the "international community" took a dive on Biafra, the question arose: "Should the United States do anything?" An interesting United Front, ranging from Sen. Tom Dodd to figures on the New Left, said, "Yes," but, when pressed as to what we should do, they got fuzzy.

THEIR ADVICE seemed to be that we should call Lagos, or London, or U Thant or Haile Selassie (of the Organization of African Unity) and tell them/him "Something must be done!" This was not terribly helpful. It would have been more appropriate to simply send the Ibos a wreath.

I had a plan founded on my rejection of the use of starvation as a weapon, the perhaps Utopian notion that has led me over the years to support feeding Greeks under Nazi occupation, Red Chinese, the Egyptians, and recently Nigerians of whatever persuasion. Unlike other forms of death, starvation is uniquely the fate of the innocent, the marginal, the unimportant.

I wanted the U.S. government to announce that planes loaded only with food and medicines would fly in relief supplies to any area of Nigeria suffering from disease and famine—and that USAF fighters would convoy them against the unlikely event that somebody would try to knock them down.

Although I knew of no other way to get food and medicine to the dying, my friends fled in horror. "You might get us into another Viet Nam!" was the standard response. Fair enough. I have supported risk-taking before. But this would have been a unique blow for the sovereignty of humanity, rather than for any parochial definition of national interest. In any event, the politics of inaction killed 2 million people, a point to be kept in mind when we discuss the consequences of American disengagement from the turbulent world.

Other Benefits Would Suffer:

Social Security Costs to Rise If Retirement Test Is Removed

The following is excerpted from an article in the Senior Citizen News, the publication of the National Council of Senior Citizens, reporting on a new study by the council's president, Nelson H. Cruikshank.

A NEWLY COMPLETED STUDY reveals that:

- Removal of the social security retirement test would cost $2.5 billion.
- The bulk of this money would go to a relatively small group of seniors such as business executives, professional persons and other elderly men and women who have not yet retired.
- Instead of distributing this money largely among the "haves," it could be used to much better advantage improving social security and Medicare benefits for the great majority of the elderly who are "have-nots."

To make social security an annuity program permitting unlimited earnings after retirement would have required much higher contributions (social security payroll tax payments) by workers and employers and the self-employed than has been the case, the study says.

"To adopt such a system (by abolishing the social security retirement test) would demand an outlay of $2.5 billion in additional social security payments that would go to no more than one out of ten aged Americans.

"Those benefiting would be persons with the highest earnings from employment and, presumably, having the least need for additional income."

The question is whether the $2.5 billion involved ought to go to such persons or whether, should this amount become available, it ought to go toward improving benefits of the millions who stand to gain nothing from removal of the social security retirement test, the study notes.

The retirement test applies to eligibles under age 72 (there is no limitation on earnings of recipients aged 72 or older).

The present test works this way: If a recipient earns $1,680 or less during the year (usually January through December), nothing will be withheld from his social security benefits. If he earns more than $1,680 in the year, for each $2 of earnings above $1,680 and up to $2,880, $1 will be withheld from his benefits. For each $1 of earnings above $2,880, $1 of benefits will be withheld.

However, regardless of total earnings in a year, benefits are payable for any month in which a recipient neither earns wages of more than $140 nor performs substantial services in self-employment.

The study report continues:

"There have been persistent attempts to repeal or drastically modify the retirement test. Many bills are introduced in every session of Congress for this purpose. The criticisms of the test have a wide appeal—especially to those unacquainted with the basic purposes of the social security law.

"For example, critics call unfair the fact that a retired person may derive substantial income from savings and investment without loss of social security benefits while a social security recipient who earns as little as $1,700 a year has his benefits reduced.

"This goes to the purpose of the social security system which is to replace earnings lost because of retirement.

"If there is any inequity here, it is because of the nature of our economic system and not because of the operation of the social security law.

"The investor eligible for social security retirement benefits can collect them only when he has retired. The question of his need—as compared with that of a less affluent neighbor—does not affect his eligibility. That's how insurance—including social insurance—works.

"The other side of the coin is the eligibility of workers who have private pension plans such as those negotiated with employers. These workers do not lose their social security benefits because they have private pensions.

"It would be tragic if individual need ever got to be the main factor in determining eligibility for social security."

THE CRUIKSHANK STUDY reviews the cost of removing or substantially boosting the earnings ceiling under social security.

It notes: "Entirely eliminating the retirement test (at a cost of $2.5 billion a year) would be the equivalent of an additional social security tax amounting to 0.63 percent of payroll subject to this tax.

"Raising the exempt amount of earnings under the social security retirement test from the present $1,680 to $3,000 a year would be the equivalent of an additional social security tax amounting to 0.47 percent of payroll subject to the social security payroll tax.

"It would, of course, be theoretically possible to eliminate the retirement test and add the cost to the present social security tax schedule and, thus, require those who are still working to carry the load, but this is neither socially desirable nor politically feasible since only about 10 percent of the elderly would benefit and this 10 percent comprises those least in need of additional income.

"Workers have shown a commendable willingness to pay social security taxes, but it is doubtful the same willingness would be shown toward a steep increase in taxes to pay benefits to a comparatively small group of people including highly-paid professionals and business executives who are still working."

The Cruikshank study shows that the additional cash that would be required for social security benefits if the retirement test should be removed would pay for:

- Raising a widow's social security benefit (now 82.5 percent of the husband's benefit) to 100 percent of the husband's benefit.
- Liberalizing the social security disability benefit computation for men at age 62.
- Broadening eligibility for social security disability benefits for younger workers.

No. 1 Social Problem:

Congress, President Hold Key To Effective Attack on Hunger

NEW LEGISLATION, in addition to White House action under existing laws, are needed to mount an effective attack on the nation's No. 1 social problem—hunger, declared AFL-CIO legislative representative Clinton Fair.

As many as 10 million Americans who need federal food stamps aren't getting them now, and the program itself isn't even available in many parts of the country, Fair said.

Fair said the President doesn't have to wait for new legislation to put the federal food stamp program "into the more than 300 counties" that don't have it now. He can use the power he has under the law as it now stands. Fair contended.

He made the statements on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview, Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Turning to new legislation, Fair pointed out that the Senate last year approved a bill that would "expand the food stamp program tremendously," by the "substantial vote of 78 to 14." He said the measure is now before the House Agriculture Committee, and that the outlook for its passage in the House this year is "good."

FAIR SAID the White House Conference on Food, Nutrition & Health last December indicated that the President is "striving to go in the right direction" in combatting hunger.

But, he asserted, the direction and effectiveness of that attack "depends a great deal" on what the President proposes to Congress, and how hard he pushes for passage of his proposals.

"It is one thing to say that you are for something, and it is another thing to throw the power of the White House toward obtaining legislation," he added.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE $65 BILLION American health care industry is reaching a serious impasse.

Its delivery system is not functioning. Its facilities are overpriced and undermanned. Its structure is archaic. Too frequently it is a business rather than a service.

Medical science may be reaching new heights but, at the same time, this country ranks 14th in infant mortality, 12th in maternal mortality, 18th in male life expectancy and 11th in female life expectancy.

If you are an American male, you would have a longer life expectancy if you lived in the Scandinavian countries, in East Germany, in Japan, in Greece, West Germany, Italy or Hungary.

And yet no country puts so much money into health care as does America.

A World Health Organization study in 1967, based on data of a few years earlier, showed that recipients of health care in the U.S. devoted a larger proportion of private consumption expenditures to health services than in 10 other major countries—in fact, one third more than the next highest country.

Private health insurance plans cover about 150 million Americans 65 years and under. Yet private plans are unable to extend protection against more than an average of about 40 percent of the private costs.

In a recent survey of medical care, Fortune magazine declared:

"The nation's 313,000 active physicians are quite properly the main target of critics of the health care system. They run it. They are the most formidable obstacles to its improvement."

Fortune adds that the United States "alone among the world's developed countries has given the medical fraternity such freedom. The profession not only can but should be held accountable for the way it uses its power."

The magazine came up with other figures. Between 1950 and 1965, the number of doctors caring for private patients actually declined 10 percent in proportion to the population. Others went into research, industry and so on.

Other sources report that between 1955 and 1966 the net income of doctors in private practice doubled to $32,170. Fifteen percent of all doctors made in excess of $50,000 a year.

THE RISE IN HOSPITAL care costs has been inevitable with new, life-saving equipment but even hospital administrators acknowledge that the archaic financial structure is primarily responsible for the breath-taking spiral. Middlemen such as Blue Cross and Blue Shield have no incentive for holding down the costs.

If there were adequate out-patient care that people could afford, the number of admissions to hospitals would not be nearly so high. It is estimated that only one-third of the people awaiting attention in hospitals have true emergencies.

However, doctors are the architects of the system and they profit from it. And the cost of medical care in the last decade has risen faster than almost any other single product or service.

With this picture—creating the anxiety, the deprivations, the cruelty, and frustrations and the waste—there is little wonder that national health insurance is developing into one of the prime domestic issues of the '70s.

No longer can the American Medical Association, with its vested interests, scare off people with cries of "socialized medicine" as it did in the 1940s.

Medicare and Medicaid, despite limitations and skeptical practices by many doctors, hospitals and nursing homes, has cleared out the underbrush.

This session of Congress will see a bill calling for the establishment of National Health Insurance as an integral part of the social insurance system and largely financed out of employer and employe contributions which would restructure our entire health delivery system.

The total cost to this country and its citizens should be less than they are now paying.

AN EFFECTIVE ATTACK on the nation's hunger problem hinges on both new legislation and presidential action under existing laws, said Clinton Fair, center, AFL-CIO legislative representative, on Labor News Conference. He was interviewed by Robert Walters, left, of the Washington Evening Star and Spencer Rich of the Washington Post.

How to Buy:

Availability of Mortgages Lags Despite 8.5% FHA-VA Rate

By Sidney Margolius

FAMILIES SEEKING TO BUY or refinance homes took another clout with the latest increase in FHA and VA mortgage rates to 8.5 percent.

Counting the FHA mortgage insurance premium, which the homeowner pays FHA to guarantee the lender against loss, and to subsidize operating expenses, the FHA rate now is 9 percent at the start, and about 8.75 percent over the life of the mortgage.

Do you know what you have to pay back on a mortgage like that? For a $20,000, 35-year mortgage you would repay a total of $64,596; more than three times as much as the original amount you borrow. If you could repay in only 30 years, you would pay a total of $57,600.

Not only money-grabbing interest rates but rising property taxes are pushing moderate-income families out of the housing market, government housing officials are saying privately. Even a fairly modest home in many metropolitan areas now requires taxes of $60 to $70 a month.

The leaping mortgage and tax costs on top of higher prices for homes (new ones now average $26,000) means fewer and fewer families are able to qualify for mortgages.

Renters too are affected. Nationally rents went up an average of about 4 percent last year, but many landlords now are notifying tenants of large increases.

The irony of the latest mortgage increase is that—like the previous ones—it has failed so far to make mortgages more available even at the higher rate. Apparently the government's theory is that if it didn't work before, let's try it again.

In just three years the mortgage rate has gone from the 6 percent of 1966 to the present 8.5 percent.

The only solution to the interest rate grab may have to be direct housing loans by the federal government. Rep. Leonor Sullivan of Missouri has introduced a bill to authorize direct loans to families with incomes of $12,000 or less who are unable to get mortgages "at reasonable rates." Maximum interest under the proposed program would be 6.5 percent.

Passage of this bill would not only benefit moderate-income families directly but would help push down rates charged by private lenders. The bill is co-sponsored by Rep. William Barrett of Pennsylvania, chairman of the Housing Subcommittee.

If you already have a home, at least you can find values in the annual home furnishings sales this month. The values are good, especially since merchants have been forced into heavier price-cutting to unload inventories because of unexpectedly (to them) slack Christmas sales.

Here are facts you can use on February buying opportunities:

Rugs: Nylon rugs have become the leading seller in the moderate-cost bracket. They have gone up little in recent years while other prices have been rising. Wool rugs, while still considered preferable, have become very expensive. Polyester rugs (Dacron, Kodel, etc.) have good abrasion resistance and resilience but also are in the higher price bracket.

Acrylic-fiber rugs (Acrilan, Orlon, Creslan, etc.) most resemble wool in appearance, and are easier to wet-clean. But in cheaper grades acrylic rugs are less durable than nylon rugs of similar weight.

Safest buys in nylon rugs are those labeled with the manufacturers' name. The manufacturers allow their names only on nylon rugs which meet minimum standards for pile, construction and fiber grade. Among the manufacturers' designations assuring you of at least reasonable quality are Du Pont 501, Antron, Chemstarand Cumuloft, Firestone Nyloft.

Mattresses, Sofa-beds: Good values in mattresses and sofa-beds also are available in the February sales. In fact some of the current prices are among the lowest in recent years.

Many of the larger stores have their own brands. Best values in the mattress sales usually are those carrying the store's house name.

Food Buying Calendar: Egg prices are finally receding from their recent startling 90-cent tags and will be increasingly good buys from now through spring. Both beef and pork remain very expensive. About the best dinner buys currently are pork shoulders and large turkeys.

Information Drive Urged On 'Black Lung' Benefits

AFL-CIO state federations have been asked to help publicize benefit provisions of the new Coal Mine Health & Safety Act so that miners disabled by "black lung" disease and their survivors can immediately apply for benefits.

Benefits are not retroactive prior to the filing of a claim for compensation, so delay can be costly to persons eligible for federal payments.

The new law provides payments of about $136 a month for a miner "totally disabled" by pneumoconiosis, or his widow. Additional payments are provided for dependents. The ailment is defined as a chronic dust disease of the lung arising out of employment in an underground coal mine.

Claims for benefits should be submitted to both the applicant's local Social Security office and to the state's workmen's compensation administration, if this has not already been done.

Benefit payments under federal law will be reduced by the amount of state benefits, if any.

Starting in 1973, the compensation program is shifted to the states, provided that their workmen's compensation laws are approved by the Secretary of Labor as having adequate coverage for pneumoconiosis. Where adequate state laws do not exist, coal mine operators will be required to pay benefits equal to the disability provisions of the federal Longshoremen's & Harbor Workers' Compensation Act.

Survey Challenges 'Evils' of Automation

PEOPLE IN AUTOMATED JOBS are supposed to be bored by their work and perhaps be damaged psychologically by the tedium, but University of Michigan researchers say it isn't so.

The controversy of man against machine goes back at least to economist Adam Smith, author of "The Wealth of Nations," who nearly 200 years ago warned about the evil effects of machine technology on man.

The worker exposed to the machine, he said, "becomes as stupid and ignorant as it is possible for a human creature to become. The torpor of his mind renders him not only incapable of relishing or bearing a part in a rational conversation, but of conceiving any generous, noble, or tender sentiment."

Modern critics have continued to speculate that automation debases the human spirit while it destroys jobs.

But this longstanding pessimism is challenged by University of Michigan economist Eva Mueller, who drew her conclusions from a nationwide study of more than 2,600 blue-collar and white-collar workers.

The report, "Technological Advance in an Expanding Economy," has just been published by the university's Institute for Social Research. The conclusion: The bleak predictions of Adam Smith and others have not come true and are not likely to do so.

The survey, in fact, resulted in nearly an opposite conclusion: "Those who work with highly automated or mechanized equipment are more likely than others to say that they enjoy their work."

Workers in all major socio-economic groups who have experienced changes in machine technology view their jobs as having become more demanding and requiring more attention, new skills, and a greater need for planning and judgment, the survey revealed.

Over the five-year period (1962-67) about which the workers were questioned, those experiencing a change in machine technology were more likely to have received income gains than those who continued to work with the same equipment.

Prof. Mueller attributes much of the income differential to the above-average educational levels of those who work with automated equipment.

Among the popular myths challenged by the study findings is the belief that technological change determines the incidence of unemployment.

Prof. Mueller comments: "The survey leads us to infer that the impact of advances in machine technology on employment is largely indirect. The firm which introduces new labor-saving machinery often is faced with labor shortages and a growing market for its products. Normal retirements and resignations further help to bring its labor supply in balance with needs. Skilled and experienced people who have to be laid off tend to be re-employed quickly.

"Much of the unemployment resulting from labor-saving machinery 'trickles down' to the most marginal groups in the labor force.

ALSO VULNERABLE, the report notes, are workers employed by firms that fall behind technologically. Unsteady work and short hours are relatively frequent in such situations.

The report concludes that retraining and other special programs to ease the impact of technological unemployment "on the marginal segments of the labor force" should receive special attention.

In terms of frequency of change in our machine technology, the study indicated that about 10 percent of the labor force experienced what they considered significant changes over the five-year period. That figure represents roughly between 1.5 and 2 million workers a year, or a level high enough to justify a continued concern for the social and psychological effects of automation on the population as a whole, the report concludes.

Remember How Tough It Was Before Remote-Control TV?

By Jane Goodsell

MAYBE ONE REASON kids of today haven't more respect for their elders is they've no awareness of the hardships we've lived through. No. I'm not talking about the depression. To the youth of today, the depression is as remote as the potato famine or the War of the Roses. There's no point, either, in trying to impress the young by telling them about wind-up phonographs, hand-crank ice cream freezers, claw-footed bathtubs and treadle sewing machines. Anything that old-fashioned seems attractively romantic and quaint.

What's needed are some examples of primitive living conditions that kids can understand, maybe even pity us for having lived through. Here's a partial list:

Back in the olden days, we didn't have remote control TV, no siree. When we wanted to switch channels, we had to walk clear across the room—sometimes as far as 20 feet—to turn the little dial.

We had to struggle along without personalized checks.

We didn't have nine-cycle dishwashers with powerful turbo-spray wash action. We had to scrape and rinse dishes by hand before putting them into the dishwasher.

A lot of us can remember when frozen orange juice didn't come in a can with a little easy-open strip to pull. We had to use a can opener, sometimes even a non-electric one.

Bathroom tissue was available only in six or eight plain decorator shades. Floral-patterned, perfumed tissue was unheard of.

Back in the olden days, we had to soil our fingertips with messy cream deodorants.

Worse yet, we had to hold ice trays under running water to loosen ice cubes.

OUR VACUUM CLEANERS were so old-fashioned they didn't even have retractable cords for easy storage.

There wasn't any such thing as a flip-top beer can. Forgetting to bring a bottle opener to a picnic was a catastrophe.

There was no such thing as direct-distance dialing. Or boil-in-the-bag frozen vegetables. Or stretch socks. Or non-glare light bulbs. Or self-seal envelopes. Or automatic push-button umbrellas. Or 16-speed food blenders. Ours had only two speeds—high and low.

Okay. That ought to give modern kids some idea of how tough things were in the olden days.

Medical Care Crisis:

National Health Plan Called Only Answer

New York—An insurance industry official told the Life Underwriters Association of this city that carriers will act to improve serious defects in delivery of medical care.

But the 250 insurance salesmen present were reminded by an AFL-CIO spokesman that nothing in their industry's record gave any promise this desperately needed action would occur.

Labor is convinced that a social-security-based national health insurance plan is the only avenue open to reach this goal, said Dir. Bert Seidman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security.

He pointed out that private carriers, with their $13-billion-a-year stake in health insurance business, have failed to use this "financial clout" to influence doctors to move toward lower cost group practice, outpatient and preventive care instead of costly in-hospital treatment most private insurance policies exclusively provide.

Although private insurance gives some hospital cost protection to 80 percent and surgical cost average to 77 percent of those under 65, Seidman said, it provides nothing to pay for physician home or office visits for 54 percent—more than half—of the below-65 group. This basic defect in the financing mechanism, he said, had led to the lopsided, inadequate health care delivery that exists.

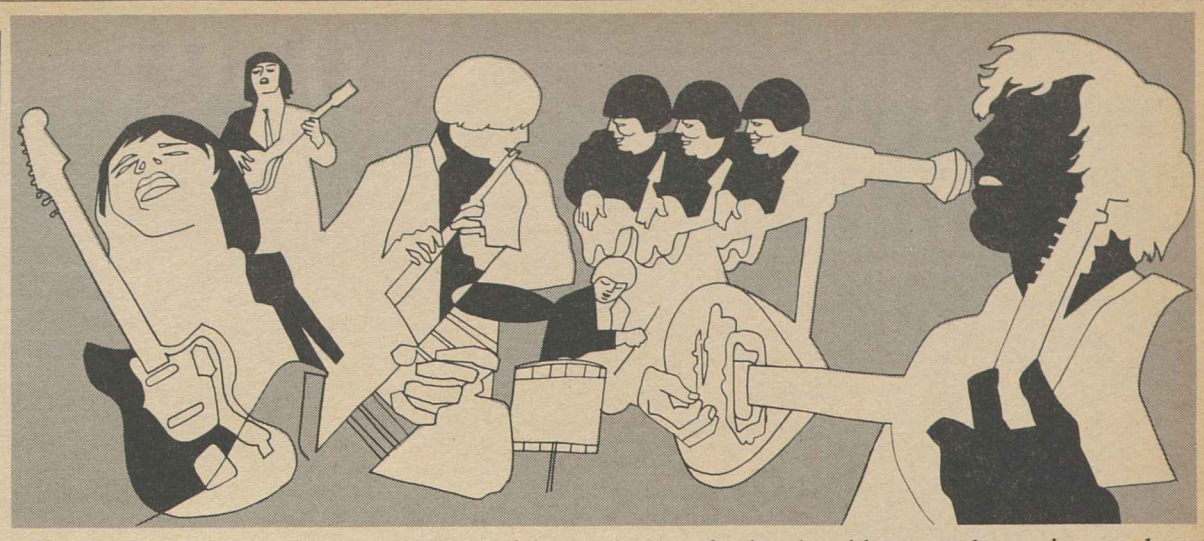
Howard Ennes, the industry spokesman and a vice president of Equitable Life, said the Health Insurance Association of America has more than 300 carrier members writing 80 percent of private health coverage for 104 million persons. He said the association planned to bring about changes that would alter and improve health care delivery—the crux of the medical care problem.

To questions on the possible threat to them of a social-security type national health insurance program, Ennes told the underwriters that he estimated they could expect to double group health coverage business and have "a substantial increase" in individual policies.

Seidman estimated that a national health plan would cost workers, employers and government about the $52.6 billion spent on personal medical services in the fiscal year ended June 30, 1969.



Under the plan, he said, all would be covered for all services and doctors could choose the least costly avenue of treatment needed. Financing would be by payment by workers of about 1 percent of wages, plus 3 percent of payroll contributed by employers and another 3 percent by government. The self-employed would pay as they now contribute to retirement benefits under social security, and government would pay, as now, for those without means.

Services would be supplied under contract with individual doctors, medical societies, hospitals and multi-specialty groups and prepaid on a per person basis. The program would also have the responsibility of improving organization and delivery of health care by financial aid to plan, develop and initially staff health service delivery systems.

Government spent in the fiscal year ended June 30 about $20 billion for personal medical care, Seidman said, and its three-sevenths national health plan share would be about $19 billion. The employers' 3 percent is about what they pay now for "partial services" their workers receive under private insurance, he added.

Ennes noted it was the industry view that "organized service" of medical care was "the order of the day" and that "while it seems clear that the solo practitioner will not vanish overnight, it does seem that he will gradually disappear."

Seidman emphasized that although all other sectors of the economy had long since discarded the outmoded method, most doctors still "clung tenaciously" to their "archaic corner grocery store system of piecework, solo practice, fee-for-service medicine."

"YOUNG SOUNDS" program of the Musicians offers professional guidance and a union card to youthful musical groups playing teen-age engagements. The illustration is from the striking brochure prepared by the American Federation of Musicians to explain the program.

'Young Sounds' Theme of New AFM Program

Professional musicians are offering a helping hand—and a union card—to thousands of youngsters under 21 who play at neighborhood and school teen-age dances.

These budding musicians will be invited to enroll in the new "Young Sounds of the AFM" program which most local unions are in the process of establishing under guidelines from the parent American Federation of Musicians.

Youngsters from 14 to 21 will be invited to become union members, often at reduced dues, with a 90-day "money back" guarantee of a refund of the initiation fee if they change their mind.

There will be special seminars and instruction from professional musicians, in some cities even special young business agents able to bridge the generation gap.

As the AFM's brochure explaining the program puts it, "You'll learn about music as a profession from the pros. . . . You'll learn how to deal with booking agents and personal managers . . . how to read and understand a contract . . . what goes into cutting a record . . . techniques of TV and radio production."

And if a kid under 14 plays in a musical group which applies for membership, he can get the benefits of the program as an associate member without paying any dues at all.

The concept of the program was enthusiastically endorsed at the 1969 AFM convention on the recommendation of a special apprenticeship committee named the year before by Pres. Herman D. Kenin. It was headed by Victor Fuentealba, president of the AFM's Baltimore local.

The program is optional with the AFM's nearly 700 locals, which have been urged to develop programs tailored to their communities on the basis of the AFM guidelines.

Special wage scales will be set up for the young musicians in their field of employment — a broad range of teen-age engagements.

Kenin described the program as "sorely needed because as the number of young musical groups has grown, young musicians have become more vulnerable to exploitation."

The older generation of musicians and the union itself, he predicted, will also benefit from the "insights" and "positive contribution" of the young members.

At the orientation meetings, the "Young Sound" members will be invited to bring their parents if they wish. "It's a good way," the union brochure suggests, 'to show them, first hand, just how much work and effort goes into your life as a musician."

Construction Panel Asks Firm Bargaining Power

A tripartite commission has recommended that local unions in the construction industry be empowered to negotiate new contracts without submitting them to the membership for ratification.

The recommendation was one of nine made by the 12-member Construction Industry Collective Bargaining Commission appointed by Pres. Nixon last September. Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz served as chairman.

The commission's proposal on ratification procedures said "local unions should be encouraged to delegate binding authority to a team of bargainers chosen by the rank-and-file in order to reduce the uncertainties attached to contract negotiations requiring ratification."

It suggested that unions continuing to require contract ratification limit voting on the contract to members covered by it.

Other recommendations of the commission were similarly designed to streamline the fragmentary bargaining process in the industry, in which contracts are traditionally negotiated on a local basis.

Legislative action would be required to put some of the commission's recommendations into effect. However, no such action will be introduced by the Dept. of Labor until the completion of a "comprehensive review" of two sections of the Labor-Management Reporting & Disclosure Act, a review also recommended by the commission.

The sections for which the review was recommended were Title I and Title III, dealing with the rights of rank-and-file members to approve union actions and the rights of international unions to establish trusteeships over subordinate bodies.

The commission is made up of four members each from management, labor and government. The nine recommendations were adopted unanimously by the full body after being prepared by a committee of six lawyers, Louis Sherman and Robert J. Connerton from labor, Guy Farmer and Winthrop A. Johns from national associations of contractors, and John N. Gentry and James E. Johns, Jr., from the Dept. of Labor.

Other recommendations of the commission included:

- Empowering national unions and contractor associations to approve or disapprove strike or lockout actions by their subordinate bodies.
- Necessary changes in constitutions and by-laws to allow the national organizations to assist in local negotiations.
- Submission by local groups of a copy of new or modified agreements to the international union or parent contractor association.
- Greater exchange of information between local and parent bodies.
- A review of staff resources by both the unions and contractor associations.
- Local unions in which members continue to ratify contracts should make sure that only those affected by an agreement are allowed to vote.

Both union and management commission members were asked to report within 60 days what progress has been made with recommendations which apply to them.

Nixon Selects Carswell For Seat on High Court

Pres. Nixon reached once again for a southern conservative to fill a long-standing vacancy on the Supreme Court and sent the nomination of Appellate Court Judge G. Harrold Carswell to the Senate.

Nixon's earlier choice, Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., was rejected by the Senate after charges of conflicts of interest and hostility to unions and to civil rights progress.

The NAACP has challenged Carswell's record as a federal district judge—the post he held from 1958 until last June when Nixon named him to the 5th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals.

Unlike Haynsworth, however, Carswell reports no stock holdings or outside business interests. And the White House, having been burned by its apparently cursory pre-appointment investigation of Haynsworth, told newsmen that Carswell's personal, judicial and financial background had been thoroughly investigated by the Justice Dept.

Carswell's family had been politically and socially prominent in Georgia and he once ran unsuccessfully for the Democratic nomination for a seat in the state legislature.

He moved to Florida in 1949 and in 1952 was a state leader in the "Democrats for Eisenhower" drive. After the election, he was named U.S. attorney for the northern district of Florida and formally changed his party affiliation to Republican.

Pres. Eisenhower appointed him a federal district judge in 1958 and last spring Nixon promoted him to the appellate court.

Although little known as a jurist, he apparently met Pres. Nixon's expressed desire to appoint to the Supreme Court a "strict constructionist" who is young. Carswell is 50, six years younger than Haynsworth.

His opinions, legal observers have noted, almost always relied upon previous court decisions and shunned even logical extensions of them. Thus he refused to order desegregation of a school system's teaching staff since, he declared, the Supreme Court's desegregation system dealt only with children. He sat on very few labor cases during his career on the bench.

Rail Crew Dispute Goes to Mediation

The United Transportation Union and the nation's railroads will resume bargaining under a special mediator in Washington on Jan. 26 in an effort to settle a long-standing dispute over the use of firemen on diesels.

The procedure was agreed to by the parties in December, and Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz has named Frederick R. Livingston as the mediator. He is a New York attorney with a background in labor-management relations.

The railroads were allowed to eliminate 17,000 fireman positions under a two-year compulsory arbitration award in 1964. However, UTU contends the carriers eliminated more positions than they were allowed. It is seeking restoration of a substantial number of jobs.

Umpires Beat Owners 24-2 In NLRB Vote

American League baseball umpires voted 24-2 in favor of joining the association formed by their fellow umpires in the National League.

The election was ordered by the National Labor Relations Board, after a 4-1 decision in December 1969 placed baseball's labor relations under NLRB jurisdiction on the grounds that baseball is "an industry in or affecting commerce." The NLRB decision paved the way for a challenge to the immunity from antitrust laws which baseball has enjoyed since 1922.

The NLRB decision stemmed from a petition filed by the Association of National Baseball League Umpires, the group which the AL umpires chose as their bargaining agent. The vote was 24 for the NL group, 2 for no union and one not voting.

The petition grew out of the 1968 dismissal of two veteran umpires, Al Salerno and Bill Valentine, by the American League on grounds of "incompetence" after they had attempted to form an umpires association similar to the one in the National League.

Salerno and Valentine still have an unfair labor practices charge against the league pending before the NLRB.

3 Pacts Boost Pay for 7,000 Retail Clerks

Philadelphia—Wage increases of $24 to $28 a week for 7,000 employes of three Delaware Valley supermarket chains are provided in new two-year contracts ratified by members of Retails Clerks Local 1357.

The food industry agreement raises the wages of clerks from $120 a week to $132 as of Jan. 10, and to $144 next January in supermarkets operated by Acme, A&P and Food Fair stores. Most department managers get $28 raises to a top of $180 by next January.

The five-day, 40-hour week goes into effect Feb. 1, 1970, with time-and-a-half overtime rates after eight hours in one day, 40 hours a week. Work on any one of seven contract holidays will be paid for at double time, plus holiday pay.

Other improvements are provided in health and welfare benefits, vacations and pensions. Effective at once, employes will get four weeks vacation after 15 years of service, five weeks after 25 years.

The pension plan pays benefits at the new rate of $5.50 a month to a maximum of 40 years' service. Pension rights are vested at age 50 after 15 years of work.

Credit Union Membership Tops 21 Million

Total membership in the nation's 23,900 federal and state chartered credit unions stood at more than 21.5 million at the end of 1969, an increase of 1.4 million over the year, according to the Bureau of Federal Credit Unions.

The bureau, a division of the Social Security Administration and administrator of the federal credit unions, said their membership was 11.3 million at the end of the year, up by 800,000 over the end of 1968.

Bureau Dir. J. Deane Gannon placed the membership of the state-chartered credit unions at over 10.2 million at the close of 1969, a 650,000 increase in membership during the year.

The total assets of all federal and state chartered credit unions were placed at 15.9 billion at the end of 1969, up by 12 percent from the end of 1968. Both types of credit unions also registered sizable increases in savings and loans, the bureau reported.

15,000 Polled By Machinists On TWA Pact

The Machinists reached tentative agreement with Trans World Airlines on terms of a new three-year contract and sent the offer to the IAM's 15,000 members on TWA for acceptance or rejection.

Balloting started Jan. 22 and was to end Jan. 26. No details were announced pending the vote.

The offer provides increased wages and improved working conditions retroactive to Jan. 1, 1969. It was made seven hours before a deadline that the union previously had extended 24 hours. The IAM said negotations under the Railway Labor Act dragged on for more than 14 months.

Settlements with other major airlines have given IAM members wage hikes up to 35 percent, plus major improvements on other terms.

Crossing Guard

Cabinet Panel Urges Winter Building Plan

Two cabinet officers have sent recommendations to the White House and Congress on winterizing the nation's construction industry to maintain employment levels during cold weather months.

Among the key suggestions are plans for developing new federal financial incentives for contractors to encourage winter employment. These were not spelled out, however.

The recommendations came in a report from Secretaries George P. Shultz of Labor and Maurice H. Stans of Commerce. These suggestions are the result of a recent study by the Bureau of Labor Statistics on the seasonal job problems in the building industry.

The BLS found that fluctuations in employment in construction are caused by traditional management practices and customs as much as the cold weather conditions.

The study noted that between 1960-68 unemployment in the building trades averaged 11.1 percent, compared with 5.2 percent for all industries.

Shultz and Stans said in their report that "the nation's rapidly rising construction requirements present a challenge and afford an opportunity to move toward full utilization of the construction labor force."

They recommended that the national manpower policy be more directly related to stabilization of construction employment. Among their proposals in this area were:

- Expansion of apprenticeship training, skill enrichment and minority employment programs to provide the range of qualified workers needed by a more stable labor force.
- Development of a local construction labor market information system in cooperation with Building Trades unions, and contractors through a computerized job matching program.
- Negotiations between labor and management for contracts "more consistent with all-weather construction."
- Establishment of an all-weather construction council in the industry with the assistance of government agencies.

Scheduling of government construction and public works projects during the winter off-season also figured in the recommendations.

The report urged more effective use of science and technology to attack the seasonality problem by:

- Development of "specialized weather data analysis" for the industry, since much of the extra cost of winter construction stems from uncertainty about temperature, precipitation, humidity and wind conditions.
- Establishment of an experimental project to improve federal research and information programs on winter building techniques.
- Creation of a two-way link between construction industry decision makers and federal technical centers.

Office Union Wins At Medical School

New York — Administrators at the Albert Einstein School of Medicine voted by a 90 percent margin for affiliation with the Office & Professional Employes in an election conducted by the New York State Labor Relations Board. Each of the 32 administrators has a university degree and is paid from $12,000 to $20,000 a year.

The vote reflects the fact that well-educated, high-salaried employes are turning to unions in increasing numbers, OPEIU Pres. Howard Coughlin said. He cited as reasons the "increased impersonality of doing business" in an automated world and the realization that many other once-glamorous professionals like air line pilots and entertainers have turned to unions for group action.

How Workers' Buying Power Slipped in '60s

The following figures, from records of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics, show how the buying power of workers' pay checks has failed to keep pace with wage advances in recent years.

Government economists attribute the lag mainly to increased living costs, with some due to higher taxes and a shortening of the work week. The figures are averages for a worker with three dependents on private, non-farm payrolls. Real take-home pay is in terms 1957-59 dollars.

| | Gross Earnings | Real Take-home |
| 1960 | $ 80.67 | $70.77 |
| 1961 | 82.60 | 71.48 |
| 1962 | 85.91 | 73.05 |
| 1963 | 88.46 | 73.63 |
| 1964 | 91.33 | 76.38 |
| 1965 | 95.06 | 78.53 |
| 1966 | 98.82 | 78.39 |
| 1967 | 101.94 | 78.13 |
| 1968 | 107.73 | 78.61 |
| 1969 | 114.61 | 78.30 |

For Average Worker:

Take-Home Pay Up, Buying Power Down

the 1957-59 average, meaning that goods and services that cost $10 in the base period now cost $13.13.

Take-home pay for the worker with three dependents averaged $102.01 a week in December, up 19 cents over the month. For the worker with no dependents the average was $92.89, up 18 cents.

Real spendable earnings—take-home pay in terms of 1957-59 dollars to reflect price changes—averaged $77.69 for a worker with three dependents in December and $70.75 for the worker with no dependents.

This real spendable earnings figure for the worker with three dependents was 1.1 percent below December 1968 and 2.4 percent below the high reached in September of that year, BLS said.

"December," it continued, "marked the eleventh consecutive month that real earnings have remained below year-ago levels."

For the year as a whole, real spendable earnings of the worker with three dependents averaged $78.30 a week, 31 cents less than they averaged in 1968, and also below 1966 and 1965 levels.

By comparison, the weekly after taxes take-home pay of the worker with three dependents averaged $99.99 in 1969, about 4.9 percent higher than the 1968 average of $95.28.

On the price front, the December index was 6.1 percent above December 1968, the largest rise for any 12-month period since November 1951, the government said.

Although prices rose slightly less in the last half of 1969 than in the first half, the last quarter of the year showed another steady upward trend. The rise was four-tenths of 1 percent in October and five-tenths of 1 percent in November.

Food prices were the major factor in the December index rise, climbing 1.4 percent, much more than is normal for the month. Consumer services rose by seven-tenths of 1 percent. Most durable goods and nondurable commodities also registered increases from November.

For 1969 as a whole, the Consumer Price Index averaged 5.4 percent above the 1968 level. The gain for 1968 was 4.2 percent and the gain for 1967 was 2.8 percent.

The 1969 average increase was the largest in 18 years. In the Korean War year of 1951 the index averaged 8 percent above the level of the previous year.

For the year 1969 as a whole, these were some increases by individual categories over their 1968 averages:

Food, 5.2 percent; housing, 6.4 percent; homeowner costs 10.2 percent; apparel, 5.2 percent; transportation, 5.2 percent; and medical care, 6 percent.

About 134,000 workers will receive widely varying cost-of-living wage increases based on the December index. The largest group, 63,000 workers in the glass container industry will receive 1 percent increases.

Approximately 12,000 other workers whose escalation reviews are tied to the December index will not receive pay adjustments because they have already received the maximums stipulated in their contracts.

Key Indicators Point Up Warning of Recession

The Commerce Dept. said that after adjusting for price increases in terms of 1958 dollars the gross national product—total output of goods and services—inched downward from an annual rate of $730.6 billion to $730.5 billion between the third and fourth quarters of 1969.

Although the government considers a change of only $100 million in the GNP as insignificant, another decline in the first quarter of 1970 could signal a recession. The National Bureau of Economic Research, composed of leading economists representing a wide variety of groups across the nation, considers a GNP slump for two consecutive quarters as one indication of a recession.

A second Commerce Dept. report showed that housing starts, which have decreased in 10 of the last 11 months, reached a 1969 low of an annual rate of 1,245,000 in December.

The drop in December was 4 percent from November and 15 percent from December 1968. In the last half of 1969, the department added, starts were down 15 percent from the first half and 13 percent below the last half of 1968.

Still another Commerce Dept. report found that personal income increased by only $2.3 billion in December to an annual rate of $769.7 billion. The increase in November was $3.7 billion and the gain in December 1968 was $4.5 billion.

The December increase was the smallest monthly gain in 1969 and less than half the monthly average gain of $5.2 billion for the first half of the year.

In another area, the Federal Reserve Board announced that industrial output in December dipped to 170.9 percent of the 1957-59 average, down from 171.4 percent in November. It was the fifth consecutive month of decline.

The important manufacturing category of the index dropped seven-tenths of 1 percent—from 171.9 percent in November to 171.2 percent in December. All of the decline was in durable goods.

Goldfinger explained how the Administration's policies "might well" produce inflation and recession simultaneously:

"High interest rates have stifled housing and hurt small businesses, and that means lost jobs," he said. "High interest rates force higher prices on services and products, and that means more inflation."

As an example of the "harsh effect" high-interest rates are having on home buyers, Goldfinger noted that the increase in FHA and VA mortgage rates from 7.5 to 8.5 percent "means an increase in monthly payments on principal and interest of about 10 percent on a 30-year mortgage of $20,000."

This increased rate which was effective Jan. 1, he added, "results in approximately $5,000 in additional payments over the life of the mortgage—more than the total cost of wages and benefits going to the workers who built the house."

Veto Battle Set:

Senate Votes Funds For Schools, Health

brought rare unanimity among Democrats in the Senate. And at a House Democratic caucus, no one opposed a resolution rejecting the President's claim that the added funds are inflationary. The resolution said school and health funding deserve "top priority."

A companion resolution charged that the Administration's tight money policy not only has failed to stop inflation but has increased unemployment.

With its biggest appropriations battle from last year's budget still to come, Congress will soon be faced with a rerun. The budget for the fiscal year starting July 1 is scheduled to be submitted in late January.

With an election coming up next fall for the entire House and 35 Senate seats, House and Senate leaders are trying to work out procedures to speed up the appropriations process.

Most of the government operated from last July until December on stop-gap continuing resolutions enabling them to meet payrolls and expenses until their appropriations were passed.

The veto-threatened bill—the last big departmental appropriations bill that has not become law—includes funds for the Labor Dept., the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, the Office of Economic Opportunity and a number of independent agencies, including the National Labor Relations Board.

Even a partial list of major legislation left over from the first session presents a staggering agenda for Congress this year.

The House Ways & Means Committee has begun work on an overhaul of the social security system—including proposals for revamping the federal welfare program.

The Senate has not yet acted on House-passed bills extending the basic aid to education program, broadening unemployment compensation or initiating a constitutional amendment for direct election of the President and Vice President.

The House has yet to act on Senate-approved major improvements in the food stamp program.

Neither house has acted on overall safety and occupational health legislation, on increasing the minimum wage, on bargaining rights for farm workers or on crime control bills.

With Congress likely to be impatient for an early election-year adjournment, the Administration will have to speed up its timetable for getting its new legislative proposals to committee.

During the first session, committee chairmen complained sharply that the White House or the President would announce a new proposal with great fanfare—but weeks and often months would go by before the detailed legislative proposals were sent to Capitol Hill.

ment to create a "new federalism" and reform to "expand the range of opportunities for all Americans," including voting, jobs and ownership.

He made no specific mention of labor legislation but said he will propose programs for health, education, housing and transportation "as well as in other critical areas . . ."

The speech noted that the President will send a separate report on foreign policy to Congress, but he reviewed briefly his "Guam policy," that "neither the defense nor the development of other nations can be exclusively or primarily an American undertaking." The approach will be "not a retreat from responsibility" for peace and freedom "but a sharing of responsibility."

This policy, he emphasized, is the key to current arms limitations talks with the Soviet Union and new talks in Warsaw with the Chinese Communists.

While stressing domestically the need for overall reform, he spoke specifically about inflation, laying the blame for rising prices on government policies of the 1960s.

He noted the balanced budget in fiscal 1969, his plans for a surplus in 1970 and that "in spite of the fact that Congress reduced revenues by $3 billion, I shall present a balanced budget for 1971."

This will mean, he said, "rejecting spending programs which would benefit some of the people when their net effect would result in price increases for all the people."

On law enforcement he said that Congress has not adopted the package of bills for the District of Columbia that he sent up last year.

Nearly half of the address was devoted to what the President said "may well become the major concern of the American people" in the 1970s—enviromental pollution and the way people live their lives.

He included in the "quality of American life" approach the plight of the cities and said the federal government "must be in a position to assist in the building of new cities and the rebuilding of old ones."

Progress towards a new America in the 1970s is realistically posisble, the President asserted, although the demands of 1976 "are even greater than in 1776. He added:

"Above all, let us inspire young Americans with a sense of excitement, a sense of destiny, a sense of involvement in meeting the challenges we face in this great period of our history. Only then are they going to have any sense of satisfaction in their lives."

Baltimore Unions Air 50,000-Watt 'Voice'

Baltimore—AFL-CIO unions in Maryland have turned to radio to keep in touch with their members and the public with a program called "The Voice of the Union."

The long and frustrating summer of the 1968 election campaign convinced the Baltimore central body that new and more effective means for two-way contact between union members and leadership had to be found.

Pres. Dominic N. Fornaro called on a labor-allied Baltimore public relations firm to work on the problem. The result was "The Voice of the Union," a weekly hour-long, open line, talk and call-in radio program, on Baltimore's 50,000 watt NBC affiliate, WBAL.

Fornaro credits the program's success on the readiness of council affiliates to give a new idea a fair trial—and to the real and personal interest that rank-and-file union members have in labor affairs and public issues.

The Baltimore unions are finding that the program's complete versatility makes it adaptable to all sorts of situations.

So far, the instant, two-way give-and-take format has given union members and the public at large up-to-the-minute developments in contract negotiations with community-wide implications; aided voter registration drives; given workers a chance to tell their story in organizing campaigns; helped explain such complex issues as tax reform and the Farm Worker's grape boycott; explored issues and questions before the Maryland legislature and Congress; and, in one instance, produced a swarm of membership applications to a federal employe local that was nearly stalled in its efforts to reach new prospects in the agency.

The scope of the program has also been expanded with the incorporation of a short national labor news summary and promotion spots for international unions.

"This is the best device we've found yet to reach both our union members and the community-at-large with labor's story," Fornaro said. "It has created an ever greater understanding of the role of trade unions in the community. We've found this true with public officials, civic leaders and a wide range of Baltimoreans."

Canada Endorses Switch to Metrics

Ottawa—The Canadian government has endorsed a switch to the metric system, but it isn't planning any immediate legislation to end the inches and pounds system.

A government white paper on the subject said such a switch would put Canada in a more "favorable position" in the world market.

Murphy Gets Hearing For Bill to Ban Strikes

California's Sen. George Murphy (R) shopped around and found a friendly Senate Agriculture subcommittee to hold hearings on his bill to outlaw strikes and boycotts by farm workers.

Legislation affecting strikes and bargaining rights clearly falls in the jurisdiction of the Senate Labor Committee, legislative experts noted, and Murphy said it has been agreed that there will be further hearings by the Labor Committee.

Meanwhile, however, he has a sympathetic forum.

Democratic members of the Agricultural Research & General Legislation subcommittee are Senators B. Everett Jordan (N.C.), James O. Eastland (Miss.), Herman E. Talmadge (Ga.) and James B. Allen (Ala.).

Republican subcommittee members are Milton R. Young (N.D.), Carl T. Curtis (Neb.) and Robert J. Dole (Kan.).

Witnesses lined up for the three days of hearings include the National Right to Work Committee, the American Farm Bureau Federation, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the California Grape & Tree Fruit League.

Murphy will testify too. Like the other witnesses, he is in favor of his bill.

Democrats in Congress Pledge Pollution Action

Congressional Democratic leaders unveiled a massive legislative program to combat pollution and pledged to give it top priority in the current session of Congress.

In an unusual—almost unprecedented—joint news conference, the majority leaders of the House and Senate and House Speaker John W. McCormack outlined the Democratic program.

It calls for appropriating the full $1.25 billion in federal funds that Congress has authorized for sewage plant construction grants for the coming fiscal year.

This year, Congress tripled the amount the Administration had requested and voted $800 million for the program.

Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield said the cost would be high, but it would be much more costly if any more time were lost in combatting environmental pollution.

"The time is now, and I repeat now, to face up to this problem of blight caused by our own blindness and recognize that not millions, not hundreds of millions, but billions of dollars will be given to be spent to cope with this problem."

House Majority Leader Carl Albert, Mansfield and McCormack announced plans to set up a joint House-Senate Committee on the Environment. It would have investigative and fact-finding functions, but not legislative jurisdiction.

The Democrats also called for the development of "innovative" new means for financing the cost of the war on pollution and said private industry "should divert some of its profits to cope with this problem which it helped create."

A national land-use policy was also recommended to replace the "haphazard" system of selection of industrial and park sites.

The leaders pledged that Congress would complete action by mid-February on the Water Quality Improvement Act, which set penalties for leakage of off-shore oil wells and other causes of water pollution.

Since the Democratic announcement was made on the eve of the President's State of the Union message, a reporter asked if they were attempting to "steal the thunder" of the President on environmental quality.

Albert termed the President a "Johnny-come-lately" in the field, with proposals that substitute rhetoric for needed funds.

On behalf of the congressional Democrats, he said: "We are ready to make the investment which must be made in this decade of the 1970s."

Cutback Expected In Construction

New York—In its annual industry outlook, Johns-Manville Corp. forecasts that the Administration's anti-inflationary measure will result in a sharp cutback in construction spending in 1970.

The survey estimates that even with cost increases construction spending this year will be about $88.4 billion compared to $90.8 billion spent in 1969.

It forecasts that housing starts will drop to 1.3 million in 1970. There were 1.5 million starts last year.

Meany Cites Needs:

Catch-Up Pay Urged For Federal Jobs

Federal employes need and deserve a catch-up pay raise, fringe benefits at least equal to private industry and strengthened bargaining rights, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

He pledged the labor movement's full support for these goals at a dinner attended by nearly 2,400 members of the American Federation of Government Employes and prominent guests from federal agencies, Congress and unions.

The occasion was the 87th anniversary of the Civil Service Act, which established the merit system in federal employment. The AFGE celebrates the anniversary each year with a banquet in Washington and observances throughout the nation.

Just as do other workers, Meany said, "the federal worker needs an adequate income, sound job security, realistic protection against the hazards of illness and old age, and a chance to make continuing progress for himself and his family. He has to clothe and house and educate and care for his family, just as does any other worker."

This identity of interests, Meany noted, is reflected in the rapid growth of unionism in the federal service—with the AFGE itself more than tripling its membership in eight years and with more than 1.4 million federal workers covered by union contracts.

The AFL-CIO "fully supported" pay raises last year for the President, top agency officials, the judiciary and Congress, Meany noted.

But the same standard, he said, should apply "to the little guy on the federal payroll and it is high time Congress and the President faced up to it." It is "intolerable" that pay scales in the lower civil service grades should be near the poverty level, Meany said.

In take-home pay, "the federal worker suffers most," Meany noted, because 7 percent of his gross pay is deducted for his pension program and he pays more than 75 percent of the cost of health care insurance —both in contrast to the prevailing pattern of employer payments in private industry.

And while the government "has done a good job of integrating the federal workforce at the very lowest level of employment," its record in upgrading minority group workers "is certainly nothing to brag about."

Federal workers are also involved in the AFL-CIO's overall legislative program, Meany stressed. In the fight to override the veto of education and health funds, "the education of your children, the health of your families are involved. . . . This is your fight too."

And union members in the federal service "have a stake in the General Electric strike," Meany stressed. "Your continued growth depends upon a strong labor movement, exactly as all other workers depend on a strong labor movement for their continued progress."

GE's effort to break the unions in its plants "must fail if the trade union movement is to remain strong," Meany stressed.

AFGE Pres. John F. Griner, who is an AFL-CIO vice president, presided at the banquet and the anniversary program included brief remarks by Civil Service Commission Chairman Robert E. Hampton, Rep. Morris K. Udall (D-Ariz.) of the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee, and Sen. Frank E. Moss (D-Utah) of the Senate committee.

Head table guests were introduced as they came in by the doorkeeper of the House of Representatives, William H. (Fishbait) Miller. The chaplain of the Senate, the Rev. Ralph B. Elson, gave the invocation and benediction.

FEDERAL WORKERS have the labor movement's full support as they press for catch-up pay raises, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said. He spoke to 2,400 persons at a dinner sponsored by the American Federation of Government Employes on the 87th anniversary of the Civil Service Act.

Multinational Firms Capturing Growing Share of World Assets

The mushrooming growth of multinational companies poses a problem for the nations of the world in learning about them, much less being able to regulate them, AFL-CIO economist Elizabeth R. Jager writes in the current issue of the American Federationist.

Every major industrial nation has businesses that criss-cross national boundaries, Mrs. Jager writes, but U.S.-based firms had an estimated 60 percent of the world assets of such firms in 1966.

The foreign output of U.S.-based multinational firms alone is estimated at $120 billion to $200 billion per year, she says, and is probably "greater than the output of any nation in the world except the United States and the Soviet Union."

With affiliates and subsidiaries in as many as 40 countries, this "new form of business, the multinational corporation, is quietly revolutionizing the world's economy and moving more rapidly than governments' ability to regulate and control the effects," Mrs. Jager says.

Such questions as the firm's role in international relations, in the exporting of jobs or in affecting the balance of trade are largely unanswered because "no single country or group of countries knows details of company operations or how to control their effects."

A few characteristics of the multinationals are identifiable, Mrs. Jager says, and they are not as desirable as the firms would have you believe when they argue that the "efficient allocation of world resources" is better for everyone.

For instance, there is little evidence that these firms promote world competition, she notes. French economist Pierre Uri finds that foreign, like local firms, often have entered weak markets without much competition or have run out competitors by starting with massive price cuts.

"There have been estimates that the current direction of multinational business is to world domination by very few firms—one professor says 300, another says 600," the article notes.

Other identifiable characteristics are that multinational firms are concentrated in a few industries; are a new business process in approach to world markets and are leaders in research and development and in landing government contracts.

The multinationals' role in research often results in the exporting of U.S. technology through licensing agreements with affiliates—sometimes of methods which were developed under subsidy by the U.S. government, she writes.

The impact on labor relations is described as detrimental both in the home-base nation and in foreign countries. The threat of "runaway" facilities is detrimental to labor at the parent site, it is pointed out, and "in low-wage areas, attempts to improve wages and working conditions are often met with threats to move to other low-wage areas if the workers' standards improve."

Attempts at neutralizing the effects of the multinationals through international agreement have been resisted by multinational enterprises, who will agree only to a "code of good behavior" in each of the countries where affiliates are located, Mrs. Jager notes.

"If the firms don't want intergovernmental control and if cooperation among existing governments is clearly unable to solve the problems, the need for action becomes urgent," she says.

"The American challenge is the challenge to the nations of the world. To calm fears abroad and mounting concern at home, Congress and the Administration must adopt social and economic policies to assure that benefits actually come to the people of the world from the new management process called the multinational firm," she concludes.

DeAndrade Dies at 73, President of Pressmen

fellow trade unionists "loyally and well" since 1917. To the AFL-CIO Executive Council "he brought dedication, common sense and warm friendship," they said. "We shall miss him."

Funeral services were to be held Jan. 23 at Joseph Gawler's Sons funeral home, Wisconsin and Harrison Aves. N.W., Washington.

Born in Cambridge, Mass., DeAndrade went to work for Ginn & Co., textbook publishers, at an early age. He joined Boston Press Assistants Local 18 in 1917, and from 1919 through 1936 was president of that local union.

His service with the international union began in 1931, when he was appointed to the headquarters staff. That same year he became a trustee of the IPPAU's technical trade school.

DeAndrade was named an international vice president to fill a vacancy in 1945, and stayed on the executive board in that capacity until May 6, 1959, when directors chose him president on the death of Thomas E. Dunwody.

DeAndrade became an AFL-CIO vice president in 1965. Active in promoting the use of union label goods and services, he had been vice president of the federation's Union Label & Service Trades Dept. since 1961.

He served as American labor delegate to the tripartite technical meeting for the printing and allied trades of the International Labor Organization in Geneva, Switzerland, in 1962. He was a fraternal AFL-CIO delegate to the British Trades Union Congress in Brighton, England, in 1963.

Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson appointed him in 1964 to serve on the labor advisory council of the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity, and on a similar committee for employment of the handicapped.

He is survived by his wife Elizabeth; son Walter of Cheshire, Conn.; daughter Mrs. Frank Rinna of Corona del Mar, Calif., and four grandchildren.

Union-Won Pacts in '69 Boost Pay 7.1 Percent

Union-negotiated contract settlements in 1969 gave nearly 2.5 million workers wage increases averaging 7.1 percent of straight-time hourly rates, the Labor Dept. reported.

Considering wages only, the settlements were well above the 5.2 percent increases won in the preceding year, the department's Bureau of Labor Statistics said. Its preliminary survey dealt with contracts covering 1,000 or more workers.

The 7.1 percent figure was the midway point in a table of increases ranging from 4 percent or less to 17 percent. The median was 8.8 percent in nonmanufacturing industries, 5.9 percent in manufacturing.

The survey covered wage hikes won for 1.2 million employes of manufacturing firms, 1.19 million in nonmanufacturing firms.

BLS said its figures were based on major settlements in metalworking industries, building construction, transportation, lumber, petroleum products and wearing apparel.

All measures of change in 1969 were "up considerably from 1968 and prior years," the bureau found.

When fringe benefits were added, the median increase amounted to 8.2 percent a year with actual timing of union gains taken into account.

Other findings in the report:

- Considering first-year contract changes, the median adjustment was 8.2 percent of straight-time wages, compared with 7.2 percent for the preceding year.
- Acceleration of wage hikes continued, especially in nonmanufacturing. The median first-year raise was 10.4 percent in nonmanufacturing industries, 7.1 percent in manufacturing industries.

The bureau said its estimates do not include wage hikes due to cost-of-living escalator clauses, unless guaranteed by the contract.

Mediators Cite Turn In GE Talks

By Eugene A. Kelly

New York — Federal mediators reported progress toward a possible settlement of the contract dispute that has kept 150,000 General Electric Co. workers on strike since Oct. 27.

Union negotiators and management representatives met separately with the mediators until 1 a.m., then returned for a 10 a.m. session Jan. 29. As the bargaining intensified, both sides agreed to a news blackout on the details of their discussions.

Around union strike headquarters there was an air of cautious optimism. It was emphasized, however, that final settlement depends on satisfactory contract language and approval by union committees and, in some cases, rank-and-file ratification.

As talks resumed, Dir. J. Curtis Counts of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service said through a spokesman, "We have a long day ahead of us." Other sources reported that tentative agreement had been reached on the basic terms of a new GE proposal but that many "housekeeping" details remain unsettled.

Even after agreement finally is achieved on the national level, local settlements still must be reached at almost every one of the 135 locations where strikers have stayed on picket lines through bitter winter weather. The strike is the longest ever conducted against GE, the nation's largest electrical manufacturer.

Two unions have national agreements with GE—the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers for some 90,000 strikers, and the unaffiliated United Electrical Workers for nearly 20,000.

In other developments:

- The National Labor Relations Board dismissed petitions to conduct decertification elections in units of GE plants at Bedford, O., and Bettendorf, Ia. It ruled that GE had bargained nationally with the IUE for at least 10 years, and that the unit is a national one. It upheld the union argument that petitions for separate plant units are not permissible.

- GE lost another legal battle against supplying a list of employes' names and addresses for union use. An NLRB trial examiner upheld the right of the IUE to such a list at GE plants employing 5,800 workers over a 30-mile area around Syracuse, N. Y.

The board has ruled in several similar cases that unions are entitled to an up-to-date list to be on an equal footing with management in communicating with members of the bargaining unit. Management contended such a

Education, Health Aid Face Cuts

By David L. Perlman

Congress set about trying to pick up the pieces of the nation's education and health programs in the wake of Pres. Nixon's veto of legislation to finance them.

The AFL-CIO denounced the veto, deplored the failure of Congress to override it, and predicted that the President's "political victory will prove hollow indeed when November rolls around" and America goes to the polls.

Urgency was the keynote as school districts throughout the nation faced the choice between bankruptcy or sharp mid-year cutbacks unless federal funds are restored.

A majority of the House—226-to-191—voted to override the President's veto. But the vote fell short of the two-thirds margin required by the Constitution.

Because "the President had his way" on the veto, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said, "the nation's children and the ill will pay the bill."

Most House Republicans had originally voted for the increased funds rejected by the President. The money was necessary, they said at the time—essential. But on the showdown, only a relative handful bucked the White House pressure.

Voting to override the veto were 199 Democrats and 27 Republicans.

Voting against the money for school and health programs were 156 Republicans and 35 Democrats.

Pres. Nixon used his veto power for the first time before a nationwide television audience. The legislation, he insisted, was "inflationary."

It provided $1.3 billion more

Minorities Training Set for Pipefitters

A union-employer-government agreement will enable 500 Negroes and other minority group workers to become journeymen pipefitters, even though they are above the normal apprentice age and may lack customary educational qualifications.

Those chosen, under a nationwide program concentrated in areas where there are shortages of skilled pipefitters, will be primarily men who have had some related work experience.

The greater their previous experience, the shorter the training period necessary to earn a journeyman's card and the higher their pay rate while in training.

Pres. Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumbers & Pipefitters, Pres. Philip S. Lyon of the National Constructors Association and Labor Sec. George P. Shultz signed the agreement at a Labor Dept. news conference.

The union's leadership role in the program was hailed by Shultz, who termed the agreement "a major forward step to train workers and to get more minorities into the construction trades."

He praised Schoemann and the union for providing "both on-the-job training and related classroom instruction" for minority workers, adding:

"Members of the Plumbers & Pipefitters union, who are among the highest skilled workers in America, should take justifiable pride in opening opportunitieis for everyone, regardless of race."

Special training programs will be financed largely by a $1.4 million grant from the Labor Dept., although part of the expense will be borne by the union and the employers.

The constructors association is made up of 33 contractors specializing in heavy industrial construction. The member companies operate nationwide, but draw their labor force from the localities where they work.

Doctors Urged To Join Drive On Health Plan

Philadelphia—The medical profession has been challenged to join the AFL-CIO in a drive for a national health insurance program "to make American health care the best in the world."

Enactment of the program, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller told doctors here, is essential to ending a health crisis "that has been with us for too many years with too little attention being paid to it."

Biemiller spoke at the installation of Dr. Jonathan E. Rhoads as the 109th president of the Philadelphia Medical Society. Rhoads,

Minimum Wage Increases Due 2.1 Million Workers

An estimated 2.1 million workers making less than $1.45 an hour will have their pay raised as of Feb. 1 under a step-up provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

They are among some 10 million persons who were brought under wage-hour coverage in 1966 and have another year to go until they catch up with the $1.60 an hour rate that applies to previously covered workers.

The $1.45 minimum applies chiefly to employes of smaller retail or service establishments, laundries and dry cleaners, hotels, motels and restaurants, schools, hospitals and nursing homes. The Labor Dept. estimates that about one-fifth of those covered now earn less than $1.45 and the increase they will receive will total about $486 million a year.

One group of workers brought under the law in 1966 remains stuck at the $1.30 wage floor. For some 400,000 farm workers, the law provided step-ups only to $1.30 an hour—a figure reached last year.

New Dressmaker Pact Boosts Pay 20 Percent

New York—Wage increases totaling 20 percent were won by the Ladies' Garment Workers for 80,000 dressmakers in the eight-state New York metropolitan area in a contract settlement with eastern dress manufacturers unprecedented in its size.

Besides three-step pay increases in the three-year agreement, the union's negotiators won higher craft minimums and piecework rates, a third week's paid vacation after one year of service, an additional paid holiday—the birthday of the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr.—and a boost in retirement fund contributions by the employing dress firms.

ILGWU Pres. Louis Stulberg, who joined union negotiators in the later stages of bargaining, praised labor and management bargainers for an agreement containing "more advances in every respect" than any other pact in ILGWU history.

The terms of the pact were detailed by Vice Pres. Charles S. Zimmerman, who headed the union negotiating team as general manager of the Dress Joint Council. They won emphatic approval at meetings of New York shop

Strikers Plead Case to People Of Cincinnati

Cincinnati — Striking city employes have taken their case to the people of Cincinnati after more than three weeks of refusal by city officials to bargain with the State, County & Municipal Employes.

SCME District 51 has begun an informational campaign designed to show that 3,800 white and blue collar workers need raises like those granted other city employes.

After failing to get equal treatment from the city, the workers walked out early in January. Their strike has shut down garbage disposal, highway maintenance and other city services.

The strikers are seeking the same $945 a year raise given earlier to police and firemen. The city has offered a 5 percent increase that would give most workers about $400 a year in higher wages, the union estimates.

District 51's informational campaign stresses these points:

- Cincinnati wage scales are below those of comparable cities in Ohio and across the nation.
- Most Cincinnati city workers earn wages well below the U.S. Labor Dept.'s estimate of what such workers need for a modest family income.
- The city continues to ignore the striking workers' needs. It forced the strike and now prolongs it by its take-it-or-leave-it bargaining stance.

Staff Dir. Al Van Hagen of District 51 said the union is determined to see that Cincinnati "lives up to its duty as a major U.S. city in the 20th Century and bargains fairly with its employes." He said, "We know Cincinnati residents are sympathetic and anxious to see fair play."

Meanwhile, the union has begun assisting members who need financial and legal help.

Wilson Calls For Steps To Cure Social Crises

New York—British Prime Minister Harold Wilson has called for a "new special relationship" between the United States and Britain to solve the pressing urban and social problems that confront the world's industrial nations.

On the eve of talks with Pres. Nixon in Washington, Wilson told an audience here, "It is not the organization of power blocs we shall be discussing. It is the organization of social power to mobilize social resources to overcome social evils."

Wilson, who was introduced by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, spoke to 400 representatives of labor and management at Automation House, the headquarters of the American Foundation on Automation & Employment.

The meeting was jointly sponsored by the foundation, formed by the Machinists and management, and the Institute of Collective Bargaining & Group Relations, a joint labor-management organization headed by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland.

Wilson said the "new relationship" for the 1970s should involve not only the United States and Britain but also other advanced industrial countries on:

- "Problems deriving from the urban explosion of an expanding affluent society, the planning of our environment, the housing of our people, urban transport, pollution of the air we breathe, the waters in our lands, law and order.
- "The inherited problems of poverty and blight in urban housing, urban decay and slum schools.
- "The problems of individual poverty—the underprivileged of all ages, the long-term sick, the disabled, the mentally handicapped."

In discussing Britain's efforts to cure its social ills, Wilson said, "we want to show you what we have achieved by government action to mobilize a community to tackle its problems."

However, "on some of these problems," he added, "we shall have a great deal to learn from your experience."

In another area, Wilson traced steps taken by Britain to strengthen its economy and increase its share of production going into exports. The steps have included restraint on incomes, wages, prices and dividends paid out of profits.

He singled out the foundation's headquarters as an appropriate setting for his "progress report" on Britain's economy.

This is so, he said, because the foundation "is concerned with a problem which has been central to the British government's policies and priorities . . . the challenge of industrial change."

chairman of the surgery department at the University of Pennsylvania School of Medicine, is a long-time acquaintance of Biemiller's.

America spends a higher percentage of its gross national product for health care than any other country in the world, yet "it is not even in the top ten" when it comes to the vital statistics of health care, Biemiller pointed out.

Fifteen other countries have longer average life expectancies, he noted. Twelve others have longer life expectancies for 10-year-old females; 31 others have longer life expectancies for 10-year-old males, and 14 others have lower infant mortality rates.

For non-whites, the poor and city ghetto residents, Biemiller continued, "the life expectancy rate is seven years less than the average white American rate."

Labor, he emphasized, "finds those statistics intolerable."

Turning to health care costs, Biemiller said that while the overall cost of living rose about 25 percent in the past 10 years, hospital daily service charges shot up 150 percent and doctors' fees jumped 50 percent.

He cited additional figures to disprove the charges of those who place the main blame for high medical prices on Medicare and Medicaid costs, and increased pay for hospital employes.

Labor will continue its efforts to bring low-wage hospital employes under the minimum wage law and organize them into unions, Biemiller said, in line with a responsibility to "increase wages and better working conditions whenever and wherever possible."

In other areas, Biemiller described a medical picture in the nation marked by an overall shortage of doctors, their concentration in large cities and well-to-do areas, and enormous waste through duplicated medical facilities.

Too often, he stated, "financial considerations, not medical considerations, determine where and how medical services are delivered, and even by whom, and who will have access to them and who won't."

"Private insurance financing has too often forced the practice of medicine on the basis of the fine print in a [medical] insurance policy, rather than on the basis of health needs."

In place of any rational system for the delivery and financing of medical and health care, Biemiller said, the nation has a "confusing, inefficient, often inaccessible, and always expensive piece-rate, cost-plus, unevenly distributed system."

National health insurance is the one way to bring organization to the delivery of medical care and allow "all persons to enter the mainstream of health care on an equal basis and with assurance of first class care," Biemiller said.

The AFL-CIO, he explained, envisions the program as providing a complete range of health services and benefits, being financed like social security, offering free choice of physicians and health delivery systems and making doctors' participation voluntary.

Biemiller sharply criticized the American Medical Association for "bitterly and blindly" having fought disability benefits under social security, Medicare and many other progressive health measures that became reality.

As a result, he said, the AMA's influence in Congress has steadily waned.

"We do not believe the American people will brook further delay in the passage of national health insurance legislation," he concluded, "and we hope the AMA will proceed from that premise and avoid its traditional role of absolute opposition to the new day that is here."

Labor Dept. Sets New Overtime Salary Test

The Labor Dept. bowed to employer protests and trimmed back its proposal to raise the minimum salary that must be paid to an "executive" or "professional" employe before he can be excluded from the overtime provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

At issue is whether an employer can get around the wage-hour law by giving a modestly-paid worker a title and paper responsibilities in place of time-and-one-half pay after 40 hours a week.

Under the new Labor Dept. regulation, effective Feb. 20, an exempt "executive" must be paid at least $125 a week, and a "professional" employe must be paid overtime if he makes less than $140 a week. A less stringent job definition of executive and professional positions is applied for higher-salaried employes, those making at least $200 a week.

The present regulations, set in 1963, established a salary test of $100 for executive and administrative employes, $115 for professionals and $150 for the "high-salary" exemption.

The Labor Dept. last June proposed a $130 test for executives and a $150 requirement for professionals, and invited comments.

The AFL-CIO said the proposed figures were much too low, and asked that the minimum rate for exempt executives and supervisors be at least $150 a week, and $175 for professionals.

Employers said the Labor Dept. proposal was too high—and Wage-Hour Administrator Robert D. Moran agreed with them.

He dropped the salary test for executives by $5 and the test for professionals by $10 a week.

In addition, he allowed a lower rate during 1970 for establishments brought under the wage-hour law for the first time in 1966. For these recently-covered groups, employes can be exempt as executives even if they only make $115 a week and professionals if they make only $130. The high-salary test will be $175. The salary requirements will move up to the level of other groups on Feb. 1, 1971.

In Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands and American Samoa, the exemption test will be $115 for executives, $100 for administrative employes and $125 for professionals.

Persons who meet the Labor Dept. definitions of executives or professionals—by job duties as well as salaries—may still be paid overtime rates under union contract or by agreement of the employer. But the premium rates are not required by federal law.

National Health System Keyed to Quality Care

New York—A national health insurance system "can be the unifying principle" in the essential drive to secure quality medical care for all Americans, a university educator emphasized here.

The speaker, at a meeting sponsored by the United Hospital Fund of New York, was Prof. Raymond Munts of the University of Wisconsin. He is a former assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security.

National health insurance, Munts said, can provide "health security" for everyone and at the same time bring more vitality to planning and innovations in health care.

The program, he noted, would require a strong degree of coordination in federal health and social security agencies that does not presently exist.

Munts described national health insurance as being in the interest of medicine, business, labor and the public. He explained:

It is in the interest of the American Medical Association if it will only realize that doctors have "done well" under Medicare, Medicaid and other government programs.

It is in the interest of businessmen who should be concerned about paying health insurance premiums "that are rising at 10 percent a year" under the present non-system of medical care.

"It is of special interest to union members who have pioneered the development of group health insurance and experienced its limitations.

"It is vital to the sick, the poor, the subemployed who have no regular place of work and have to wait until they are 65 to get health insurance."

Since the public pays the taxes that support the medical schools and hospitals that are the training ground for private medicine, the public interest in health care is "too vital to leave major decisions only to medical professionals," Munts declared.

He concluded that it is both possible and necessary for Congress to enact a national health insurance plan that will be equitable to all citizens and advance new concepts in health care.

Minnesota Pact Clears Way for Prefab Houses

Bloomington, Minn.—The first models of union-made low-cost housing modules are expected to roll off the assembly line of Pemtom, Inc., here Feb. 1.

The production of the prefabricated housing units is the result of a recent agreement signed by the Minnesota State Building & Construction Trades Council, three AFL-CIO affiliates and management representatives of Pemtom.

The participating unions in the agreement are the Carpenters, the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Minnesota Gov. Harold LeVander presented a certificate of honor to the state building trades council for its part in reaching the collective bargaining agreement.

LeVander noted that low-cost housing construction programs should lead to easing Minnesota's housing crisis. He said the agreement demonstrates the ability of the unions and management of Pemtom to meet the responsibility to people of the state.

Asks Stiff Pollution Controls:

Ohio Labor Leads Clean Air Campaign

Cleveland—Led by legions of labor officials and rank-and-file workers, more than 1,500 citizens stormed Cleveland's city council chambers to demand that the Ohio Air Pollution Control Board set stiff air pollution control standards. And they may have won their case.

Ohio is in the process of implementing the Federal Air Quality Act of 1967. Under the act, the U.S. Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare designates regions where air pollution is a severe problem. Ohio has five.

The first step in the act calls for the state to set "ambient air quality standards" for sulfur dioxide and soot. The state administration, with a long-time reputation for coddling industry, set standards that slashed health and safety margins razor thin.

The Ohio AFL-CIO joined with the Ohio Tuberculosis & Health Association and the Ohio Council of Churches to form a coalition they called the "breathers' lobby." Their purpose was to fight for clean air.

Drawing upon the experience of Pennsylvania unions in their fight for similar stringent standards, the groups set up a statewide air pollution workshop where representatives from various conservation groups, civic and social clubs, fraternal associations and rank-and-file unionists were instructed on how to testify at the scheduled hearings.

The first hearing was held Dec. 17 in Cincinnati and more than 600 citizens turned out. But the pollution board refused to allow citizens and "breathers' lobby" witnesses to testify until all industry spokesmen were given an opportunity to talk. Some union men, who had registered to testify as early as 7:45 a.m., were not called to testify until after 4 p.m.

The Cincinnati hearing was nearly broken up by irate women who grabbed the microphone from business witnesses and yelled, "When can we testify? We have to go home soon. Our children will be coming home from school."

The board's answer was to have the women ushered out of the hearing room.

But the public pressure was not completely forgotten. Several weeks later as it planned for a similar hearing in Cleveland, the Air Pollution Control Board said witnesses to testify would be drawn in a lottery fashion.

As the date for the Cleveland hearing drew nearer, the "breathers' lobby" appealed to the board to change the location because Cleveland's city council chambers were not large enough to hold the expected crowds. The board's only answer was that the council chambers could handle 1,000 persons.

On the date of the hearing, about 1,000 persons were jammed inside the chambers while about 500 others marched outside the building.

Cleveland Mayor Carl B. Stokes, who criticized the state for its lax attitude and lack of action on air pollution, opened the city's spacious music hall and the hearing was moved there.

Rep. Charles Vanik (D-Ohio) testified for stronger federal air pollution standards. State Rep. Patrick Sweeney, a Cleveland Democrat, told the board it should adopt strict air pollution standards or resign. A thundering ovation followed Sweeney's remarks.

For two days, hundreds of witnesses — housewives, union workers, health officials, scientists, garden club enthusiasts, doctors and even children—went before the board and demanded clean air.

Some Ohio officials seemed perturbed at the attitude of the citizens. Others fell asleep while the citizens were presenting their cases. Still others let loose with sighs of relief when the hearings were abruptly called to a halt.

But the "breathers' lobby" could count some gains, even though total victory has not yet been won. The tremendous public pressure exerted at the Cleveland hearing caused the air pollution board to shift its position and recommend more stringent sulfur dioxide and soot standards for the Cincinnati region.

It is hoped that the Cincinnati standards will be adopted throughout Ohio. Meanwhile, organized labor and other participants in the "breathers' lobby" will maintain a full alert lest the state bow to the wishes of the polluters.

Labor Backs Full Funds to Curb Pollution

The AFL-CIO has pledged its "active and enthusiastic support" to a bipartisan group of congressmen seeking full funding of the federal program to eliminate water pollution.

The seven congressmen last year successfully led a drive to raise appropriations for the Clean Water Restoration Act from the budget request of only $214 million to $800 million.

For the coming fiscal year, they have set as their goal the full $1.25 billion in appropriations that the law authorizes for federal grants to help states and cities construct waste treatment facilities.

In a letter to Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller praised the action of Congress in raising the level of funding "from the woefully inadequate $214 million recommended by the Administration."

He said the AFL-CIO considers the $1.25 billion goal for the 1971 fiscal year "essential as part of our national effort to clean up America's waterways."

Mediators Cite Turn In GE Strike Talks

list is not provided for in the national agreement between IUE and GE.

Meanwhile, union spokesmen urged pickets to remain firm until a settlement actually is reached. They asked also that unions and members continue their financial support of strikers until GE employes actually return to work at full strength.

The AFL-CIO has sent checks for $2 million to the strikers in the nationwide labor campaign to collect at least $1 per union member for the needs of the strikers and their families. The fund collection for the GE Strike Relief Fund is scheduled to continue as long as the need exists.

In New York City, the Ladies' Garment Workers urged stepped-up contributions by ILGWU members to the AFL-CIO fund. Many strikers must subsist on $12 a week in strike benefits, the ILGWU reminded union chairmen voting to accept new contracts with 20 percent wage increases and other gains.

Until Counts entered the picture here, GE had resisted union efforts to bargain realistically. It had made one take-it-or-leave-it offer last August, amended it slightly long after the strike started in October, and steadfastly rebuffed all attempts to bargain with union representatives on an item-by-item basis.

The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals here ruled months ago that the GE bargaining system violates the federal labor law because it prevents real good-faith negotiations. The company has appealed the decision to the Supreme Court.

Unions call the GE system of restricted bargaining Boulwarism, after Lemuel Boulware, retired company labor relations director who initiated the policy.

chairmen, chairladies and joint council delegates.

Settlement of one major issue—craft minimums—was reached one hour before a session of shop chairmen called to ratify the settlement or authorize a strike vote.

Stulberg congratulated negotiators for their insistence on a "truly substantial" wage increase in the face of a hostile political climate and the strike forced on 150,000 workers by the General Electric Co.

"Dress industry employers are apparently a far cry from those who are running GE," he told the meetings.

The settlement calls for a 10 percent wage increase on all work performed on and after Feb. 16, and additional hikes of 5 percent as of Feb. 1, 1971, and 5 percent a year later.

Pieceworkers are guaranteed the same percentage increases by adding the increases to the basic rates now existing. Those rates, now at 100 percent above the original base rate, rise in steps to 120, 130 and 140 percent—a method of computation long familiar in the industry.

Craft minimums were raised at the same time by at least the same percentages, and in some instances more, the ILGWU said.

Vacation benefits, when fully implemented by employer contributions, will provide a third week's paid vacation. To achieve this, employers begin paying an additional 1 percent of payroll this year into the vacation fund, and another 1 percent in 1971. The additional contribution in 1972 will rise to 2 percent of payroll, the amount needed to finance the full vacation.

Employes with six months of service will continue to get a two-week vacation until they qualify for the new benefit.

Adding the late Dr. King's birthday anniversary, Jan. 15, to the paid holiday list will raise the total to 8.5 days per year.

The retirement fund contribution by employers was increased by half of 1 percent to a total of 5 percent, primarily to help finance a $10 boost in monthly union pensions which became effective in January.

Stulberg reminded union chairmen at the report meetings that the ILGWU's "insistence on truly substantial" wage increases reflected the union's determination to achieve real advances in the workers' earnings standards, rather than an attempt to "catch up with rising living costs."

He said the new contract also contains a wage-reopener clause that can be used during the term of the agreement, if necessity requires.

The settlement points the way toward contract improvements in upcoming negotiations in many other segments of the dress industry, the union said.

Employer negotiators were led by Nat Boriskin, executive director of the Popular Priced Dress Manufacturers group. Stulberg credited employer representatives for an understanding of the needs of area workers that led to a peaceful solution of their differences.

Planning Unit Proposes Migrant Aid Program

A campaign to end the misery of the migrant farm worker is being developed by the agriculture committee of the National Planning Association.

The key to the solution is the reduction of the migratory labor force through a concerted program to help the workers move into more productive farm and non-farm occupations, the NPA suggests.

Emphasis of the program rests on education, manpower training and new job opportunities—available to migrants in their home bases and in the migratory farm areas.

While working to diminish the number of migratory farm workers, the committee calls for improvements for the workers in these areas:

- Federal minimum wages at the prevailing national standard.
- Collective bargaining rights under the National Labor Relations Act.
- Extension of unemployment compensation, workmen's compensation and public assistance without residency requirements.

As the migrant labor force is reduced, growers will have to compete with other industries for workers by offering improved pay and benefits, the committee observed.

But it noted that government must recognize the conditions that will arise. It called for a reorientation of state and federal programs toward meeting farm labor needs by recruiting workers locally during peak harvest periods.

The possibility that these changes would bring major increases in food prices appears unlikely, the committee said, because field labor costs represent only a small fraction of the retail price of food.

Even if some price rises should occur, "the American consumer does not want to have his food costs subsidized by the misery of migrant workers and their families," the committee said.

The committee is made up of farmers, agricultural economists, leaders in farm organizations and representatives of agri-business organizations.

A wide educational program is recommended for both the migrants and their children, since the lack of education is considered to be the chief reason that generations of farm workers remain mired in stoop labor occupations.

"Improved education for migrant children will prove the most efficacious means of breaking the migratory labor poverty cycle. For older migrants, basic education and manpower training programs must be expanded and more job opportunities provided," the committee said.

The Profits Inflation

IN THE PAST DECADE, there has been no classical inflationary condition of too many dollars chasing too few goods. Neither has there been a manpower shortage.

The only inflationary demand pressure in the economy now is rising business investment in new plants and machines. This is a capital goods boom, and it has persisted in spite of the fact that industry has been operating at only 84 percent of capacity.

The Nixon Administration's tight money and 100-year record high interest rates have not yet affected the corporate capital goods boom or record-breaking profits of large corporations.

Military spending has accelerated sharply but excess profits derived from Viet Nam war production were not taxed, and the temporary surtax adopted in mid-1968 treated corporate and individual taxpayers as equals by levying the same 10 percent rate on each.

Large corporations, and big business in general, can borrow money to finance the capital goods boom at the lowest interest rates —the prime rate—while other borrowers pay the much higher price of money, which scales upward from the prime level. Those businesses and corporations that have not financed new capital goods investment and expansion with borrowed money, have been able to do it anyway out of cash flow from profits, which come from nine years of arbitrary price increases. Primarily these price increases are based on corporate management's desire to impress stockholders and the public with their professional ability to annually increase profits, earnings and assets. It's called "company growth" and it can all be found in the "annual report."

HOW INFLATIONARY are these profits? Between 1960 and the first half of 1969, corporate profits before taxes rose 93 percent. After-tax corporate profits zoomed 94.5 percent.

Compare the inflationary profits picture with that of non-agricultural workers' wages.

The cost-of-living in 1969 was up about 5.5 percent from a year ago, following a 4.2 percent increase in 1968. These increases in living costs washed-out the buying power of much of workers' wage gains.

This erosion of workers' earnings is a serious problem for millions of workers and their families.

Between 1960 and the first half of 1969, the weekly after-tax take-home pay of the average non-supervisory worker increased 35 percent. In terms of purchasing power, merely 10 percent.

During the past nine years, the Dept. of Labor reports, real output per man-hour in the private economy rose at an annual average rate of 3.3 percent. But real hourly compensation, including fringe benefits, of all employes in the economy increased at an average annual rate of only about 2.8 percent.

So the facts speak for themselves. Union-negotiated wages and benefits are not responsible for inflation. During the 1960s, after-tax corporate profits rose 160 percent faster than weekly take-home pay. Real wages and benefits lagged behind the rise in worker productivity.

Trade unionists, through collective bargaining, have had no alternative but to try and keep up with the profit-price spiral. Even so, it has been a losing struggle for many.

Profits, rather than wages, are the culprits in the current inflation. The time has come to explode the myth of the wage-price spiral.

Moralistic Thrust Fades Away With Shift In Foreign Policy

By John P. Roche

THE OUTSTANDING characteristic of American foreign policy today is the retreat from what might be called "moralism." In the hands of a cool President and a positively remote Secretary of State, the United States is abandoning the moralistic thrust of the last 30 years for the solid ground of "vital national interests."

No longer are we to be "the watchmen on the walls of world freedom," as John F. Kennedy believed, or the advocates of a universal "Great Society," which LBJ saw as a legitimate American aspiration. The international vice squad has been replaced by house detectives.

In practical terms this amounts to abandoning our concern with the behavior of other nations unless their actions pose something called a "direct threat" to our interests.

Like the rain, which falls alike on the just and the unjust, American policy in the Middle East will be "even-handed." In Africa it will buttress the "territorial integrity" of existing states. In Latin America it will welcome dictatorships and democracies with equal warmth. In Asia it will (as an anti-war officer put it to me in Saigon) "let the gooks fight it out."

This policy of disengagement can, of course, be wrapped in high rhetoric. Pres. Nixon, for example, did a masterful job of justifying the demolition of the Alliance for Progress by explaining that innate modesty has led us to stop trying to shape the Latin American future.

While the conservatives, who have for years opposed pouring resources into "rat holes," winked at each other knowingly, Sen. Frank Church rushed out to give a liberal imprimatur to national selfishness. Church doesn't want to give funds to undemocratic regimes, the conservatives don't want to give money to anybody, but pragmatically there is full agreement: no money.

Similarly, when Sen. Mike Mansfield argues for a cutback in American commitments, he and his Senate Foreign Relations colleagues claim to be doing penance for our "arrogance," our folly in dreaming that we could shape the course of world events.

A certain amount of humility is healthy, but this argument locks in to the conservative position which can best be formulated as "who needs them?"

On this level of analysis the conservatives are, of course, right. We don't need "them"—the Thais, the Vietnamese, the Germans, the Indians, the Israelis. The only power in the world that can directly threaten the United States is the USSR so why should we get exercised about who controls Saigon, Bengal, Djakarta, Ouagadougou or Jerusalem?

Columnist Joseph Kraft put this sentiment in its classic form in May 1967, when he pointed out that in Viet Nam and the Middle East no "American vital interests are at stake. On the contrary, [he wrote] this country will also get along nicely no matter what happens in the Middle East or Southeast Asia."

THE CONSERVATIVES are further correct in their assessment that advances in military technology have made isolationism (or "disengagement," for those who choke on a word) functional for the United States.

Once upon a time, we needed bases to contain Communist power; our military effectiveness depended on airfields in Britain, Western Europe, Libya, Turkey, etc. This gave us, in the hard-nosed view, a vital interest in the security of those states.

Now a news item about the closing of Bada Beir, the communications base in Pakistan, makes the point tersely: "Technological progress in electronic surveillance made the base in Pakistan no longer necessary. . . . Today 'spy-in-the-sky' satellites orbit over Soviet central Asia and Communist China." The ICBMs and Polaris submarines have made the rest of the world militarily expendable. This is a powerful argument, but are the premises valid?

To Replace 'Non-System':

Need for National Health Plan Underscored by Cost Treadmill

The following is excerpted from an address by AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller to the Philadelphia Medical Society.

WE LOOK at the high cost of health care, see the concentration of doctors in suburbia and middle class areas and the dearth in rural and poor areas, the uneven distribution and often redundant availability of modern hospital facilities and our low health care rank in the world and ask "Why?"

We believe the answer is lack of organization. America has no rational system for the delivery and financing of medical and health care.

In a very thorough and extensive critical analysis of the American health care system, Fortune magazine stated the problem this way:

"The financial distortions, the inequities, and the managerial redundancies in the system are of a kind that no competent executive could fail to see, or would be willing to tolerate for long.

"The conversion to modern methods, and the institution of the degree of efficiency that Americans have reached in other realms, would probably effect enough saving so that good care could be brought to every American—with very little increase in costs.

"Nobody except other physicians should tell physicians how to practice medicine. But the management of medical care has become too important to leave to doctors, who are, after all, not managers to begin with."

In the labor movement, we have been trying to cope with this non-system through collective bargaining and through a few pre-paid comprehensive group health practice programs.

In the case of collective bargaining and negotiated health and welfare plans, we have, in most instances, undertaken a Sisyphean task. Time after time, we have bargained to get health benefits over the high peaks of health and hospital costs. Each time we have been confronted with yet another steep and ascending incline in fees and charges, which roll us half way down the hill again, by the time the contract is up for renewal.

It has meant that frequently our members have been paying just as much or even more out of their own pockets, after negotiated increases for health care funds, as they were paying before.

For nearly 20 years, we have been on this treadmill, unable to overcome ever-mounting health care costs. The money has not been purchasing comprehensive health services or making our members and their families better off. It has merely been going from us and our employers and passing through third party insurance carriers into the labyrinth of interlocking referrals, specialties, clinics, laboratories, pharmacies and hospitals, each of which depends on and feeds on the other for sustenance and maintenance.

Taken in totality, it is a confusing, inefficient, often inaccessible, and always expensive piece-rate, cost-plus, unevenly distributed system. And the users pay for it all, beginning at the point of entry and continuing all the way down the line.

Blue Cross Association Pres. Walter J. McNerney stated the problem succinctly, when he said medical care suffers from "a serious discombobulation of the principles of the free market with no invisible hand to move resources about efficiently."

Let's face it—it is time for physicians to get away from being small businessmen. Over 300,000 active physicians can't act individually as independent businessmen. This is the Twentieth Century with integrated automatic analog digital computer planning systems.

ALONG WITH STREAMLINED organization of the delivery system complex, there has to be simultaneous development of a financing system which will enable all persons to enter the mainstream of health care on an equal basis and with assurance of first class care.

We believe the answer is national health insurance which provides that:

1. Every man, woman and child in the nation —rich or poor, working or unemployed, old or young, black or white—is eligible for the complete range of services.

2. Benefits are comprehensive, including preventive, outpatient, impatient and rehabilitative care.

3. The program should be financed like social security, with payments by employes at about the presently scheduled Medicare rate, with the federal government and employers splitting the remaining cost. The self-employed would pay as they do now under social security. The program would absorb Medicare and Medicaid. With these provisions, for the first time we would have equal rights to health care, regardless of income.

4. The national health insurance program should contract for all medical services on a prepayment basis. Eligible contractors would include medical and dental societies, hospitals and multispecialty groups. All should be paid on a per capita basis but how each contractor distributed the funds it received to its own constituents would be strictly an internal matter.

5. National health insurance should enhance, not contract, the freedoms of patients and doctors alike. Patients should have free choice of physicians and free choice of health delivery system. Participation by physicians could be voluntary. If they did choose to participate there should be no interference whatsoever with their clinical practice of medicine. Solo practitioners could contract to provide services on the same per capita basis as medical societies or groups.

6. A principal aim of the program should be improvement of the organization and delivery of health care. Therefore, financial assistance should be provided for planning, developing and initial staffing of comprehensive health delivery systems.

Some of course will ask: Can we afford national health insurance?

To us, the answer is simple: We can't afford not to have it.

The time has come to make health care a matter of right as well as privilege. The time has come to make American health care the best in the world.

We can change the system with benefit for all parties—doctors, patients and hospitals. And we'd like to see the medical profession join with us in the fight to help bring it about.

Fail to Meet 'Modest Budget':

Pay Levels Called 'Too Low' To Support Most City Families

THE URBAN WORKER'S family budget shows the "failure of the present wage system" to provide even modest living standards for many Americans, an AFL-CIO economist declared.

The Labor Dept. survey was actually made nearly a year ago, said Rudolph Oswald of the federation's Dept. of Research. He pointed out that living costs have risen 4.5 percent since then and continue upward, "badly outdating" the $10,077 "modest budget" figure set by the Labor Dept. for a four-person city worker family.

"Full-time, year-round jobs . . . basic jobs . . . should provide a moderate living" for workers and their families, Oswald declared. "But, sad to say," he added, "in too many cases, wage levels are simply too low" to do that. He said that as a result, more than 20 million American families have to depend on more than one income.

He said that some 4 million workers are holding down two jobs, and 18 million families have more than one wage earner—a wife or child working to supplement family income. And, he added, those figures have been rising in recent years.

Questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, an AFL-CIO produced public affairs radio interview, the union economist said the federal survey indicates that the Administration's anti-inflation measures are not slowing the price and living cost rises that are pressing workers harder and harder.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE MISERY of America's migrant farm workers continues as a reproach to the nation.

This opening sentence of a report on migratory farm labor was made by a special committee of the National Planning Association. It is a report that reiterates and reconfirms the tragic story of exploitation and neglect that has been the lot of American migratory workers for many years.

"Their work is hard, their living conditions miserable and their pay poor," the report says.

Their work is "dirty, exhausting and boring." Their housing "is often dilapidated." Health services are "often beyond their means." Education services for migrants and their children "are inadequate." In many communities "their labor is needed, but their presence is resented." Poverty wages are common with "nearly a quarter" of migratory families well below $2,000 a year in 1965, even though more than one worker in a family was contributing to the family income.

The NPA's committee made a number of recommendations to solve these conditions. It called for a concerted program to help migrant farm workers move "into more productive farm and non-farm work; to bring them under federal minimum wage coverage; to provide for collective bargaining for farm workers," to extend to farm labor unemployment compensation and public assistance.

The reforms suggested are pretty much in line with what organized labor has been proposing for many years. Their importance lies chiefly in that a highly respectable, somewhat conservative organization, has helped to re-open study and consideration of a bitter American problem that has long been a "reproach" to the nation.

It will be to the everlasting disgrace of the current session of Congress if it again turns its back on the hundreds of thousands of men, women and children who help grow and harvest our crops and yet are condemned by our society to the most miserable of lives.

ORGANIZED LABOR has united its voice in demanding that farm workers be given the protection that the nation gives to all other workers—the right to free and uncoerced representation elections and the rights of free collective bargaining that flow from such elections.

Thus far, this has been denied them. The Administration has come forward with a proposal that would open the way to union representation, but it would also cripple the workers' right to strike, the one weapon that has any meaning in a confrontation between management and labor.

There are a number of bills now before Congress that would seek to correct the injustice under which farm labor now operates. They would help place the farm worker within the mainstream of the rest of the nation's work force: inclusion of farm labor under numerous health, educational, social and welfare programs from which it is now excluded.

Whatever the merits of these bills, the fundamental need is the right of farm labor to help and protect itself through free and uncoerced collective bargaining.

The history of American labor makes this clear. For almost a century American workers struggled to organize their unions with varying success. "Yellow dog" contracts, anti-labor police, company domination of the political and economic scene, brute force through the use of the militia against them, the list of methods used to undermine and destroy them is interminable.

It was not until the Wagner Act that workers found themselves relatively free to organize and bargain, that today's labor movement got its foothold.

Organization, bargaining—these are the key words.

Congress must give farm workers these rights if their ancient wrongs are to be righted.

FAILURE OF THE WAGE SYSTEM to provide even "modest" living standards for many urban workers is decried by AFL-CIO Economist Rudolph Oswald on Labor News Conference. Interviewing Oswald, center, are Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press and Frank Swoboda, right, of Business Week magazine. The program is aired Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on Mutual radio.

RETURN TO THE CLASSROOM for a four-day stint in Kansas City schools is part of an effort by Teachers' Pres. David Selden "to re-establish contact with the teaching process." Kansas City AFT Local 691 arranged Selden's assignment as a substitute teacher. Here, he goes over studies with students at Martin Luther King Junior High School.

Union Hits Move to Lift Cancerous Poultry Ban

The Meat Cutters have voiced "shock and alarm" in urging Sec. of Agriculture Clifford M. Hardin to reject a government advisory's panel to relax an existing ban on the sale of cancerous chickens to the public.

A telegram, signed by Pres. T. J. Lloyd and Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman, of the union, asked Hardin to retain the current prohibition on the sale of any chicken showing signs of leukosis, a form of cancer in poultry.

The Associated Press reported that a government panel recently recommended that federal inspectors forbid the sale of only the part of the chicken that has been "visually damaged" by the cancer, not the entire carcass.

The Public Health Service is reportedly reviewing the panel proposal prior to making a recommendation on it to Hardin. Mrs. Virginia H. Knauer, White House consumer adviser, said she would discuss the matter with Hardin on Feb. 2.

The statement from the Meat Cutters, a major force in securing the 1968 compulsory poultry inspection law, noted that there is still "much to be learned" about the transfer of leukosis from poultry to humans, and that experts are in considerable disagreement on the subject.

Lloyd and Gorman expressed the opinion that the present law does not permit adoption of the panel's recommendation. Further, they emphasized, "Poultry inspection exists to protect the consumer —not simply to get obviously repugnant parts out of sight."

Meanwhile, Rep. Benjamin S. Rosenthal (D-N.Y.) called upon Hardin to give consumers a chance to be heard on the issue of allowing cancerous chickens to be sold for human consumption.

This can be done, he said, if Hardin will hold a public hearing on the matter after receiving the PHS report and before making any final decision.

Life Writer Wins Guild's Broun Award

A magazine writer won the Newspaper Guild's 1969 Heywood Broun award, given annually for journalistic enterprise in the tradition of the union's founder.

The award went to William Lambert, for a Life magazine article dealing with the outside financial interests of former Supreme Court Justice Abe Fortas.

The important questions raised by the article, the judges observed, contributed "to the close examination given by the press to the nomination of Judge Haynsworth to the United States Supreme Court and the subsequent rejection of that nomination by the Senate."

Judges for the award were Robert E. L. Baker, assistant to the editor of the Washington Post; Julius Duscha, director of the Washington Journalism Center, and Sidney Epstein, assistant managing editor of the Washington Star.

In 1956, when he was on the staff of the Portland Oregonian, Lambert was a co-winner of the Broun award.

The 111 entries received this year were the highest number in the history of the award and the judges said they were impressed by the extent to which newspapers throughout the nation were involved in "righting the kind of wrongs Heywood Broun perceived in our society."

An honorable mention was voted to Seymour M. Hersh of Dispatch News Service for being the first to develop the story of the My Lai tragedy in Viet Nam.

Philadelphia Plan Views in Pamphlet

The recent address by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to the National Press Club is the basis for a new pamphlet, "Labor and the Philadelphia Plan."

Meany explained why the plan, which sets up government-determined "goals" for minority-group hiring on federal construction jobs, is unworkable. He assailed it as a "concoction" to hide the Administration's retreat on civil rights.

The speech in pamphlet form, "sets straight an outrageously distorted version of the AFL-CIO's position in this critical area of concern."

The pamphlet is available without cost in reasonable quantities from the Pamphlet Division, AFL-CIO Headquarters, 815 Sixteenth St. N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

Moore Chosen As President Of Pressmen

J. Frazier Moore of Detroit, a union vice president since 1960, has been named president of the Printing Pressmen, to succeed the late Anthony J. DeAndrade, who died Jan. 20.

Moore, vice president representing the newspaper segment of the Pressmen, was chosen by the union's executive board to serve until a referendum election can be held under the requirements of the union's constitution.

Local unions will have the opportunity to nominate and elect a president to complete the nearly two year unexpired period of DeAndrade's four year term. The election must be held not later than 120 days from date of his death.

Moore served an apprenticeship on the Dallas (Tex.) Dispatch and worked for newspapers in several other cities before settling in Detroit. He was elected president of Pressmen's Local 13 there in 1941 and held that office for the next 11 years.

He was elected as the first president of the North American Newspaper-Web Pressmen's Conference in 1957. He was re-elected to that office in 1959, resigning when he successfully sought a union vice presidency.

For 1970:

Key House Rollcalls on Education Aid

The House three times went on record to increase funds for education by $1 billion above the inadequate amount sought by Pres. Nixon.

The issue was the same in every vote. But on the key vote on whether to override the President's veto, most Republicans voted to cut education funds by sustaining the veto—even though they had twice gone on record as to the need for the funds. In labor's judgment, they put party loyalty above the nation's needs.

Column 1 shows the 226-191 vote on Jan. 28 which fell short of the two-thirds needed to override the veto. Right votes (R) to override were cast by 199 Democrats and 27 Republicans; 156 Republicans and 35 Democrats voted Wrong (W).

Column 2 shows the 294-119 vote on July 31 adding the extra money to the bill. Right votes were cast by 195 Democrats and 99 Republicans; Wrong votes by 81 Republicans and 38 Democrats.

Column 3 shows the 261-110 vote on Dec. 22 for final passage of the bill. On this test, 175 Democrats and 86 Republicans voted Right; 84 Republicans and 26 Democrats voted Wrong.

Other symbols: PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong; A—absent and not paired; AR—absent but announced right. Numerals show districts; AL—at large. Dash (—) indicates congressman was not in office.

Congress Picks Up Pieces:

Labor Assails Veto Of School Aid Bill

than the President had requested last year for education and health programs. But Congress had already cut more than four times that amount from the Administration's budget requests for other programs.

Biemiller gave this comment to the AFL-CIO News in the aftermath of the House vote:

"We join all others who have a concern for education and health in a sense of outrage over the President's action. He used a television gimmick, false and misleading arguments and outrageous arm-twisting in order to make political gain.

"The President now has added teachers, school superintendents, librarians, health researchers, children and parents to the list of those adversely affected by Nixon policies.

"Already on that list were those seeking homes that can't be built because of high interest rates and blacks, twice the victims of the southern political school of picking Supreme Court nominees.

"Of course," Biemiller noted, "the bankers, whose profits continue to mount, are still in the President's corner."

Before the vote, Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Robert H. Finch promised that, if the veto were sustained, the President would go along with a compromise increase in the politically popular "impact" aid program. This provides payments to school districts attended by children whose parents work for the federal government or are in the armed forces.

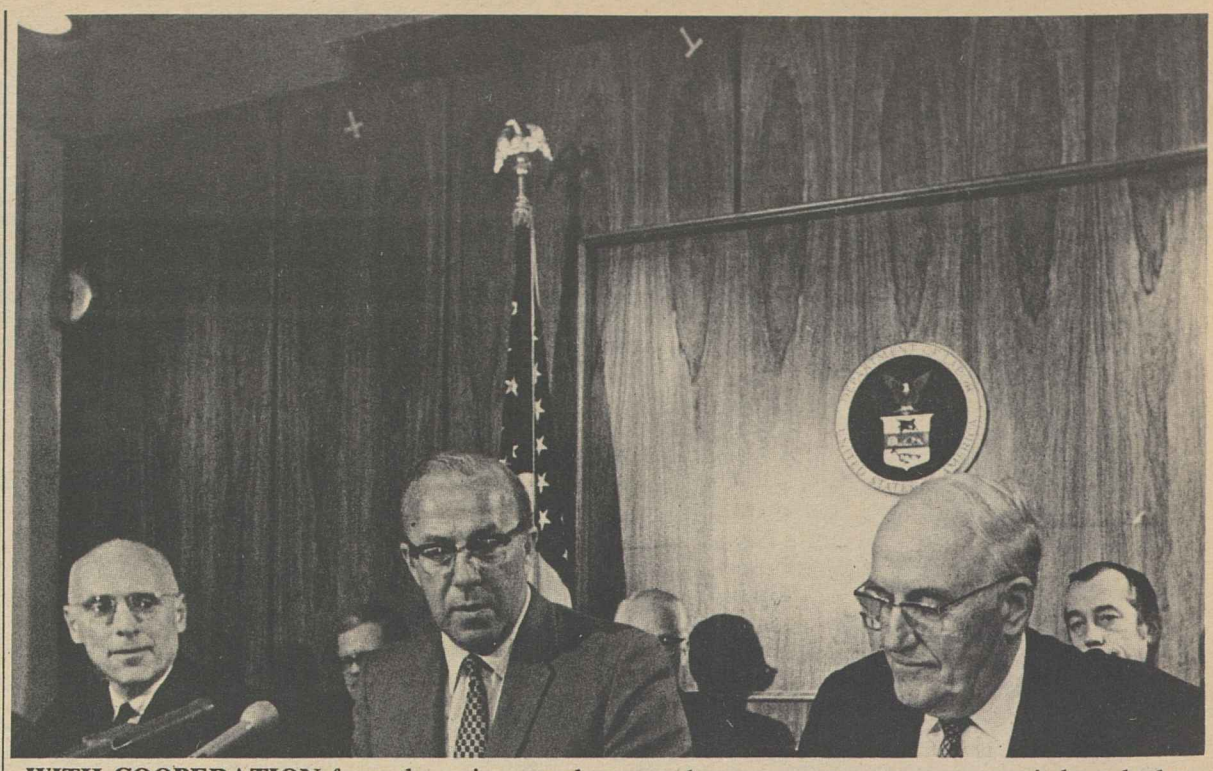
It was, ironically, this program that the President attacked most sharply in his televised veto message. He said nothing about the fact that most of the added money in the appropriations bill was earmarked for other programs—including nearly $210 million for vocational education programs, $171 million for the key program of providing special funds for educationally deprived children in poverty neighborhoods, $41.5 million for library services and some $140 million for hospital construction, health research and mental health programs.

Nixon told the nation that he is all for improved education and better health care.

"The question is," he said, "how much can the federal government afford to spend on these programs this year?"

Nixon blamed federal spending as a "major reason" for inflation.



The United States, he said, already spends more than other countries for health and education. "But," he cautioned, "we can spend ourselves poor."

In a sharp retort, House Majority Leader Carl Albert (D-Okla.) suggested that the President "use the awesome power of his office, not against the children, the sick, the aged and the poor of the nation, but rather against the giant monopolies which are the true culprits in causing inflation."

All of the nation's major education and teacher groups, along with the AFL-CIO, worked together in the initial successful campaign to convince Congress to appropriate the added funds and in the attempt to override the veto.

The effort to override was doomed when a big majority of the 86 Republicans who had voted to pass the bill in its final form—despite the threat of a veto—switched and voted to sustain the President's position.

The Democrats who voted against overriding were southern conservatives who normally vote with House Republicans.

WITH COOPERATION from the union, employers and government, a new program is launched to train 500 minority group workers as journeymen pipefitters, one of the top-paying construction trades. Pres. Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumbers & Pipefitters signs for the union. At left are two other signers, Pres. Philip S. Lyon of the National Constructors Association, representing employers, and Labor Sec. George P. Shultz.

Pipefitters Set Training Plan For Minorities

Trainees will be recruited in the communities where the union, company and the Labor Dept. have determined a skill shortage exists.

Those chosen for training will be expected to have sufficient job-related experience to be granted at least 18 months credit toward the normal five-year apprenticeship requirement, and many will have more.

If the public employment service can't provide qualified applicants, groups such as the Urban League, the Workers Defense League and others involved in expanding job opportunities will help in the recruiting program.

Any worker recruited with sufficient on-the-job experience to meet journeyman standards will immediately be accepted as a journeyman member of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters.

For less than fully-experienced pipefitters, trainees will receive up to three weeks of orientation before being assigned to a job and some 200 hours of related classroom instruction a year in addition to on-the-job training.

Work opportunities will not be limited to member firms of the National Constructors Association. And after achieving journeyman status, the workers will have the same opportunity for employment in local construction work as any other union pipefitter.

Nomination of Carswell Called Slap At Negroes

The AFL-CIO termed Pres. Nixon's nomination of Judge G. Harrold Carswell to the Supreme Court "a slap in the face to the nation's Negro citizens" and urged the Senate to reject it.

Federation Pres. George Meany said "it is all too evident" that the selection of Carswell reflects the "southern political strategy" of Atty. Gen. John N. Mitchell "rather than any search for a pre-eminent jurist."

The so-called "southern strategy" embraced by the conservative wing of the Republican Party is keyed to wooing Dixiecrats who supported Third Party Candidate George C. Wallace in 1968, while abandoning any effort to win over Negroes and other minority groups, or appeal to liberals.

"The AFL-CIO is sorry to see that the President is still using Supreme Court nominations for partisan political advantage," Meany said, "instead of seeking a justice worthy to wear the mantle of Holmes, Brandeis or Warren."

Meany noted that the nomination was made "in full knowledge that the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights had opposed Judge Carswell's appointment to the Court of Appeals, only a few months ago, on the ground that he had as a district judge been peculiarly hostile to the civil rights of Negroes."

He urged the Senate and its Judiciary Committee to "carefully scrutinize the nominee's qualifications, judicial decisions and the depth of his prejudices. Since the President seems determined to make nominations solely for political reasons, the Senate's constitutional obligation to inquire becomes absolutely vital."

From what is known of Carswell's background and philosophy, Meany said, "we believe he does not meet the high standards requisite for Supreme Court membership. We are opposed to his confirmation. We hope he is rejected by the Senate."

The President's first choice for the Supreme Court seat vacated last spring by the resignation of Abe Fortas was Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr.

After Haynsworth's rejection, the White House apparently searched for another conservative southerner, but one without the extensive outside business activities that built such a damaging conflict of interest case against Haynsworth.

As did Haynsworth, Carswell received a friendly welcome from the generally conservative Senate Judiciary Committee, headed by Mississippi Sen. James O. Eastland (D).

In response to questions, he admitted that he had made a "white supremacy" speech during a 1948 political campaign but said he now rejects any notion of racial superiority. He also denied having had anything to do with the transfer of a Tallahassee, Fla., golf course and clubhouse to private ownership after the city was forbidden to continue to operate it as a segregated facility.

Sen. Edward J. Gurney (R-Fla.), chief sponsor of Carswell's nomination to the Supreme Court, told the Judiciary Committee that Carswell showed "forthrightness, candor and strength of character" in not trying to excuse his 1948 speech. Gurney said the quality of being able to change one's mind is important in a period of rapid change.

Product Promotion Bill Passes House, 190-186

The House voted 190-186 approval of a labor-supported bill that would enable unions and management in the construction industry to set up a joint fund to promote various building materials.

A technicality in the Taft-Hartley Act now prohibits employer contributions to such a promotion fund.

This is the third successive Congress in which such a bill has passed the House, and it is the first time that any significant opposition has been expressed.

Even though the bill specifies that employer contributions to a joint fund will not be a mandatory subject of collective bargaining, Rep. John B. Anderson (R-Ill.) charged that it would be an inflationary factor in building costs.

The Senate Labor Committee has approved a companion bill and cleared it for the Senate floor. In 1965 and 1967, when the House passed similar bills, the legislation died in the Senate.

In other action, the Senate voted unanimous approval of a $1.86 billion foreign aid appropriations bill, clearing it for the President's signature. The amount is almost $1 billion less than the President had requested.

Earlier, the Senate passed a major anti-crime bill, 73-1, sending it to the House.

The legislation was described by both Democratic and Republican leaders as a bipartisan measure—based in part on Nixon Administration proposals and expanded by the Democratic-controlled Judiciary Committee.

Parts of the bill were challenged in debate as possible threats to individual and constitutional rights. But after proposed amendments were rejected, it breezed to passage.

'Anything Wrong?"

Unionists Named to Unit On Puerto Rico Wages

Three representatives of labor have been named by Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz to tripartite committees (public, employer and employe) to review minimum wage rates in four Puerto Rican industries.

The labor members, who will serve on each of the four committees, are AFL-CIO Education Dir. Walter G. Davis; Anne Draper, economist, AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, and Edward X. Mooney, Seafarers' representative in Puerto Rico.

'End to Boulwarism' Hailed In Strike Settlement at GE

Nixon Plans Keyed To Slow-up Policy

Economy

By Saul Miller

For the first half of 1970 the nation's rate of economic growth will "remain close to zero" with prospects for a mild improvement in the latter part of the year.

That's the view of the President and his Council of Economic Advisers coupled with the hopeful prediction that there will be no large rise in unemployment. Paul W. McCracken, chairman of the CEA, said he would consider a rise in the unemployment rate to 5 percent "pretty large."

For 1970 as a whole the President's Economic Report projected an increase in the gross national product—the total of all goods and services produced—to about $985 billion, an increase of about $50 billion over the 1969 figure.

But when price increases are considered the actual growth rate would be about 1.2 percent.

The CEA report, explaining why in the second half of the year there would be a mild improvement—pegged to dropping the 5 percent income tax surcharge and other factors—said:

"The growth of GNP has already slowed to a rate which although temporarily necessary is lower than needs to be sustained for long in order to achieve significant disinflation. Therefore we can tolerate a moderate rise in the rates of increase of GNP and of real output without reviving inflation and should have such a rise in order to avoid mounting unemployment."

Budget

By David L. Perlman

Pres. Nixon has proposed "an anti-inflationary budget" which would hold most federal programs far below the levels authorized by Congress.

Programs hit by the proposed budget ceilings include federal aid to education, model cities projects and grants to control water pollution.

The hold-the-line budget contemplates government outlays of $200.8 billion in the fiscal year starting July 1 and a thin surplus of $1.3 billion. Most of the money paid out—an estimated 69 percent of the budget—represents "relatively uncontrollable expenses" such as payments required by law and interest on the national debt.

Among the payments required by law are social security, medicare and other social insurance benefits, which add up to 26 percent of the entire budget. Other examples are veterans programs, farm price supports and payments due on government contracts signed in past years.

The federal government, itself, is one of the chief victims of a tight money policy which forced up interest rates. The budget calls for payment of $17.8 billion in interest on the national debt.

To achieve even a shaky surplus, the President has asked Congress to delay comparability pay raises for federal employes an additional six months (Story, Page 11). He also asked authority to sell off some of the government's assets, including the Alaska Railroad.

STRIKE SETTLEMENT terms between General Electric Co. and two unions that bargain nationally with it are read at New York news conference by Dir. J. Curtis Counts of Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service. Also shown are Pres. Paul Jennings, right, of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, and Pres. Albert J. Fitzgerald, left, United Electrical Workers. Twelve other unions will act on similar proposals.

Meany Sees Solidarity as Key Factor

By Eugene A. Kelly

New York—A 100-day strike against the General Electric Co. brought "the end of Boulwarism" and won a "great collective bargaining victory," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, unions representing the bulk of the strikers had accepted the settlement package of $1.05 an hour in wages and benefits in a 40-month contract, and removed picket lines except where local issues remain to be negotiated. But the Machinists recommended rejection of the pact by its members and other unions sought to alter some terms to fit their own conditions, as they are free to do under the coordinated bargaining system spearheaded by the AFL-CIO.

With all but a few locals heard from, members of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers voted, 56,274 to 18,823 to ratify the GE settlement. The IUE represents about 90,000 GE workers.

Strike coordinators reported that the settlement also has been accepted by the Plumbers, Flint Glass Workers, Firemen & Oilers, United Electrical Workers, and the Sheet Metal Workers at GE's Cicero, Ill., Hotpoint plant. Still to take action on acceptance or rejection were the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Steelworkers, Auto Workers, Allied Industrial Workers, Technical Engineers and Teamsters.

The Technical Engineers posted informational pickets at Philadelphia when GE refused to change

Aftermath of Veto:

New Battle Looms Over School Funds

The battle between Congress and the White House over the level of federal aid to education and health hasn't been ended with Pres. Nixon's veto of the appropriations bill.

New legislation has to be enacted, and supporters of the program want it to approach as closely as possible the dollar level of the vetoed bill.

The President proposed a compromise figure in a letter to House Speaker John W. McCormack.

The vetoed bill provided $1.3 billion more than the President had requested in his last year's budget. But he is willing, he said, to accept a $449 million package increase for the various programs.

House Majority Leader Carl Albert and other top Democrats said it wasn't enough.

Albert said the Nixon offer is "substantially below that for which the vast majority of Democrats are going to fight."

The first battleground is in the House Appropriations Committee, which was reported temporarily deadlocked in its effort to agree on the dollar figures. The bill then would have to be acted on by the full House and sent to the Senate.

The appropriations bill carries money to finance the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, the Labor Dept., and a number of other agencies for the fiscal year that began last July 1 and is now more than half over.

A series of temporary spending authorities, known as continuing resolutions, has financed the programs on a month-to-month basis. After the veto was sustained, Congress quickly passed a continuing resolution to provide funds through the month of February.

Railroads, 4 Shopcrafts Resume Contract Talks

By Duane Emme

Four shopcraft unions and railroad managements bargained in Washington with the help of Labor Dept. officials in an effort to reach an agreement and remove the threat of a national railroad shutdown.

Labor Sec. George P. Shultz announced that both sides have agreed to continue talks without a lockout or work stoppage until Feb. 21.

The negotiations involve 48,000 members of the Machinists, Boilermakers, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and Sheet Metal Workers.

The negotiations in the 15-month wage-rules dispute, broken off earlier, were resumed after Judge John J. Sirica of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia issued two 10-day restraining orders.

He restrained the carriers from closing down all major railroads and locking out employes in retaliation for the unions' strike on a single railroad, the Union Pacific, and he restrained the strike itself.

The judge set Feb. 10, the expiration date of his orders, for a hearing on whether or not to issue a temporary injunction

AFL-CIO Urges Senate To Reject Carswell

Senate confirmation of Judge G. Harrold Carswell to the Supreme Court would be "a national tragedy," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany warned.

He told the Senate Judiciary Committee that Carswell's undistinguished record as a lawyer, judge and public figure makes it "obvious" that "the Administration's sole guide in making its selection was its southern political strategy."

Meany said Carswell "perfectly" meets the political standard set by the Administration in its search for a Supreme Court candidate—"a relatively youthful nominee from the South, preferably from a state in which the Republicans have made headway and have a good chance to make more, with a poor civil rights record and a good chance of confirmation."

Florida is such a state, Meany noted, and the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights had opposed Carswell's elevation to the Court of Appeals last year because "as a district judge he had been particularly hostile to the civil rights of Negroes."

Since Carswell owns no stocks

Tug Strikers Seek 1st Raise In Four Years

New York—Crews of 250 tugs, barges and oil boats tied up their vessels here in a strike for their first wage increase in four years. They posted no pickets but just stayed home.

The strikers, about 4,000 in number, are members of Marine Local 333 of the National Maritime Union. Their walkout halted all harbor traffic in the port of New York except for railroad tugboats, independent oil barge operations and deepsea ships whose skippers ventured to move without tugs.

Some 3,500 members voted unanimously for a walkout in a standing vote Feb. 1, according to Capt. Joseph O'Hare, president of Local 333.

Tugboat captains in the harbor have an hourly rate of $4.04. Deckhands get $2.96. Both can earn more through overtime, but feel they should not have to work long hours to get a living wage, the union said.

Local 333 also represents engineers and cooks on vessels owned by 40 companies that bargain through the New York Towing & Transportation Employers Association and 10 companies that bargain for themselves.

The union is asking for a doubling of current wages to make up for a four-year gap. Also it wants a change in the present $200 monthly pension to permit retirement at any age after 20 years of service. Another issue is overtime pay for oil bargemen not now covered by the overtime provisions which were won three years ago after a seven-day strike.

"We want skilled wages for skilled work," the union told federal mediator Robert E. Kennedy, who is seeking to get the negotiators back to the bargaining table.

Unions, Blacks Reach Accord In Pittsburgh

Pittsburgh—Building trades unions, their employers and a coalition of Negroes have entered into a "memorandum of understanding" to bring more members of minority groups into construction jobs.

The document sets up a tripartite committee of four members each from the Pittsburgh Building & Construction Trades Council, the Employers Association and the Black Construction Coalition.

The 12-member committee will develop programs to bring blacks into craft apprenticeship training, arrange for the hiring of qualified black journeymen where available and seek to place older black workers in construction jobs.

The memorandum doesn't specify any set number of opportunities to be opened to blacks. But a contractors' supplementary letter to the Labor Dept. pledged a "good-faith effort to employ 1,250 new minority journeymen" over the next four years.

Dir. Donald Slaiman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights said the agreement, like a similar one established recently in Chicago, is in line with policies set by the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. and the AFL-CIO.

"We hope that this action in Pittsburgh will bring a continuing flow of minority workers into the construction industry in that city," he said.

Economic Need Spurs Women to Take Jobs

Thirty million women are working today not only because the American economy needs their skills but also because their families need the money to meet rising living expenses.

The Women's Bureau of the Labor Dept. reports that 2.5 million more women are in the nation's labor force today than in March 1967, and 1.7 more than in March 1968.

Job opportunities have increased for women by the development of new industries and expanded activities in other industries, the bureau said. The result is that new doors have been opened for women in business, the professions and the production of goods and services.

Relatively few women take jobs for personal fulfillment, the bureau notes. Those who seek work outside the home usually do so for economic reasons.

"Most women in the labor force work because they or their families need the money they can earn," the report observed. "Some work to raise family living standards above the level of poverty or deprivation, others to help meet rising costs of food, education for their children, medical care and the like."

In a special section of the study, the bureau noted that nearly half of the women 18 to 64 years who took jobs in 1963 went to work because of economic need.

Of these, 54 percent were widowed, divorced or separated from their husbands, while 48 percent were married and living with their husbands.

Of the 16.8 million married women living with their husbands who were in the labor force in March 1968, 9.3 million had children under age 18.

About 2 million of these mothers, the bureau said, were helping support their children because 900,000 had husbands with incomes in 1967 less than $3,000 and 1.1 million had husbands with incomes between $3,000 and $5,000.

The bureau pointed out that 24 percent of the 3.6 million working wives with children under age 6 and 20 percent of the 5.7 million with children 6 to 17 had husbands with incomes of less than $5,000.

Non-white working wives whose husbands had incomes below $3,000 in 1967 represented 22 percent of the women in the labor force, compared with 12 percent white in that category. An additional 25 percent of non-white wives (11 percent white) had husbands whose incomes were between $3,000 and $5,000.

Of the 5.3 million women who were heads of families in March 1968, 51 percent were in the labor force. More than three-fifths of these women were the sole support of their families.

Among 43.3 million husband-wife families in March 1968, there were 5.6 million husbands not in the labor force and 732,000 husbands unemployed. About 320,000 wives of the unemployed husbands, and more than 1 million wives whose husbands were not in the labor force, were working or seeking work. Many of these women also were the sole support of their families, the bureau said.

Four Rail Shopcrafts Resume Bargaining

against the lockout, the strike or both.

Meanwhile, there was no immediate word from the Administration as to whether it would seek any intervention by Congress in the dispute.

Shultz charged a railroad attorney with misrepresenting the Labor Dept.'s position in telling Judge Sirica that an injunction was needed against the strike to give the government more time to prepare legislative recommendations.

He said a national rail shutdown would be "intolerable" and the Administration would consider "other actions" if needed to keep the trains moving, but that his department would concentrate on trying to get a voluntary agreement.

A similar effort by the Labor Dept. early in December resulted in an agreement providing 68 cents an hour in wage increases over two years for 40,000 skilled workers and only slightly less for 8,000 in less skilled jobs.

However, among some rules changes in the settlement was a provision to allow limited crossing of craft lines to permit "incidental" work at certain repair-work locations.

This provision was believed to be the reason that members of the Sheet Metal Workers voted to reject the settlement. Although members of the other three unions voted approval, it had been agreed earlier that all four must accept the pact to make it effective.

Following rejection of the tentative agreement, the unions agreed to withhold strike action pending further negotiations, which resumed Jan. 19. Under the terms of the Railway Labor Act, the unions say they have been legally free to strike since Dec. 3.

After the talks broke down on Jan. 30, the unions struck the Union Pacific Railroad just after midnight Jan. 31, emphasizing they were striking a single railroad to avoid a national emergency.

In announcing the walkout, IAM Vice Pres. William Winpisinger, chief spokesman for the unions, said, "We have reached the limit of the workers' patience. We have the right to expect a terminal point somewhere."

Immediately after the strike began, the managements announced that if it did not end by 10 p.m., Jan. 31, they would shut down all service to the public on 137 railroads and lock out more than 500,000 railroad employes.

The unions then went to court to seek a restraining order against the lockout, charging that it would be a "flagrant disregard" of the public interest and a violation of the Interstate Commerce Act's requirement that carriers "make reasonable efforts" to continue service even when faced with a strike or strike threat.

The railroads countered with a petition for an injunction against the Union Pacific strike, arguing that it was illegal under the Railway Labor Act to abandon national bargaining to strike one carrier.

The unions answered that the law does not specify the number of railroads that must be struck—one, several, many or all; that the only test is whether or not they had exhausted the law's procedures, which they had.

In issuing the restraining orders against both sides, Judge Sirica said the unions had made a substantial showing that they could prove the industry lockout illegal and the railroads had shown the unions might be in violation of law.

He said he wasn't immediately judging the merits of either case, but if he didn't issue the restraining orders both sides and the public would suffer "irreparable harm."

Labor Dept. Issues New Rules On Minority Hiring by Firms

The Labor Dept. has issued new regulations specifying "affirmative action" to be taken by federal contractors and subcontractors outside the construction industry to achieve equal job opportunity.

The new rules, issued by Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz, are designed to carry out a July 1968 department directive requiring federal contractors and subcontractors to develop minority-group hiring plans.

But since the new rules do not give a clear-cut definition of what would constitute "affirmative action," their impact was left undetermined.

The rules were the subject of a controversy in mid-January when Sen. Sam J. Ervin (D-N.C.) protested a draft version being circulated in the Office of Federal Contract Compliance. The Labor Dept. cited a "premature release" and withdrew the rules, re-issuing them Jan. 30. They were signed by Shultz and OFCC Director John L. Wilks.

The rules require employers with 50 or more workers and contracts in excess of $50,000 to draw up their plans and submit them within 120 days of the start of their contracts.

Until these programs are found acceptable, the department said, the contractors "will not be complying with the equal opportunity requirements" of an existing presidential executive order.

But the contractor will be found in compliance, the department added, if he can show that he has made a "good-faith" effort to meet his equal employment opportunity obligations.

Under the rules, an employer is required to launch his "affirmative action" program by conducting an analysis of all major job categories and provide explanations if minority-group members "are being underutilized in one or more jobs."

In determining "underutilization" (defined as "having fewer minorities than would reasonably be expected by their availability"), a contractor is asked to consider a number of factors as to his labor force.

These factors include the minority-group population, the degree of minority unemployment, the proportion of minorities in the area's work force, the availability of minorities.

After finishing his analysis, the contractor must design "goals and timetables" to correct identifiable deficiences in his employment of minority-group workers.

"Where deficiencies exist and where numbers or percentages are relevant in developing corrective action," the regulations state, "the contractor shall establish and set forth specific goals and timetables."

The goals and timetables must be part of the contractor's "affirmative action" program. If a contractor fails to meet the goals and timetables his "good-faith efforts" will be judged by whether he attempts to reach them.

If a contractor is found to lack an acceptable "affirmative action" program, the federal compliance agency will give him 30 days to show cause why enforcement proceedings under the executive order should not be started.

If the contractor fails to show "good cause" for his deficiency or correct it within 30 days, he could face cancellation of existing contracts and debarment from future contracts.

Ronnie J. Straw Named CWA Research Chief

Meany Cites Labor Solidarity:

GE Strike Settlement Hailed As an 'End to Boulwarism'

its wage proposal to percents instead of cents-per-hour in later contract stages.

Meany said in a message of congratulations to the IUE that "now for the first time GE workers can anticipate a change in the arrogant atmosphere that characterized GE's day-to-day dealings with their unions at the shop level."

Obviously, he said, "the contract does not satisfy the needs of GE workers, but it is a truly significant gain over GE's original offer. It spells the end of Boulwarism, the doctrine that has too long disgraced and discredited GE's labor relations policy."

In "winning this historic battle over tremendous odds," the strikers had unprecedented help and support, Meany pointed out.

"The financial backing from the rest of the trade union movement, and the successful boycott of GE products contributed incalculably to the final victory. But the essential element of victory was the unshakable courage, unity and determination of GE strikers," he said.

Thanking all who contributed time or money in supporting the nationwide boycott of GE products, Meany said "most of all I want to hail the courageous strikers. It is their victory, and they earned it."

GE made its first offer to the IUE and other unions which placed members on its bargaining committee. They rejected it, and when the company refused to make a more acceptable offer, went on strike Oct. 27. Management made another offer in December, after a federal appeals court condemned its bargaining system as a violation of law. Its final offer came late in January.

Next step for the Coordinated Bargaining Committee is a contract with the Westinghouse Electric Corp. Negotiators for nine unions representing 80,000 workers are in Pittsburgh where bargaining will resume in earnest Feb. 9.

The unions want contract terms "at least as good as those GE offered," and full retroactivity to Nov. 9, the date that union contracts expired at Westinghouse, a CBC member said.

Union economists calculated the total value of the GE settlement terms at 97.8 cents an hour over the full contract period plus 7 cents in the "rollup" value of benefits such as vacation pay, for a total of $1.05 an hour.

The total includes 53 cents an hour in direct wages, up to 21 cents in cost-of-living adjustments, 7 cents in higher pensions, 4 cents in skilled trade adjustments, and 12.8 cents in insurance and vacation improvements, paid days off, hospitalization and other benefit gains.

Aside from direct wages, the terms include what the unions called "startling advances in health insurance and pensions."

Company payment of the employe contribution of nine-tenths of 1 percent for insurance, valued at about 3 cents an hour, will take effect next Jan. 1—one full year before the earlier GE proposal that was rejected. Won for the first time are year-around hospitalization benefits with full coverage.

Pension minimums not only reach the union bargaining goal of $6.50 a month per year of service with the company but reach it in 50-cent steps from the new $5 floor. Other substantial gains were won in other aspects of retirement, including survivor benefits, the unions reported.

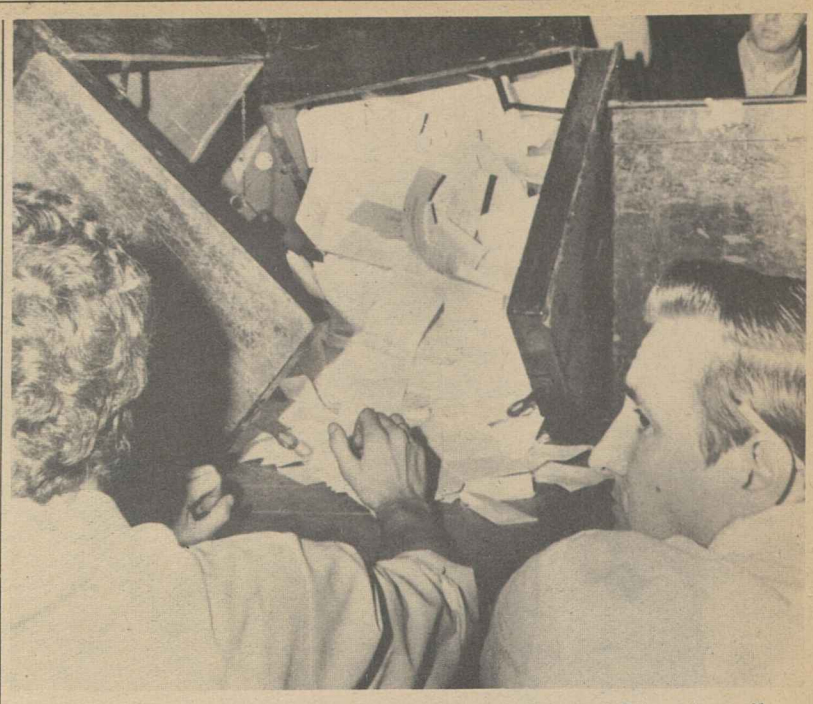
Weekly sickness and accident benefits were sharply improved. The contract contains a new benefit for hourly employes—paid days off for personal business. Two such days may be taken every year by workers with five years of service. Another day is added for each additional five years to a maximum of five, taken a day or half-day at a time.

A change in the GE agreement is automatic progression to the top of the job rate on all jobs instead of the former "merit" system which the unions charged permitted favoritism.

Longer vacations, starting next Jan. 1, provide four weeks of vacation after 15 years, five weeks after 30.



The settlement came after Dir. J. Curtis Counts of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service personally entered the talks and brought the parties together for intensified bargaining over the final two weeks.

IUE Pres. Paul Jennings expressed the belief that the GE contract "goes a long way toward meeting the needs" of GE workers and their families. The fact that GE "substantially improved its earlier offers and participated in genuine bargaining" holds great promise for the future, he said.

Jennings added: "The next three years offers an opportunity for the company to work with us in building a relationship that is second to none in American industry."

"That is what GE workers want and deserve," he said.

The AFL-CIO collected and turned over to the GE Strike Relief Fund more than $2 million in voluntary contributions from unions and their members. It announced that another union, the Textile Workers Union of America, achieved its goal of a $1 contribution from every member on the final day.

BALLOTS on acceptance or rejection of General Electric strike settlement terms pour out of boxes at Lynn, Mass., one of 135 cities where 150,000 workers started the walkout Oct. 27. Six of the 14 unions in the strike reported acceptance of the offer, subject in some cases to local issue settlements. The others are preparing similar votes.

Prefab Firm to Recruit, Train 100 Carpenters

Stirling Homex Corp., in cooperation with the Carpenters, is recruiting unemployed and unskilled workers in the Rochester, N.Y., area for a new training program.

With a $275,000 grant from the Labor Dept., the company will train 100 jobless persons in the manufacture of mass-produced modular houses.

The program is the outgrowth of a national contract between the Carpenters and Stirling Homex. The agreement calls for workers who are trained by the company to be admitted into the union 30 days after employment.

Congressmen Frank Horton and Barber B. Conable, Jr., both Republicans from the Rochester area, praised the Carpenters for their efforts in the agreement. They noted in a joint statement that the program "will help the disadvantaged as well as communities hit by a crucial shortage of low-cost housing."

Recruiting of unemployed and unskilled workers in the Greater Rochester area will start immediately, the company said. Training is expected to get under way with the completion of the Stirling Homex Training Center at Avon, N.Y., in March.

Pres. M. A. Hutcheson of the Carpenters said the union "heartily endorses" the effort. "We look forward to cooperating . . . in future training programs consistent with our collective bargaining agreement," he added.

David Stirling, Jr., chairman of the company, said the firm will train the unemployed in a wide variety of production line tasks, "enabling them to acquire several high-level skills and commensurate wages."

"We at Stirling Homex are particularly pleased that this program is being carried out under the terms of the existing national agreement between our company and the Carpenters," Stirling added.

The National Urban League is also cooperating by providing personal counseling services to trainees in conjunction with the Economic & Manpower Corp. of New York, which will teach basic education.

Each trainee will participate in an 11-week program, receiving 485 hours of training in production line skills. The program will be divided into 255 hours of classroom training and 230 hours of on-the-job experience.

3,500 Ticket Agents Strike National Airlines

Pickets representing 3,500 National Airlines ticket agents marched at airports and downtown offices in 43 cities in a strike following the breakdown of negotiations after 12 months of contract talks.

At some locations the pickets joined Machinists who were locked out by National management more than a year ago. The airline has been using supervisors and new hires to service its planes while the mechanics' dispute drags through the courts.

National air routes are chiefly from Boston to Miami and across the south to Los Angeles. The line halted all service when the Air Line Employes walked out Jan. 30. They are affiliated with the Air Line Pilots.

The union reported no progress in talks resumed in Washington, D.C., at the request of the National Mediation Board. As negotiations continued, ALEA Pres. Victor J. Herbert called for a change in company labor relations policies he called "petty, reactionary and at times even vindictive."

Over a 25-year period, Herbert said, National has caused more work stoppages than any other air line because of its "take-it-or-leave-it" approach to bargaining—a refusal to pay the same wages as other industry employers in the face of prosperous operations.

ALEA's eventual goal, he said, is to "develop and maintain a high degree of professionalism" among members, who include not only ramp agents but station agents, ticket and reservations agents, office workers and many other specialists.

When the ALEA strike started, the IAM called on the federal government to grant Machinists the same right to strike National as has been given ALEA. It said the National Mediation Board has refused to release IAM members from mediation after 14 months of futile negotiations.

An IAM suit to compel National to reinstate the 1,000 National mechanics with full backpay is curcently before the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans. The airline is resisting a court order to that effect. In another development, the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia upset a lower court order directing the NMB to end mediation in the IAM-National case.

Office Union Sues AEC Contractor

Las Vegas — A federal court suit filed here by Office & Professional Employes' Local 445 charges the Atomic Energy Commission and an atomic test site contractor with using more than $10,000 in taxpayers' money to finance an anti-union compaign.

According to the suit, Holmes & Narver, Inc. paid employes for 1,000 man-hours spent attending "captive audience" meetings to persuade them to vote against the local in a National Labor Relations Board representation election.

The NLRB has since thrown out the election and ordered a new one.

Alleging that the pay to workers attending the anti-union meetings came out of AEC funds, the local wants the court to order the commission not to pay the firm for wages paid during the meetings and to get back money already allotted for that purpose.

Crash in Colombia Kills 2 Unionists

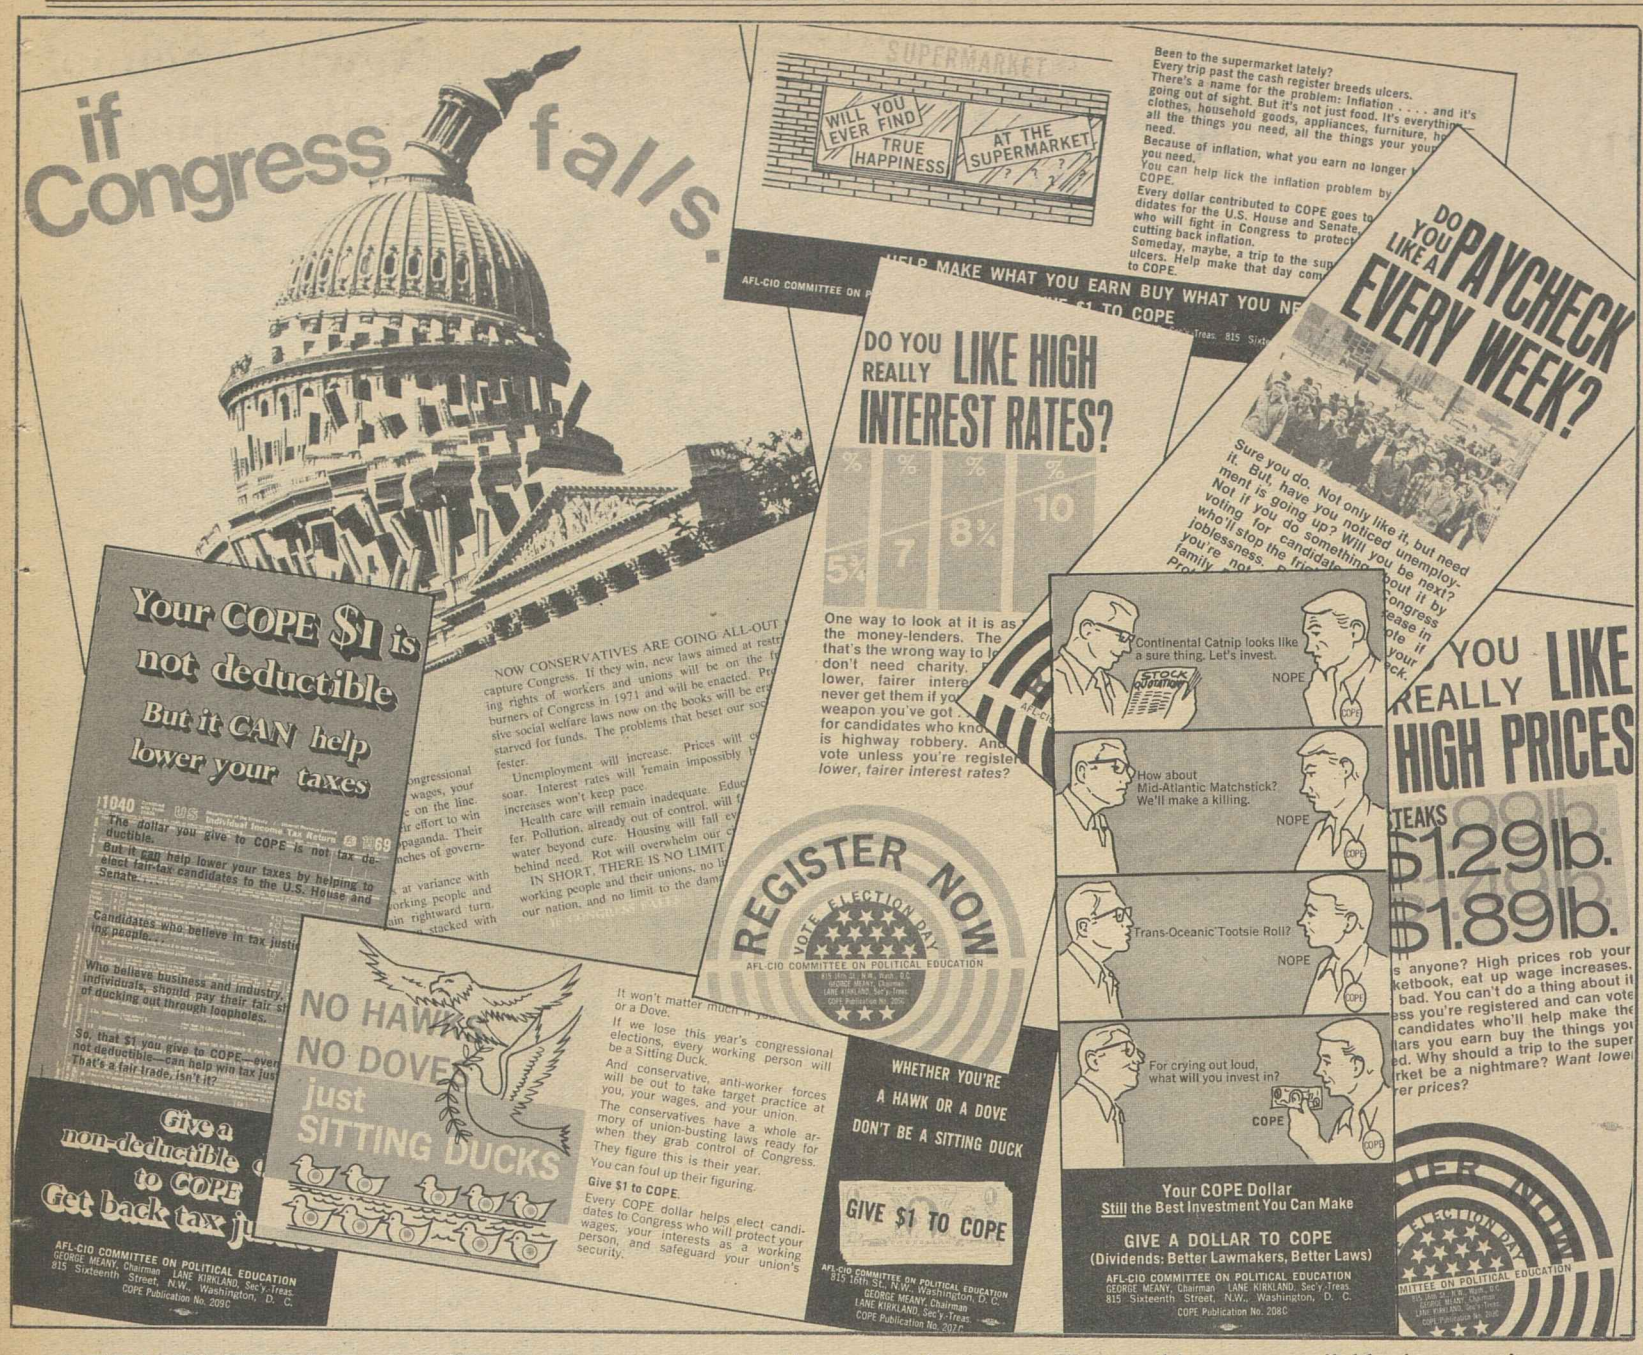
Two union men, fatally injured in a traffic accident on a visit to Colombian unions, were doing the "extremely important work of labor ambassadors" to fellow workers, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in messages of sympathy to their families.



Bill R. Ramey, secretary-treasurer of Pasadena, Tex. Local 4-367 of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers. and Al Chandler, secretary-treasurer of Long Beach, Calif., Local 1-28 of OCAW, were killed instantly Jan. 26 in a head-on collision between a taxi and a passenger bus on a highway between Cartagena and Barranquilla, on Colombia's northern coast.

Also killed was Gustavo Monzon, president of the National Federation of Chemical & Pharmaceutical Workers. Two others were injured critically—the taxi driver and an interpreter employed by the U.S. embassy in Bogota.

Both the OCAW and the AFL-CIO have lost capable and loyal trade unionists "and we want you to know how keenly we feel that loss," Meany wrote in offering the condolences of the AFL-CIO to the widows, Mrs. Ramey of Pasadena and Mrs. Chandler of Huntington Beach, Calif.

CONVENTION

The Newspaper Guild will hold its annual national convention in Seattle, Wash., June 22-26 instead of on the dates previously reported, Pres. Charles A. Perlik said.

CAMPAIGN TOOLS for the 1970 elections are being made available by the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education in the form of eight new pamphlets and three films. Three of the leaflets are designed to help boost voter registration, four are on COPE Dollar Drives and one covers in detail the stakes of the elections. All pamphlets are available in quantity at no charge from COPE, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006. The films may be rented from the AFL-CIO Film Division, same address, at $3 per showing. The leaflets and films will be featured at the area COPE conferences.

Policy Resolutions Booklet Available

Policy resolutions adopted by the eighth AFL-CIO convention in Atlantic City, N.J., are published in a new 169-page booklet issued by the federation's Dept. of Publications.

The 94 resolutions cover a full range of topics, including economic and social issues, education, labor-management relations, and legislative and political policies.

The booklet is priced at 85 cents per copy, $75 per 100 copies. Checks should be made payable to the AFL-CIO Secretary-Treasurer. Orders may be placed through the Pamphlet Division, AFL-CIO Dept. of Publications, 815 Sixteenth St. N.W., Washington, D.C., 20006.

Negroes in City Poverty Areas Fail to Share Employment Gains

Employment in city poverty areas "improved in 1969 but at a slower pace than in 1968," the Labor Dept. reported. It noted that most of last ye ar's improvement occurred in the first three months.

The department's Bureau of Labor Statistics al so found that the gap in unemployment rates between blacks and whites in the poverty sections w idened over the year.

A year-in-review section accompanied a report showing that poverty neighborhoods in the nation's 100 largest cities had a 4.9 percent jobless rate in the last three months of 1969, not significantly changed from the same quarter in 1968.

Poverty neighborhoods, as defined by BLS on the basis of Census Bureau data, are the poorest one-fifth of the neighborhoods in each city surveyed.

The average jobless rate in poverty neighborhoods in 1969 was 5.5 percent, compared to 6 percent in 1968 and 6.8 percent in 1967.

The 1969 average rate, BLS said, was "still substantially higher" than both the rate for the nation as a whole, 3.5 percent, and the average rate for other areas of the 100 cities, 3.1 percent.

Total unemployment in poverty neighborhoods in 1969 averaged 347,000, about 40,000 less than the 1968 average. By contrast, joblessness in these neighborhoods was reduced by about 75,000 on the average between 1967 and 1968.

The government reported that three-fourths of the 40,000 drop in unemployment in the poverty areas occurred among whites, who make up three-fifths of the labor force in these areas.

The jobless rate for whites in the poorest neighborhoods dropped eight-tenths of 1 percent over the year to 4.2 percent, while the 1969 rate for blacks, 7.2 percent, was unchanged.

For adult men in poverty neighborhoods, the unemployment rate averaged 3.6 percent in 1969, down about six-tenths of 1 percent from 1968. White and black males shared about equally in the reduction.

In spite of this improvement, BLS noted, the jobless rate for adult men in poverty areas was "double the rate for adult men—usually the family breadwinners—from other urban neighborhoods."

For adult women in poverty neighborhoods, the unemployment rate averaged 5.1 percent in 1969, down four-tenths of 1 percent from 1968. However, while the rate for white women fell from 4.8 to 3.9 percent, the rate for Negro women rose from 6.2 to 6.5 percent.

The unemployment rate for teenagers in poverty neighborhoods was unchanged at 19.9 percent in 1969. But in this category also the rate for whites decreased while the rate for blacks went up.

Employment in the poverty neighborhoods averaged 6 million in 1969, about 85,000 below the 1968 average, BLS said. Coupled with the 40,000 drop in unemployment—that is in those seeking employment—this meant that there were 125,000 fewer workers in the neighborhood labor force than in 1968. A factor in this decline was a decrease in population in the areas in 1969.

The BLS report for the last three months of 1969 said it "marked the third consecutive quarter in which the overall unemployment rate for workers in poverty neighborhoods has registered little or no over-the-year improvements."

The jobless rate for white workers was 3.9 percent in the fourth quarter, a drop of five-tenths of 1 percent from 1968, as joblessness declined among adult men and women.

But for Negro workers, the fourth quarter rate of unemployment — 6.4 percent — was unchanged from a year earlier. As was the case in the figures for the entire year, a decrease in joblessness among black adult males was offset by an increase in unemployment among black women and teenagers.

Social Security System Aids 25 Million Persons

On Jan. 3, the Social Security System completed its first 30 years of benefit payments with one out of eight Americans receiving benefits and a 15 percent overall increase in benefits in the works.

Statistics published by the Social Security Administration point up how large a role in the lives of the American people the labor-supported system now plays with an even larger role likely in the future.

Here are some of the highlights of the program as it enters its 31st year:

- Social security cash benefits totaled nearly $27 billion in 1969, $2 billion higher than the amount paid out in 1968.
- During 1969, the number of men, women, and children receiving social security benefits each month passed the 25 million mark, or one of every eight Americans.

While the majority are older people, about one out of every four is under age 60. As 1969 ended, 2.5 million disabled workers and their dependents were collecting payments that amounted to $196 million a month.

- Payments to survivors—to the 6.2 million widows, children, and aged dependent parents of workers who have died—were $495 million a month at the end of December. And almost $1.5 billion was being paid out in retirement benefits to older workers and their dependents, a total of 16.6 million persons.
- During 1969, the trust funds out of which cash benefits are paid took in $5.5 billion more than the total paid out.

Airline Firing For Marriage Ruled Illegal

Chicago—A U.S. District Court judge ruled that United Air Lines violated the Civil Rights Act of 1964 when it fired stewardess Mary Burke Sprogis in 1966 because she married in violation of a company rule against the employment of married stewardesses.

Mrs. Sprogis has been a leader of the Air Line Pilots' stewards and stewardesses division.

Judge J. S. Perry ordered United to restore Mrs. Sprogis to her job with all rights restored and to give her backpay from the date of firing to date of reinstatement. He kept jurisdiction over the case until a master in chancery determines the amount of backpay and United pays it.

The court also retained jurisdiction for the purpose of determining whether other fired stewardesses also should receive backpay because of dismissal under the company's no-marriage policy.

The judge pointed out that the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission came to a similar conclusion in 1968 but the airline did not act on the finding. He issued an order restraining United from discriminating against Mrs. Sprogis because of her sex while permitting male employes to continue on the job after marriage.

Title VII of the Civil Rights Act makes it unlawful for an employer to discriminate against any individual because of sex, except where sex "is a bona fide occupational qualification reasonably necessary to the normal operation" of a business. In this case United did not prove that its rule was necessary for normal operations, the court said.

The ruling grew out of an EEOC decision in August 1968 that American Airlines broke the law when it fired two members of the Transport Workers for violating company age and marriage rules. TWU pressed the case and the decision was hailed by other unions which also were fighting such rules.

Trade Councils Receive Funds For Outreach

Three area building and construction trades councils have received Labor Dept. grants totaling $222,597 to prepare 180 minority youths for craft apprenticeship examinations.

A new one-year contract for $46,790 was awarded the San Antonio AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Council to prepare 40 young men for apprentice programs.

The San Antonio council has already placed 42 youths in eight different construction trades under a previous contract.

A follow-up contract was granted the Oklahoma City BCTC for $49,620 to train 40 youths. In its previous contract, the council placed 111 trainees in 10 skilled trades.

The Southern California Area Construction Opportunity Program, which is operated by a contractors association and area building and construction trades councils, received $126,187 to train 100 youths from Orange, Riverdale and San Bernardino counties.

This is the first contract awarded to the Southern California group under the Apprenticeship Outreach program that is aimed at helping minority youths enter the construction trades.

Equal Rights Urged For Farm Workers

Farm workers should have the same legal right as other American workers to join unions and bargain collectively, the AFL-CIO told a Senate Agriculture subcommittee in detailing labor's objections to a bill that would outlaw strikes during the harvest season and boycotts by organized labor.

The Agriculture subcommittee, headed by Sen. B. Everett Jordan (D-N.C.), scheduled three days of hearings at the request of Sen. George Murphy (R-Calif.). The Senate Labor Committee is the usual channel for legislation dealing with strikes and collective bargaining.

The AFL-CIO is "strongly in favor" of including agricultural employes under the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act, Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller wrote Jordan. Federation Pres. George Meany testified to that effect last May before the Senate Labor Committee, he said, and requested that the transcript of Meany's testimony as well as Biemiller's statement be included in the subcommittee's hearing record.

Another statement defending the right of all workers to form unions and to bargain with their employers was filed by John E. Cosgrove for the U.S. Catholic Conference, representing the bishops of the United States.

Noting that farm workers in California "have made heroic efforts to bargain with their employers" for more than five years, Cosgrove said the "persistent refusal of some employers to bargain has prompted a growing number of citizens . . . to demand just and workable farm legislation."

He added that "although we heartily concur in this demand, we reject" the Murphy bill as being neither just nor workable.

Biemiller listed a number of reasons for the AFL-CIO's opposition to the bill sponsored by Murphy.

Although the bill "purports to recognize the rights of farm workers to organize and bargain collectively, that is a complete fraud," he declared. The bill increases, rather than reduces, the present "invidious legal status" of farm workers, he said.

"It would worsen, not improve their lot."

Biemiller charged that the bill would so restrict farm workers' unions as to make it impossible for them ever to secure recognition by employers and, if they do, "they will never be able to function effectively."

Other restrictions would immobilize supporters by forbidding such activities as the grape boycott and would transgress the rights of free speech and assembly guaranteed by the First Amendment.

Biemiller said the bill also contains the "shopping list of amendments to the labor act that a gaggle of employer lawyers has been peddling for years."

On a provision of the bill for a Farm Labor Board that would be part of the Dept. of Agriculture, the AFL-CIO said the evident purpose is to "give the big farmers and growers a tribunal stacked in their favor, since the department is notoriously subservient to the big farmers, and notably callous to the living conditions of farm workers."

Labor is convinced, Biemiller concluded, that no senator who believes that farm workers are human beings, or who believes in holding the balance between labor and management at all even, will support the Murphy proposal.

Earlier, the National Farmers Organization and 20 other consumer, labor and religious groups voiced strong opposition to the Murphy bill.

"The only protection against a strike, at harvest time or any other time, is a valid contract . . . enforceable in courts," NFO Legislative Rep. Harry L. Graham testified. He emphasized:

"Strikes cannot be prevented by law. . . . The right to strike is an essential and constitutional right and is thereby an ever-present element in collective bargaining."

The Rev. Eugene L. Boutilier of Washington, D.C., testified for himself as a clergyman of the United Church of Christ. Boutilier, who is director of the National Campaign for Agricultural Democracy, gave the subcommittee the names of 20 civic organizations described by him as "united in opposition" to the Murphy bill.

The bill, he said, would "use the procedures of the federal government to create in agriculture a special breed of unions—docile, ineffective and easily controlled by employers or their contractors."

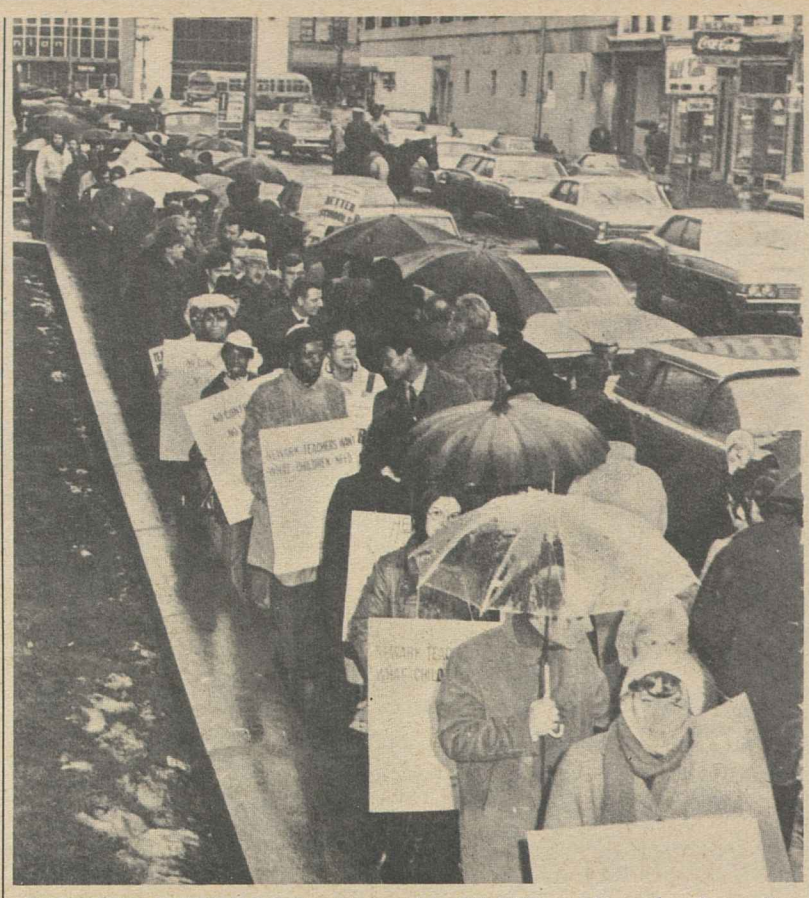
Its first goal, he said, is to prevent unionism in agriculture; then, "as unionism becomes inevitable, the second goal is to make it powerless." The bill is designed to "give the form and appearance" but not the substance of organized labor activity, he charged.

The bill, he specified, "makes no attempt to deal with the problems faced by consumers"—dumping or holding by producers; manipulation of prices and supplies by major wholesalers and retailers. There is "nothing to prevent lockouts and arbitrary shutdowns by producers."

"This is not a consumer protection bill and America's consumer groups are not fooled by it," Mr. Boutilier said.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce filed statements supporting the bill.

The C of C was represented by Martin J. Zaninovich, owner of a Delano, Calif., table grape farm and past president of the California Grape & Tree Fruit League. Accompanying him was Pres. Allan Grant of the California Farm Bureau Federation.



Two spokesmen for citrus and vegetable growers also endorsed the bill. One grower who spoke in opposition was Pres. Charles M. Creuziger of the Vegetable Growers Association of America.

Machinists Win Texas Unit of 450

Nacogdoches, Tex.—Staff representatives of the Machinists and the AFL-CIO teamed with an in-plant organizing committee at the Nibco Co. brass foundry here to win bargaining rights for 450 workers. The victory in a National Labor Relations Board election was the first in any industrial plant in Nacogdoches County.

The vote was 220-200 for the IAM, with seven challenged ballots. The foundry had been unorganized for 25 years, AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Nicholas Kurko and IAM Vice Pres. George L. Watkins said.

A previous attempt to organize foundry workers was unsuccessful when race became an issue. This time an in-plant organizing committee of 64 workers met the issue of the Supreme Court's school desegregation decisions successfully by concentrating on bread-and-butter problems, Kurko said.

BETTER SCHOOLS for Newark's 80,000 public school pupils are an objective of union teachers marching in the rain before the Newark, N.J., Board of Education headquarters. Members of Teachers Local 481 walked out on strike despite a court order when officials refused to talk about any improvements except in wages.

Texans Oppose State Takeover of Training

Corpus Christi, Tex.—Widespread poverty in Texas can only be eliminated through a federally financed and administered manpower policy that includes an emphasis on creating jobs, a U.S. Senate subcommittee was told here.

A majority of 15 witnesses testifying at a hearing conducted by Senators Ralph Yarborough (D-Tex.) and Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.) opposed Pres. Nixon's proposal to turn over administration of manpower programs to the states.

On the other hand, representatives of labor, manpower programs and civil rights groups in the state supported a bill introduced by Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) and co-sponsored by more than 100 other House members.

As a reporter for the Corpus Christi Caller-Times interpreted the consensus of testimony given at the all-day hearing, "The state of Texas got a vote of no confidence."

Pres. H. S. Hank Brown of the Texas AFL-CIO supported the O'Hara bill because it eliminates duplication in manpower programs, keeps them under federal jurisdiction and provides for large-scale public service employment.

His statement, read by Henry Munoz, Jr., human resources director for the State AFL-CIO, estimated that Texas probably has the largest number of families living in poverty of any state in the nation.

In addition to the hard-core unemployed in the state, the statement pointed out, there are the underemployed, thousands of disadvantaged Negroes and Mexican-Americans crowded into cities, and "more than 169,000 migrant farm workers who earn less than $1,000 a year."

The Texas AFL-CIO said that while Pres. Nixon has acknowledged that every American who is willing to work should have a decent job at a fair wage, his manpower proposals do not provide "for turning a trainee into a job holder."

The problems of employment and unemployment "are complex and national in scope," the state federation said, and therefore "require national solutions, not 50 different approaches."

"Placing major responsibility for the unemployed problems of the poor, the disadvantaged, the Negroes and Mexican-Americans in the hands of the state would be a very serious mistake," the federation emphasized.

Other labor witnesses who testified in support of the O'Hara bill were Pres. H. B. McCool of the Coastal Bend Labor Council, Corpus Christi, and Paul Montemayor and Pedro Resendez of the Steelworkers. They stressed the dual importance of providing job training and jobs.

A number of witnesses sharply criticized the present Texas government and past ones for unconcern over the problems of the poor, including their need for education, job training and jobs.

State Rep. Frances Farenthold said Texas could not be expected to develop new manpower programs "for our state has not come of age politically in regard to human rights and betterment."

Dr. Hector P. Garcia, founder of the American GI Forum, a Mexican - American organization, charged that "the governors of Texas have never been sincerely interested in the welfare of the poor and the needy.

"So I oppose any bill which gives the governor any 'say so' on such matters because the governor is never going to 'say so.' "

An important feature of the O'Hara bill, Garcia said, is that it would keep the responsibility for manpower programs within the U.S. Dept. of Labor while allowing "maximum flexibility in designing work for all those willing and able to work."

R. J. Brylke Retires, Staff Member 30 Years

Hanover, Pa.—AFL-CIO Field Rep. Robert J. Brylke retired recently after 30 years of service in organizing, servicing and collective bargaining. He joined the AFL staff in 1940 and after merger was transferred to the staff of the Pennsylvania-Delaware-New Jersey region.

Brylke helped organize for the Mine Workers and later joined Auto Workers Local 842, Hagerstown, Md. He is 65.

Newark School Strike Spurs Renewed Talks

Newark, N.J.—A strike of 3,000 teachers in the state's largest school system closed most of the city's public schools and brought a quick return of school officials to the bargaining table.

Board of Education representatives had offered to raise wages $1,300 a year but declined to talk about other issues they called "management prerogatives." When a court injunction failed to halt a strike voted by members of Teachers Local 481, the board agreed to resume negotiations.

Besides better wages and working conditions, teachers want a reduction in class size, binding arbitration of unsettled grievances, and a voice in teacher transfers, promotions, and relations with the community.

When Local 481's contract expired, a sizable gap remained on wages and working conditions. Board officials refused to talk about the union's More Effective Schools program, teacher evaluation and similar issues, AFT Rep. Larry Birchette reported. The strike vote was nearly unanimous.

The board attempted to keep the city's 84 schools open but most of the 80,000 pupils stayed home.

Two other AFT locals also were involved in strike action. Gary, Ind., Local 4 stayed out 19 days to win an improved contract for 2,200 teachers. Some 500 members of Superior, Wis. Local 202 walked out when board officials refused to complete contract negotiations and refused binding fact-finding.

24,000 Carpenters Win Chicago Pact

Chicago—Delegates representing 24,000 construction carpenters in the Chicago area have approved a two-year contract agreement providing wage increases of $1.60 an hour plus 40 cents for improved pension, welfare and health plans.

Locals in Cook, Lake and DuPage counties accepted an offer by the Builders Association to raise wages from $6.05 an hour to $6.85 as of next June 1 and to $7.65 a year later. An additional 11 cents an hour will go into the welfare fund and 29 cents into pensions over the two-year period.

Payments into the union-employer training fund will be raised from the current 3 cents an hour to 7 cents next June 1 and to 8 cents on June 1, 1971, District Council Pres. George Vest, Jr., said.

GOP Dinner Shifted From Non-Union Inn

St. Louis — Republicans switched the site of a $100-a-plate fund raising dinner here so the star speaker—Vice Pres. Spiro T. Agnew—wouldn't have to cross a union picket line.

The St. Louis AFL-CIO warned GOP leaders they could expect union pickets if the Feb. 10 dinner was held at Stouffer's Riverfront Inn, as originally announced. It is the only major hotel in the city without a union contract.

The chairman of the dinner then announced it would be moved to The Arena, a sports and exhibition hall, so as not to subject Agnew to the "indignity and embarrassment of crossing any picket line."

With satisfaction, the AFL-CIO noted that all employes of The Arena are union members. Incidentally, it is owned by Sidney Salomon Jr., Missouri's Democratic national committeeman.

Discomfort or Crisis?

THE YEAR 1970 in economic terms "will not be a comfortable one with very little real growth, some rise in unemployment, a profits squeeze and price increases—less than in 1969 but still strong."

Who says so? The U.S. Dept. of Commerce in its monthly publication "Survey of Current Business." Its assessment of the outlook for 1970 is candid and forthright. For example:

Expansion of the economy—growth—in the latter part of the year is "certainly tentative." "It depends heavily not only on private decisions but also the course of monetary and fiscal policy. It is not clear when and to what extent monetary policy will ease; and it is well known that there are lags in the effects of monetary policy, though their length is uncertain."

This reads simply that no one is certain when the Federal Reserve Board, the Administration, or both, will loosen up the current tight money and start bringing down the impossibly high interest rates. And even if this should happen, no one really knows how long it will take before the actions have some effect on the economy.

Fiscal restraint, says the Dept. of Commerce magazine, "appears to be abating" and should lessen progressively during 1970.

This reads that cutting back government spending has reached its maximum impact in terms of economic policy.

SO WHAT THEN? Well, says the magazine, there is always the question of "significant labor strife" in 1970, and if that should occur that "would add substantially to the degree of discomfiture already projected for the year ahead."

Read this to mean that if workers battle for wage increases to bring their real purchasing power into line with increased prices, and attempt to advance their standard of living towards the goal of the government's moderate living standards budgets, things will really get rough.

The Commerce Dept.'s magazine preceded the President's budget and economic messages to Congress which in effect underscored the uncomfortable year approach with policies of zero growth for at least half of the year, and a tight lid on federal programs that would help solve some of the nation's major headaches.

That 1970 will not be a "comfortable" year in economic terms is an interesting and candid commentary. But in real terms it will mean more persons unemployed, a more difficult task of bringing social justice to millions of workers whose incomes have lagged badly in the past few years.

It will mean also an indeterminate delay in moving in on the score of grievous problems that call for governmental aid and solutions—problems that at the moment are heavy with rhetoric and light on funds.

All that adds up to more than a year of economic discomfort; it could be a year of real crisis.

Nixon's Ambiguous Artistry Leaves Democrats Muttering

By John P. Roche

IN NORMAL TIMES, Pres. Nixon's State of the Union address would have brought the Democrats out roaring. Acknowledging fully Mr. Nixon's right to be a Republican and the ambiguous artistry of his presentation, one would have to go back to Calvin Coolidge to find a speech with so few operational commitments. But the fact is that the President had left the Democrats in a state of paralysis, muttering complaints that he stole their big issues—the quality of life and pollution. While in political terms it should be clear that one talks about the quality of life when he wants to avoid discussing the quantity of commitment (that is, the budget), no leading Democrat has been willing to put on his war paint.

This is a classic case of the self-gambit. By their irresponsible use of the Viet Nam issue ("We are going to take off the gloves on Viet Nam." Sen. Fred Harris, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, October 1969), the Democratic leadership set itself up for the kill. When the President moved in masterfully on Nov. 3, the Democrats suddenly found themselves on an isolated hilltop besieged by the "silent majority." Shocked to discover that there are over 205 million Americans who are not college activists, they promptly went underground, leaving Mr. Nixon in complete control of the field of battle.

Now, overcautious, sensing that silent majority all around them, the Democrats take to their bunkers the minute they hear "Hail to the Chief." If Nixon drew one card at poker, they would fold immediately, knowing he had four of a kind, not two pairs in search of improvement. In short, the Democrats have a loser's complex — the President has them jinxed.

From this viewpoint, the State of the Union address was brilliantly crafted. If one reads the section on the new direction of our foreign policies with care, he suddenly understands why the President was such a good poker player. He set up a perfect high-low hand.

The high hand is in the tradition of liberal internationalism with strong emphasis on modesty, "mutual consultation," "new partnership," a "sharing of responsibility." No arrogance here—just the kind of posture to warm the heart of J. William Fulbright or J. Kenneth Galbraith.

In contrast, the low hand is built around the theme of disengagement, which some of us persist in calling isolationism. The language was a bit Aesopian, but the message was clear: the United States, regrettably, will not defend anybody incapable of defending himself. (By this standard, we would still be waiting around for the French to expel the Nazis.)

To say, as the President did, that the "great industrial nations of Europe, as well as Japan . . . have a determination to assume the responsibility for their own defense" is absurd on its face—unless the United States is prepared to see Bonn and Tokyo go nuclear.

IN THIS CONNECTION, the President made one statement that is flatly wrong. "In two wars, first in Korea and now in Viet Nam, we furnished . . . most of the men to help others defend their freedom." Our troop commitment in Korea was less than half that of the Seoul government; in Viet Nam our troop levels have never been greater than those of ARVN.

Perhaps a more dramatic contrast is provided by mortality figures in proportion to population. We lost 35,000 in Korea and a little over 40,000 to date in Viet Nam—both the ROKS and ARVN lost the equivalent of several million Americans. Their contribution to the defense of their own freedom should be honored, not deprecated.

But whether based on modesty and humility or national selfishness, isolationism is the order of the day. The President set the mood, and the Democrats, hypnotized by their own slogans, were incapable of uttering one word in defense of a foreign policy that has stabilized the world through the most dangerous quarter of a century human history has yet known.

UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

Civil Rights Leader Says:

Objective Investigation Urged Of Raids on Black Panthers

By Bayard Rustin

FOR YEARS AND YEARS black people in the South have been exposed to brutal and arbitrary violence committed by roving bands of white vigilantes. In the early 1960s white civil rights workers from northern universities caught a first-hand glimpse of the southern phenomenon of night-raids and terror, and some even lost their lives in the process.

There is considerable evidence that this brand of southern violence has now moved to the North. The police raids against the Black Panthers in Chicago and Los Angeles may not be identical to the night raids south of the Mason-Dixon, just as the Panthers are not replicas of southern Negroes, but the similarities are greater than the differences. The North now has its own version of Klan terror.

The police in Chicago and Los Angeles have substituted the force of arms for the authority of law. When men who are entrusted to enforce the law take the law into their own hands and act without regard to judicial and ethical constraints, then the legal basis upon which a democratic society rests is threatened and the continuance of social order becomes problematical.

The sole dependence upon force to maintain order is an admission that law has lost its validity. At this point the only alternatives open to a society are totalitarianism or anarchy.

The evidence available casts doubt upon the police account of the events in Chicago. It is not likely that the Panthers fired first, as the police claim.

The subservience of some of the press in Chicago to the police, like the arbitrary use of force to maintain order, is a threat to any democratic system.

One of the reasons the police have felt free to declare open season on the Panthers is that the policies and rhetoric of the latter have aroused little sympathy in the country. Certainly the outcry against the persecution of the Panthers would be far greater had they made any effort to appeal to a broad section of the American people.

Martin Luther King advocated a policy of nonviolence in word as well as in deed not only because he was a pacifist, but also because he understood that the historical and political situation in the United States is such that the rhetoric of violence can in itself become a trap for minorities.

ONE MUST PROTEST vigorously against what the police have done, and one should also support the right of black people to defend themselves. Yet one cannot deny a fundamental political reality in American life: namely, that the ultimate destination of black people who resort to violence as a political weapon will be jail, exile, or death. This is not a question of objectives or of ideology. It is simply a question of strategy.

With the emotionalism of all parties so intense, it is essential that there be an objective nationwide investigation into all of the clashes between the Panthers and the police.

An independent commission, therefore, has been established which is headed by Roy Wilkins and Arthur Goldberg and of which I am a member. The commission will impose a degree of sanity upon this explosive situation, and it will let the public know the facts. At the moment there is a great need for sanity and objectivity.

Poverty-Level Doles:

Additional Step-Ups Needed In Social Security Benefits

LAST YEAR'S benefit improvements were only a start on the "catch up" needed to lift a great many social security retirees out of poverty, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman declared. He called for a further 25 percent boost over the next two years.

"We think that people who are forced to depend on social security should be assured of at least a minimum level of living which takes them out of poverty," said Seidman. That, he stressed, "is not the case today."

Seidman urged passage of a bill introduced by Rep. Jacob Gilbert (D-N.Y.), providing a further 5 percent boost in social security benefits this year, and another 20 percent in 1972.

He said the Gilbert approach can be accomplished with "no change of any consequence in the social security tax rate that individuals pay on their incomes," by lifting the earnings base to $15,000 and adding a federal contribution that "would gradually reach one-third of the total cost of the program."

The $15,000 base would put social security contributions back where they were when the program began 30 years ago, he said, with "all of most people's income taxed for social security."

"EVEN WITH the increase that we are asking for," Seidman stressed, "the elderly would not live in great affluence."

Many people receiving security benefits are still living in poverty. "And many more people would be in poverty if they did not receive social security benefits," he noted.

Questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, Seidman said that the President's welfare proposals, now before the House Ways & Means Committee, are sound in increasing federal responsibility for the program and setting a minimum level of payments. But, he said, "the floor is much too low," and other features of the program "place unfair burden on people who have to depend on welfare, through no fault of their own."

He said the work incentive feature "provides no basic [wage] protection," nor any requirement of promotion opportunities, opening the possibility that needy people could be exploited. It is "a blank check that provides no protection whatsoever for the recipient," he asserted, and "is likely to introduce an element of substandard competition to already employed workers."

SEIDMAN SHARPLY challenged the "misinformation" and "misconceptions" about people on the welfare rolls.

"Most of the people on welfare are not really employable," he said. "Most of the people on welfare are either elderly, or disabled, or young children who should be in school, or mothers with children—many of whom should be at home to take care of their children."

On the Medicaid program of comprehensive health care for low-income persons of all ages, Seidman expressed concern over the "backward steps" that have been taken in limiting coverage and services to keep costs down.

"The real answer to the health needs of the American people," he suggested, "is National Health Insurance, which would cover all people, including poor people, on an equal basis."

Meanwhile, he stressed, "the answer to cost escalation is to control the fees paid to doctors and hospitals. The answer is not taking people off the Medicaid rolls—people who have no other way of getting medical services."

The "fee-for-service" system of paying doctors and the "cost-plus" basis for hospital payments "result in an unnecessary inflation of medical costs," Seidman said.

Questioning Seidman on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview were Jerome Brazda of Washington Report on Medicine & Health and Harry Cohn of Press Associates, Inc. The program is broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

OVER THE YEARS we have pointed to our great cities as the symbol of our civilization and its culture.

Today our cities, far from being a desired symbol, are centers of misery, fear and concern. They are decaying areas where the poor, minority groups and elderly are clustered. Our once flourishing centers of industry and trade are faint reminders of their vibrant past.

But the cities cannot be separated from the surrounding metropolitan areas. Together they become our urban crisis.

More than 70 percent of our people now live in urban areas and in 10 to 15 years this should rise to 85 percent. For most of these people, the urban crisis may well be the issue today.

No one can possibly offer a single blueprint to correct urban ills because they are a composite of multiplex problems that overlap and accentuate one another.

There is poor planning, substandard housing, deteriorated neighborhoods, frightening crime, inferior schools, inadequate transportation and pitifully poor social services. And with all this there is the loss of jobs.

Discrimination, no longer as overt and blatant, is nevertheless real and contributing to a polarization of white and black that cannot bode well.

Engulfing all of this is the despoliation of the critical natural resources—air, water and land. All are becoming so defiled that a growing number of experts feel that pollution is menacing our very survival.

Some escape is being found in new communities or towns free of screaming billboards, hamburger drive-ins, dreary slums and auto graveyards. For most Americans, though, this does not reach the core of the problems.

Reaching the core, of course, means moving directly into housing, transportation, pollution, crime, jobs, education, social services, discrimination, health and almost every other aspect of the urban issue.

DURING THE JOHNSON YEARS some positive steps were taken in many of these areas. There was action in housing, for example, in 1965, 1966 and 1968. A minimum goal of 26 million housing units over a ten year period was set in 1968.

And, over recent years, new approaches to the problem have been legislated in rent supplements, aid to low income families for home ownership, fair housing, model cities, new towns and aid to the elderly.

But with interest rates on home mortgages at a 100-year high and with limited funding, these programs have not produced even the minimum desired goal.

Legislation in the transportation and pollution fields, two other critical areas, has stirred some action but fallen far short of resolving the problems.

Organized labor has fought hard for these programs as essential steps that could be realistically achieved but the developing sicknesses of our cities are ample illustration that far more is critically needed.

In recognition of this, the "Freedom Budget" was published two years ago by the A. Philip Randolph Institute. It proposes over a 10 year period, federal expenditures to clear the slums, rebuild our cities, construct the schools, hospitals and transit systems we need, and clear our polluted air and water and develop our natural resources.

The urban crisis affects most of our citizens. A program such as the "Freedom Budget" would provide a monumental uplifting of their spirits and well-being at a time when both are going through a depressing period.

If, however, our prime emphasis is going to be on balancing the federal budget, restricting economic policies in the name of combatting inflation and neglecting essential programs, the future of our cities appears grim.

FURTHER INCREASES are needed in social security benefits to lift a great number of retirees out of poverty, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman tells reporters on Labor News Conference. The interviewers are Jerome Brazda, left, of Washington Report on Medicine & Health and Harry Conn of Press Associates, Inc. The public service program is aired Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on Mutual radio.

How to Buy:

Consumers' Bankruptcy Trap Triggered by Legal Loopholes

By Sidney Margolius

THIS LOOKS like a rough year for working families who have large installment debts. After two years of slackening off, consumer bankruptcies are on the increase again. This is to be expected in a year when installment buying has continued to increase despite increased finance charges and higher basic living costs, making repayments more difficult.

We previously have warned you about the three legal loopholes that often trap debt-loaded families into bankruptcy. These are the "holder in due course" doctrine, repossession laws and garnishee collections.

The "holder in due course" doctrine in the laws of most states permits a finance company to take over your installment contract from the dealer, but absolves the finance company from any responsibility for making good on the purchase if anything goes wrong. Say you buy a used car and the dealer guarantees it for 30 days. But it conks out. Meanwhile the dealer turns over your installment note to a finance company. He has his money and can refuse to do anything about the car. But in most states you still have to pay the finance company.

Some of the most serious incidents have occurred in home improvements.

Paul J. Krebs, director of the New Jersey Office of Consumer Protection, reports that in that state, there were 29 complaints against just one home-improvement company involving defective work, non-completion and violation of written guarantees. The company went out of business, but the homeowners still had to pay the finance companies an average of $1,500 plus interest for shoddy and sometimes incomplete jobs.

In another case, a firm which sold sides of beef which it promised to freeze and store, thus eliminating the need to buy a freezer, went out of business. The families who signed installment contracts to pay for the beef then had to pay the balance due plus interest even though they lost the rest of the meat the defunct freezer firm was storing for them.

As the result of Krebs' exposure of such practices, New Jersey now has eliminated from its laws the holder-in-due-course loophole at least for home improvements if not for all goods. Other states which have eliminated the doctrine in whole or part include Connecticut, Massachusetts, Utah and Vermont.

Unless and until your own state gives you some reasonable protection against this practice, be careful about signing installment notes for home improvements before the job is completed and you have inspected the job or other purchases. As importantly, make sure the firm is well-established in your locality.

Repossession laws which also allow sellers to sue for a deficiency judgment are another widespread legal loophole which can ruin you. For example, a working woman in New York bought $800 worth of furniture. After she paid off $350 she became ill and fell behind in payments. The store repossessed the furniture. It brought very little at the resale held by the seller. By the time the repossession, storage and legal costs were added on to the balance of the debt, she was served with a judgment requiring her to pay the full $800 even though she lost the furniture.

Only California and Utah, to my knowledge, give buyers some partial protection against this practice of repossessing and getting a deficiency judgment too.

THE ONLY FAIR LAW would be to give sellers and finance companies the right to repossess or sue for the balance, but not both. "Eliminating the deficiency clause if the goods are repossessed, especially for cars, would be an effective deterrent to sellers against pushing goods that people do not want or at a price they cannot afford," said Arthur K. Young, director of the Chicago Legal Aid Bureau.

A garnishee to collect any such unfair deficiency can be used by sellers in most states.

As we've warned before, if you ever suffer a repossession, send the finance company a registered letter warning them to make full effort to get a fair price for the goods on resale. Too, attend the sale yourself, preferably with a lawyer or at least a friend.

Even better, before you get to the repossession stage, if you can't pay see if you can resell the goods yourself to a private party for at least enough to cover what you owe.

Folks Who Never Leave Home Develop Special Insight on Life

By Jane Goodsell

I LIVE NOW, and have lived most of my life, in the city where I was born. I sometimes wonder if I am glad that this is so—whether, could I live my life over again, I would elect to live it here, in my home town. And I truly do not know. I am sure only that living as an adult where I grew up as a child has given me an oddly unique view of life.

I have not left my childhood behind me, sublimating it to memory as I would have had I moved away. A good deal of my past is still very much a part of my life. It has changed as I have, and the leftovers of my past do not always fit neatly into my present life. But I cannot shake them off, nor am I sure that I want to.

My childhood friends and I often perplex and sometimes provoke each other, but we depend on one another for comfort and reassurance. We remember each other's birthdays, serve as godparents to each other's children, and show up with coffeecake and casseroles in emergencies.

Living as I do among people who can recall the year I graduated from high school, I cannot lie about my age. Nor about my family tree, my childhood adventures, my adolescent romances or, for that matter, much of anything. If I had moved someplace where nobody knew better, I could invent a colorful genealogy, claiming that my grandfather was a bootlegger and my great-aunt a Russian countess. I could dream up a tempestuous love affair with my high school French teacher. But here I am stuck with the plain, unimaginative truth.

IF I AM PROVINCIAL—and I don't doubt that I am—I think I have learned some lessons that I could not have learned with such certainty had I not lived in the same place for a very long time. Seeing in the face of a newborn baby the spitting image of his great-uncle Henry who pinched my cheeks when I was a child, I realize with stunning impact the force of heredity.

Watching a dopey little boy, who couldn't master the multiplication tables, grow up to become an eminent physicist has made me wary of pigeonholing people. Recollections of drunken driving charges and clever real estate deals make me wary of eulogies.

But knowing, too, of the many small and private kindnesses which people do for each other has helped me to realize that the world isn't as hopeless as it looks on the front page of the morning paper.

Schools Neglecting Work-Bound Youths

EMPLOYMENT-BOUND YOUTH are tragically neglected by their schools, according to Prof. Ralph C. Wenrich of the University of Michigan.

"We offer them a college-preparatory curriculum, then send them off to business, industry, homemaking, and the military services—and they resent it," says the specialist in vocational education and practical arts.

He urges that schools move speedily to render better service to the employment-bound youth.

Wenrich says significant steps can be taken in every high school. "The high school principal and faculty must make as strong a commitment to helping employment-bound youth enter the world of work as they have already made to helping the college-bound youth enter college," he says.

He notes that, nationally, about two-thirds of the youth go to work upon leaving high school, either before or after graduation.

"Within this teenage segment of the labor force, the unemployment rate is apt at any time to be three times as high as that for the labor force as a whole; among teenage Negro males, five times as high; and among teenage Negro females, seven or eight times as high," he says.

Wenrich says many teachers have little knowledge of the world of work beyond the classroom. "These teachers would benefit from in-service activities, such as business-industry-education days and staff-conducted occupational surveys. This would give these teachers a clearer idea of the job opportunities that await students who go directly into employment."

Wenrich believes that it's up to each principal to help faculty members see how their subject fields relate to the world of work.

"As a corrective step," he says, "clearer lines of communication should be established between teachers of different subjects. For example, teachers of business and industrial subjects have much to offer teachers of English, mathematics, science, and social studies by way of insights into the needs of young people."

He also urges principals and faculty to offer youth more help in making realistic career plans. "As a beginning, exploratory experiences in the practical arts should be provided on both the junior and senior high school levels. Clubs and other co-curricular activities are also useful in helping youth understand the world of work."

Wenrich believes the best way for youth to learn about earning a living is by actually working part time during the school year or full time in the summer.

He stresses that school program planners must be fully aware of jobs available and skills needed. "At least one administrator in every high school should be intimately acquainted with the work-life of the community."

ANY SCHOOL wishing to serve the varied occupational interests of students and the diversified needs of the community must provide a wide range of vocational offerings, he says.

"Many schools can provide programs for only a few occupations. To cope with this situation many states are now developing area vocational schools or centers where students desiring specialized vocational instruction may enroll."

Also, he notes, some schools have entered into full-fledged partnerships with local industries, whereby industry lends equipment, facilities, and even staff, to get a program into operation.

Wenrich believes high schools should operate a job placement service, helping to find part-time employment for young people still in school and full-time employment for those ready to leave school. In addition, he says, the schools should follow up those students who go directly into employment.

"The technological revolution in our society is bringing about changes more profound than we can begin to imagine," Wenrich points out. "Chief among these will be the need for a labor force with totally different characteristics than at present—a labor force whose work is based more on knowledge than muscle."

Labor Studies Center Operations Stress the Practical Approach

There are no ivy-covered walls at 1500 Massachusetts Avenue where the new AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center is located in Washington.

The curriculum of the training programs parallels the appearance of the facilities: practical and functional—designed for the immediate needs of the people in the labor movement.

Yet the expertise of the teaching staff in labor affairs and the availability of key officials in government and the trade union movement puts the center well beyond the scope of long established labor institutes at colleges and universities.

Twenty students in the initial staff development program represented a wide cross section of AFL-CIO affiliates in industrial and white collar unions and the building trades.

The school day begins at 9 a.m. for a full schedule of classes running through 4:30 p.m. with a break for lunch at mid-day. Two nights a week the students return to the center for labor policy seminars.

Five of the three-week staff development programs will be offered during the first six months of operation. Simultaneously, one week institutes are being conducted, to cover special studies in civil rights, social security, labor education, urban affairs, state and local bodies, international affairs, organizing and political and legislative activities.

Packed into the staff development training is a curriculum calling for 15 hours of study in each of these areas: economics, social studies and effective reading.

An additional 18-20 hours are devoted to union history and current labor affairs. The participants also spend another 18-20 hours in special study projects.

A counseling service is provided to the students to prepare them for their research into the special projects. On completing their studies, they make a report on the subject to the class.

The teaching and administrative staff of the center is headed by Dir. Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., former professor and associate director of the School of Labor & Industrial Relations at Michigan State University.

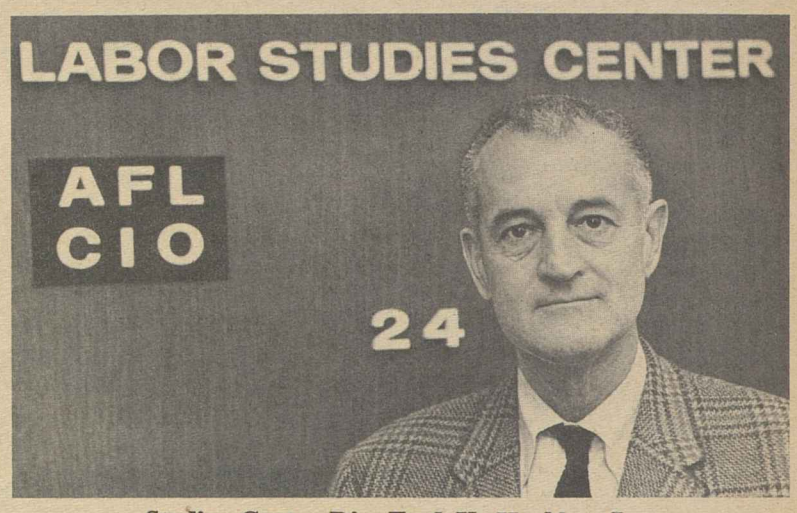
Hoehler cited the particular advantage of locating the center in Washington because of the availability of experts in labor and government to supplement the regular teaching staff.

"Universities find it impossible to mass such a wealth of teaching talent readily available to come in as visiting lecturers," he observed.

The pool of "talent" includes congressmen and senators, officials of key government agencies and the Administration, department heads of the federation and officers of a number of unions based in Washington.



Among the first special lecturers was Federation Pres. George Meany, who discussed a wide range of topics affecting labor and internal affairs of the trade union movement.

Hoehler said that programs being developed at the center will not only supplement the labor studies now existing at colleges and universities, but should aid in improving the current programs on the nation's campuses.

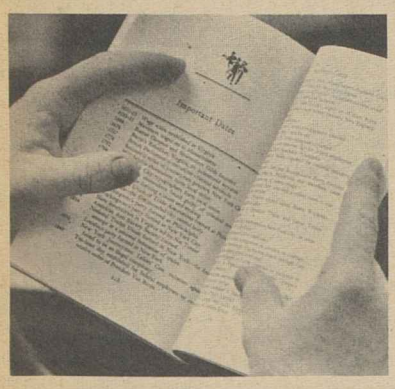
Long range proposals for the center are still fluid. But consideration is being given toward developing programs running for three to six months and later with 12-month terms.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland told graduates of the first staff development program that the basic factor in the success of any new federation project such as the school is support from the international unions.



More than a school, the center is a "trade union environment," Kirkland said, in which people from different unions can work together, exchange new ideas and share experiences.

2,300-Worker Celco Plant Picks TWUA

Narrows, Va.—Bargaining rights for more than 2,300 workers at the Celco plant of the Celanese Corp. here were won by the Textile Workers Union of America in a recent National Labor Relations Board election.

The vote for the TWUA came as the contract between the Celco plant management and the International Union of District 50 ended. District 50 had had a contract with the synthetic fibers plant for 25 years.

Final results in the NLRB election, conducted over a three day period, were: TWUA 996; District 50, 919; Chemical Workers, 66; no union, 6. There was one challenged ballot and two were void.

TWUA Pres. William Pollock and Organizing Dir. Paul Swaity who headed the campaign, said the victory was greatly aided by the help of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization and other AFL-CIO unions.

A Rubber Workers local in Hopewell, Va., which switched from District 50 to the AFL-CIO last March, addressed a letter to each of the Celanese workers informing them that the change had made the Hopewell workers "happier and richer."

TWUA represents the three other acetate fibers plants of the Celanese Corp. located in Rome, Ga., Rock Hill, S.C., and Cumberland, Md. It also represents a number of other plants of the Celanese Corp. engaged in the manufacture of other products.

The Celco plant was the last remaining synthetic fiber plant represented by District 50.

Pollock said the TWUA would move immediately to negotiate a new contract in the Celco plant to bring wages and conditions up to the level of the three other acetate fibers plants of the Celanese Corp. represented by TWUA. The contract is up for renewal this month.

APPRENTICESHIP OUTREACH program for Memphis, Tenn., will be established by the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute in cooperation with the local building trades council. It will be financed by a Labor Dept. grant. Signing the agreement are U.S. Manpower Administrator Malcolm R. Lovell, Jr., left, and HRDI Pres. Julius F. Rothman. Standing are HRDI Executive Dir. Merlin L. Taylor and Robert Brown, associate manpower administrator.

Union Trainees Attend Poverty Conference

Oklahoma City—Training to develope more effective programs to combat poverty was keyed to be needs of 52 trade unionists at a labor-government conference here conducted by the University of Houston.

The trainees at the week-long conference represented 37 AFL-CIO state and local central bodies from eight southern, and Rocky Mountain states. Their course of instruction centered on federal anti-poverty programs and how union members can work with community action agencies.

The trainees came from Oklahoma, Texas, Arkansas, Mississippi, New Mexico, Arizona, Colorado and Wyoming. They will work in their home states to expand opportunities for disadvantaged citizens.

The union leaderships training program is funded by the Office of Economic Opportunity and labor organizations from the eight states.

This was the first of three training sessions to be conducted during 1970 by the University of Houston Center for Human Resources. Last year, the program trained 109 unionists.

In their home areas of operation, the trainees will work with fellow unionists in developing new community action activities to aid the poor or expand existing programs. OEO-labor representatives will be sent throughout the eight-state region to assist the trainees over the next several months.

Most of the trainees will return to a follow-up conference in about three months.

Key participants in the Oklahoma City training conference were Julius Rothman, associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Urban Affairs, and George Guernsey, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education.

A number of other manpower and labor specialists took part in the daily workshops at the conference. Dr. J. Earl Williams is project administrator for the joint OEO-Union Leadership Program which parallels similar efforts in Appalachia and in New England.

A one-day conference also was held recently in Joplin, Mo., for union representatives sponsored by the Southwest Missouri Labor Council and the OEO. It covered a number of government poverty programs including housing, community agencies, manpower, VISTA and legal services.

Plumbers' Label to Go On Prefabricated Units

In-plant production and assembly of plumbing system components by union craftsmen got the go-ahead with the signing of a national agreement by the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters and American-Standard, Inc.

This is the first time the union has approved a plan for production of prefabricated plumbing system components by its members.

The production will involve piping, fixtures and fittings for use in bathroom and kitchen components to be installed in houses.

The agreement, signed in the office of Housing & Urban Development Sec. George Romney, was hailed as a move to increase the volume of available housing.

Prior to the agreement, the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters encouraged the fabrication of plumbing systems on the job sites rather than in the factory.

Under the agreement, factory assembled plumbing units will bear the union's label signifying that they were assembled by skilled union craftsmen. The systems then may be shipped to all other union local jurisdictions for installation.

Provisions of the agreement call for use of so-called "industrialized" plumbers, a classification in addition to the traditional journeymen.

Wage rates and fringe benefits for the production plumbers will be negotiated locally and are to be based on the economic conditions existing in surrounding areas, the union said.

Pres. Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters said the new agreement represents an innovation "designed to solve one of the greatest challenges of our times —more jobs for more people."

Schoemann noted that in recent months the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters have adopted other innovative steps toward expanding job opportunities and meeting the nation's housing crisis.

He referred to the training program for minority group members for the pipefitting trades and the agreement with a building firm for factory prefabrication of modular homes.

Teachers to Study L.A. Pilot Merger

The American Federation of Teachers will not participate in any more mergers on the city level for the time being, AFT Pres. David Selden said in releasing terms of a merger agreement between AFT Local 1021 and the Association of Classroom Teachers, Los Angeles.

"We view the Los Angeles merger as an experiment in teacher unity," Selden said. "We do not intend to participate in any more pilot projects on a city level until after we have seen the effects of the Los Angeles endeavor." It took effect Feb. 1.

Cave Guides Pick Service Employes

Guides at Mammoth Cave, Ky., have chosen Service Employes Local 557, Louisville, Ky., as their exclusive collective bargaining representative.

The new unit, said by SEIU to be the first of its kind in the national parks, includes 44 guides who conduct several hundred thousand tourists through 150 miles of winding trails in southern Kentucky.

The union won recognition from the regional National Park Service under Executive Order 10988, setting the terms under which a union may be chosen as exclusive representative. The guides have named committees to prepare proposals for a first agreement.

'70 Outlook Pitched To Low Growth Rate

The report noted that Administration programs in manpower training and welfare reform "will also help cushion the impact of a temporary increase in unemployment."

Looking beyond 1970, the CEA projected GNP growth through 1975 and various forms of expenditures. It concluded that the projected claims, which assume "no addition to present federal non-defense programs beyond those already proposed by the Administration, would approximately absorb all available resources through 1973 and leave room for significant additions only by 1975."

The Administration budget proposals show mild increases in spending for crime and law enforcement, water pollution and a few other scattered programs in a very tight budget geared to a goal of curbing inflation.

The CEA's projections show a growth from an actual 1969 GNP of $932 billion to a 1975 GNP of $1,200 billion—an increase of $268 billion. The total increase of federal and state and local government purchases (read government programs) for the five-year period would be $13 billion, with federal funds dropping and state and local expenditures rising as part of the Administration's "new federalism."

In contrast, gross private investment, including construction, would increase $50 billion and personal consumption expenditures by $193 billion.

The President, in his message to Congress, called 1969 a year of progress in the fight against inflation as the rate of price increases began to level out. He said the outlook for a slowdown in the rate of consumer prices "is a reasonable expectation" in 1970.

McCracken told a press briefing that he was looking for a 3.5 percent rate of inflation in the final three months of 1970 compared to a rate of 4.7 percent for the same period in 1969.

The Administration's economic policy of combatting inflation by slowing economic growth was spelled out by the CEA when it said that by mid-1970 "the economy, after three quarters of very little increase of real output, would be producing significantly below its potential. Such a GNP gap places a downward pressure on the rate of inflation. Businesses find themselves selling in markets less receptive to price increases. This forces greater resistance to cost increases, including wage increases. These pressures against inflation will continue if demand remains below potential output, even though demand begins to rise more rapidly."

The President and his council conceded that their policy "courts the risk of some rise in unemployment," but Mr. Nixon said that his policies hold out the only hope of keeping "that risk low."

Expansion of the economy in the second half of the year, implying loosening of economic restraints, is geared to containing that "risk," the council said.

Business investment is expected to show a "strong further gain" of about 8 percent for 1970, housing starts will remain at their present critical low and government expenditures, including state and local, will remain about the same at least for the first half of the year.

Appeals Court Backs Women On Equal Pay

Philadelphia — The 3rd Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals has issued a decision which could have far-reaching effects on equal pay for women. The unanimous decision reversed a lower federal court's ruling in a case involving women employes of the Wheaton Glass Company's plant at Millville, N.J.

The case could involve as much as $250,000 in back pay for the women involved. The Secretary of Labor took the case to court as a violation of the Equal Pay Act of 1963, which prohibits separate pay scales for women.

The lower court ruled that the Labor Dept. had not proved that the 21.5 cents less per hour paid to selector-packers was based solely on discrimination by sex. But the higher court reversed the ruling, stating that the employer may not escape the provisions of the Equal Pay Act by making artificial job classifications.

The decision pointed out that the provisions of the Act do not require that jobs be identical, but only that they be substantially equal in order for women to receive the same pay.

Russian Unions 'Police,' But Not for Grievances

New York—Russia's so-called labor organization has called for a national crackdown on workers who are guilty of "absenteeism, loafing and drunkenness," according to the New York Times.

Its correspondent, Bernard Gwertzman, reported on a resolution adopted by the All-Union Central Council of Trade Unions which urged action "by all means possible" against "violations of work and production discipline."

Punishment would range from reprimands by friends and "condemnation" at workers' meetings to trials by "comradely courts," which could strip offenders of vacations, sick pay and other benefits.

Gwertzman pointed out that unions in Russia are an arm of the Communist party and, in effect, pass on to workers the decisions of the government. The union's obligation to protect workers against unjust employer decisions poses some difficulty, he noted, since managements also are under party control.

Real Dollars Totals Reduced:

Budget Clamps Tight Ceiling On Major Social Programs

Nixon billed his new budget as a start towards "reordering our national priorities."

He claimed that "for the first time in two full decades, the federal government will be able to spend more money on human resources programs than on the national defense."

Indeed, the budget sent to Congress proposes substantial reductions in military and space spending, so that these programs represent a smaller percentage of the budget than in previous years. But the rise in "uncontrollable" spending eats up nearly all of those savings, so little additional is available for domestic programs.

While the fiscal 1971 budget is about 3 percent higher than estimated spending this year, it represents a cutback in terms of the buying power of the dollar and the nation's population growth.

Income estimates are based on what the President's economic advisers think is going to happen to the economy. Thus the 1971 budget assumes very little economic growth, a dropoff in corporate profits and taxes, and higher unemployment.

In the one area in which unemployment projections directly figure in the budget, the estimate is that the number of persons receiving unemployment insurance each week will rise by 85,000 to an average of 1,238,000.

Proposed programs and spending levels are inevitably affected by congressional action—some increased, some cut. And congressional action, in turn, can be modified by a President's decision not to spend available funds or by speeding up or slowing down the timetable for various programs.

With all of these qualifications in mind, these are some of the highlights of the President's proposed budget:

POLLUTION—In his State of the Union address, Pres. Nixon said he will propose "the most comprehensive and costly program in this field ever in the nation's history." He said it will include a five-year, $10-billion program to build modern waste treatment facilities wherever they are needed.

Here are the hard facts as laid out in the budget message:

Only $4 billion of the $10 billion turns out to be federal funds. The remainder of the cost is to be borne by states, communities and industry.

Over the five-year period, the federal government would obligate about $800 million a year—exactly the same as Congress appropriated this year. So, despite rising costs, there would be no increase in the level of federal spending for the program.

Neither this year nor next year would the full $800 million show up as budget outlays. That's because the federal money is paid out only as contracts are completed. Thus the outlay in any year is largely tied to appropriations voted by Congress in previous years.

Under existing law, Congress has authorized appropriations of $1.25 billion for sewage treatment plants for the 1971 fiscal year. Congressional Democrats, with some Republican support, have opened a drive to appropriate the full amount.

If they succeed, the amount available for the federal share of water pollution control programs will be $450 million more than the President is asking.

EDUCATION — Once again, the budget asks for less than half the amount of federal aid to education that Congress has authorized. In fact, it was the attempt by Congress to narrow the gap that led Pres. Nixon to veto the appropriations bill funding education programs.

Since Congress and the White House are continuing to battle over this year's education appropriations, it is not yet possible to compare next year's budget with this year's spending level. The new money request is for a moderate overall increase above last year's budget proposal. However, the money would be parcelled out somewhat differently, with some programs increased and others cut back. Details will be spelled out in an education message.

CITIES & HOUSING — The budget calls for the same $575 million for the model cities program that Congress appropriated this year—even though the basic legislation called for raising the amount to nearly $1 billion in the next fiscal year. Urban renewal funds also are continued at about the same level.

Housing & Urban Development Sec. George Romney told newsmen that his department's budget had been "cut to the bone" and he was glad of it. He said less government spending would make more capital available for private industry to finance homebuilding.

One major increase was in Farmers Home Administration housing loans to low and moderate income families in rural areas, intended in part to slow migration to the cities.

LABOR—Additional funds for manpower training programs are the big plus factor in the Labor Dept. budget—up $289.5 million from this year.

Overall, the department's budget is up about 12 percent, with most of its bureaus and activities receiving at least some increase.

There is no increase, however, in the number of wage-hour investigators. The AFL-CIO has termed the present number inadequate.

Once again, the department's budget calls for a controversial increase in the investigative staff of the Office of Labor-Management & Welfare-Pension Reports "to aid the Justice Dept. in detecting and preventing the efforts of organized crime to gain influence over these funds." A similar request last year, criticized as a "fishing expedition," was rejected by Congress.

The National Labor Relations Board, which had sought more money to take care of a continuing rise in its caseload, was budgeted for a cut, instead, by the Nixon Administration. It would receive $465,000 less than last year's $38.4 million.

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission would receive an additional $4.7 million and 359 more employes under the budget request and the Labor Dept.'s Office of Federal Contract Compliance would have its funds doubled to maintain what the department termed "an aggressive program in this important field . . . the development and administration of government-wide programs with objectives similar to those of the Philadelphia Plan."

MILITARY & SPACE—Dollar cutbacks in the defense and space budget will be reflected in heavy layoffs—both of the federal government's own employes and workers employed by government contractors. Some of the cuts have already taken place, but Pentagon officials have been quoted as estimating that some 600,000 fewer workers will be needed by defense contractors, while federal employment in the Defense Dept. is expected to be slashed by 130,000 from last year's levels.

CRIME—Federal funds to help combat crime would be doubled to $1.3 billion, largely through expansion of existing programs.

FINANCING—Added revenue proposals include raising the payroll base on which workers and employers pay social security taxes from the present $7,800 to $9,000 a year. In addition, the payroll tax rate is scheduled to rise next Jan. 1.

Plans to require employers to turn over withholding taxes to the government sooner than they now do are counted on to increase fiscal 1971 revenue by $1.2 billion.

A postage rate increase that the President has requested would bring in $674 million if passed by Congress.

Sale of the Alaska Railroad, surplus government stockpiles and government-held mortgages are also counted by the Administration as adding to income.

Budget Dir. Robert P. Mayo acknowledged to newsmen that it didn't have any real economic significance if the budget were slightly out of balance—a $1 billion excess of spending over income, for example. But he contended that a surplus, no matter how small, would be "significant psychologically" in overcoming inflation.

FIRST HUMAN POTENTIAL AWARD of the Steelworkers is presented to former Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey, co-recipient with his wife Muriel, by Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel. The Humphreys were cited for their extensive efforts in humanitarian causes in a ceremony at the Institutes for the Achievement of Human Potential, Chestnut Hill, Pa. Members of USWA Local 4845, Waukesha, Wis., made the award, a stainless steel casting of a human brain. The institutes do research and treat children with brain injuries.

President Asks Delay Of Federal Pay Raise

Pres. Nixon wants salaried federal employes to give up a pay raise this year so that his proposed budget will show a surplus instead of a deficit.

If the President gets his way, government workers will have to wait until Jan. 1, 1971, to have their pay brought up to what workers in comparable private industry jobs were making back in June of 1969.

It would be a step away from the goal set by the 1962 Salary Reform Act to achieve and maintain comparability with private industry.

And it would be, government union spokesmen note, a clear breach of Nixon's election campaign pledge to reduce the time lag between salary survey and pay raise.

Just last June, Civil Service Commission Chairman Robert Hampton, speaking for the Administration, advocated a salary increase next July to bring employes to the June 1969 comparability level and then—as a step towards shortening the time lag—an additional increase early in 1971 to match private industry rates as of June 1970.

Based on the government salary survey, last June federal employes were an average of 5.7 percent behind their counterparts in private industry.

With the current level of price increases, even if they got an average 5.7 percent raise in July, the pay raise would have been eaten up in advance by the cost of living increase since the date of the salary survey a year before.

Congressional sources considered it virtually certain that an election-year Congress would reject the proposal to deny federal workers any increase during 1970. There was some speculation that the intent of the Administration move was to counter pressure for pay raises to take effect before July 1.

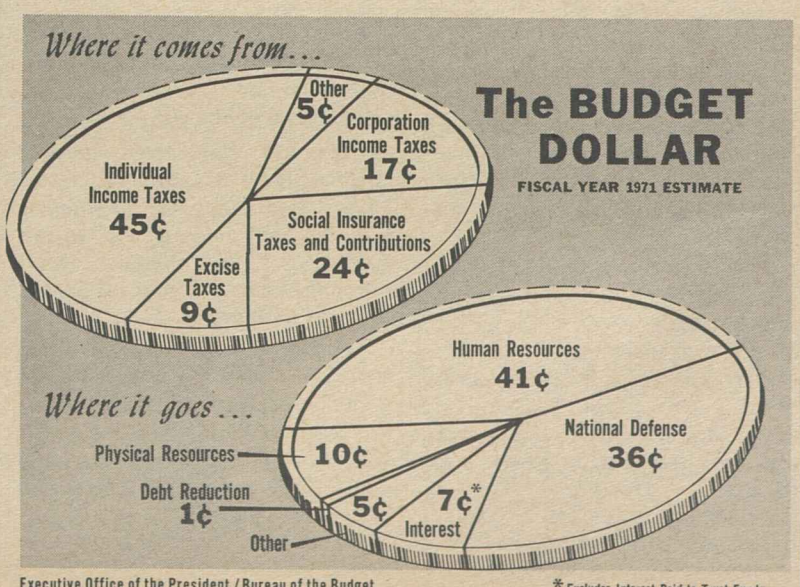
The President's budget did, however, include funds for a two-step within-grade raise for postal employes, retroactive to Jan. 1, 1970, which would amount to 5.4 percent for most workers. This would be part of a package plan to establish a corporation-type management for the postal service.

However, the additional comparability increase that postal workers also would be entitled to would be put off to Jan. 1, 1971, the same date as for classified federal employes.

Tax-Free Bond Issues Reflect Sharp Decline



A 1968 curb on the use of tax-free state and local bonds as a means of luring industries from one area to another apparently has produced some results.

Figures released by the Investment Bankers Association show the issuance of industrial bonds fell from a peak of $1.6 billion in 1968 to about $48 million in 1969, the lowest yearly total since 1960. The number of issues dropped from 165 to 68.

Although soaring interest rates were undoubtedly a factor in the sharp decline in the issuance of the industrial bonds, much of the drop was credited to legislation enacted by the 90th Congress.

It removed federal income tax exemption on interest of such bonds if the issue exceeded $1 million. However, the action was later weakened by another bill that increased the limit to $5 million.

The AFL-CIO has spearheaded a drive in Congress for many years to restrict tax exemption on such bonds on grounds that they are "an abuse of tax laws" used to entice anti-union employers and provide a tax dodge for wealthy individuals.

Schnitzler Takes ULLICO Post

William F. Schnitzler, retired AFL-CIO secretary-treasurer, has agreed to serve as special assistant to Chairman J. Albert Woll of the Union Labor Life Insurance Co., Woll announced.

Schnitzler's labor career covers a 49-year span. He served as international representative, vice president, secretary-treasurer and finally as president of the Bakery & Confectionery Workers until his appointment to the labor federation post in 1952. He served in the latter capacity until 1969.

Schnitzler had been a company director for 19 years. Woll said in welcoming him to the ULLICO staff: "I know of no man with greater personal dedication and deeper loyalty to organized labor." He cited Schnitzler's knowledge and interest for many years in insurance and pension plans for workers and their families.

New Battle Looms Over School Funds

While the battle over appropriations continues, the Senate began tackling legislation dealing with the long-range future of the federal aid to education program.

On the Senate floor was a labor-backed bill that would extend the basic education programs an additional four years and increase the amount authorized to finance them.

In a letter to all senators, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller urged that it be passed without weakening amendments.

The bill, he said, is superior to a House-passed measure that would extend the program only two years beyond its present June 30th expiration date and consolidate various program categories under state control.

Biemiller also placed the AFL-CIO firmly on record against any attempts to weaken civil rights enforcement through amendments expected to be offered in the Senate.

Sen. John Stennis (D-Miss.) and 15 other southern senators announced that they will seek to write into the education law a so-called "freedom of choice" provision which would bar the assignment of any student to a school against the wishes of his parents. The Supreme Court has ruled such plans unconstitutional subterfuges designed to preserve segregated school systems.

The President's budget message indicated that the Administration will propose a number of changes in the various education programs. But no legislation to accomplish this has been sent to Congress.

The Senate voted 85-1 approval of an amendment to the Railroad Retirement Act providing additional funds to finance supplementary pensions for railroad workers and adopting a compromise approach to mandatory retirement.

Management-financed supplemental pensions for workers with at least 25 years of service were negotiated in 1966 and written into the Railroad Retirement Act.

The Senate bill provides additional financing needed to keep the supplemental fund solvent. It also provides that the supplemental pension—but not the regular retirement benefits—will be reduced for workers who continue on the job past the age they can retire with a supplemental pension. In the case of a worker with at least 25 years of service at age 65, the reduction would be 25 percent for each year he continues to work.

The House had passed a bill which made retirement compulsory.

In another development, Sen. Fred R. Harris (D-Okla.), who is chairman of the Democratic National Committee, announced that he will soon introduce what he termed "a Democratic alternative" to Pres. Nixon's welfare reform program.

It would guarantee a family of four—whether or not the head of the family was employed—an income equal to the poverty level, currently about $3,600 a year.

The Nixon program would assure an income of $1,600 for a needy family of four.

The Harris proposal would start at 70 percent of the poverty level, rise to 85 percent the second year and the full amount the third year.

COMMUNITY COUNSELING SERVICE for citizens of Dayton, Ohio, in need of information on various health, welfare and assistance programs will get a boost with the graduation of Dayton's Fire Fighters from the training project. All 397 members of Dayton's IAFF Local 136 completed the training, sponsored by the union and the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services. Participating in the graduation are, from left, Ray Perry, assistant to IAFF Pres. William H. McClennan; Pres. Claude Henley of Local 136, and AFL-CIO Community Services Dir. Leo Perlis, who is presenting a diploma.

Security Clearance Bill Wins House Approval

The House voted 274-65 approval of a tough industrial security bill, brushing aside arguments that the legislation would infringe on civil liberties and the rights of workers in private industry.

Supporters said the bill was needed to restore portions of the industrial security program that have been invalidated by Supreme Court decisions.

The legislation is designed to give congressional sanction to programs and policies the court said exceeded the authority of the executive branch.

It would empower the Secretary of Defense to bring under the program any facility or port he considered related to the national defense and would spell out procedures for security checks of employes. In a key area, the right of a worker to confront an accuser would be waived if the government ruled that the national interest required it.

At House hearings last fall, the AFL-CIO praised the effort of the sponsors to draw up a "fair-minded" bill in a "complex and difficult area." But the federation opposed the legislation because "its defects outweigh its virtues."

Thomas E. Harris, AFL-CIO associate general counsel, told the House Internal Security Committee that "while the ends sought in the bill are important, we agree with the court that their achievement does not justify infringement of basic constitutional rights."

A 1967 Supreme Court decision indicated that the government could bar persons it considered subversive from jobs dealing with classified information and other sensitive positions, but not from all employment.

The following year, the court struck down the screening of all maritime and dock workers on the ground that Congress had never authorized it.

Supporters of the House bill defended it as an improvement over the existing program and an assurance that workers will have maximum opportunity to challenge any denial of security clearance.

The legislation has not yet been acted on by the Senate.

Senate Eases Anti-Trust Law On Newspapers

The Senate voted to exempt newspapers from antitrust laws by allowing competing papers to pool their business operations if one of them is in financial difficulties.

The AFL-CIO and unions representing newspaper workers had opposed the legislation; most publishers supported it.

Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.), leading the opposition to passage, termed the bill "a poverty program for the rich." He said many of the allegedly "failing" newspapers the bill purported to help are owned by prosperous and powerful newspaper chains, which often also own profitable broadcasting facilities in the same cities.

After rejecting all efforts to amend the bill by wide margins, the Senate voted 63-14 approval.

Before the vote, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller warned that enactment of the bill would set "a dangerous precedent." He said "other industries with equally little justification could be expected to avail themselves of the so-called 'failing company' doctrine established in the bill to obtain exemption from the antitrust laws."

The House has held hearings on similar legislation but has not taken any action.

Urban Transit Aid Bill Passes in Senate, 83-4

An expanded program of federal funds to help cities build and improve transit systems won 83-4 approval in the Senate.

With rare unanimity, the Administration and the Senate's Democratic majority enthusiastically supported the bill and its financing system aimed at assuring cities that funds will be forthcoming even though immediate budget expenditures will be kept low.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of Transportation to commit the government to pay up to $3.1 billion in loans and grants to finance up to two-thirds of a city's cost in improving mass transportation.

The actual appropriations would be voted over a five-year period as the projects got under way and the money was needed.

Originally, the bill set a ceiling of 12.5 percent of the funds for any one state, but left a loophole for some states with greater needs to exceed that quota. This was through a discretionary fund, to be disbursed by the Secretary of Transportation, amounting to 15 percent of the money in the bill.

Initially, the Senate voted 49-26 to virtually knock out this discretionary authority, limiting it to only 1.5 percent of the funds.

The next day, after vigorous protest from senators representing states with big population centers and equally big transit problems, the Senate compromised on a 7.5 percent discretionary authority.

During the debate, Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.) suggested that it might be "embarrassing" to cotton state senators if a percentage limitation on the amount any state could receive were put on the next cotton subsidy bill.

House hearings on the legislation are scheduled to get under way in March.

or bonds, he presumably would be immune to the conflict of interest charges that were instrumental in the rejection of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., to the still-vacant Supreme Court seat.

Meany's statement was presented at Judiciary Committee hearings by Thomas E. Harris, the AFL-CIO's associate general counsel. Also testifying against confirmation were officials of the NAACP, the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights and attorneys who had appeared before Judge Carswell on civil rights cases.

One witness, Leroy D. Clark of the New York University law faculty, supervised trial lawyers in the South for the NAACP legal defense program.

"Judge Carswell is the most hostile federal district judge I have ever appeared before with respect to civil rights matters," he testified.

Meany told the Senate committee that the selection of Carswell can only be considered a deliberate attempt by the Administration "to find a federal judge whose civil rights record is recognized by the Negro community to be even worse than Judge Haynsworth's was shown to be."

Even if the Administration wanted to limit its selection to southern judges originally appointed by a Republican president, Meany said, it could find "truly distinguished moderates" on the same circuit court of appeals on which Carswell now sits as a junior member.

Carswell's nomination, he suggested, is "a slap in the face" of Negroes, the Senate and, particularly, the federal judiciary. Meany added:

"It demonstrates a desire to reward those who failed in the task of making civil rights for all a reality, and to rebuke those who exhibited the courage to do what was both right and necessary during a time of crisis.

"It demonstrates a desire to downgrade the court by making appointments a political plaything rather than the highest honor open to the legal profession."

Carswell's disavowal of his 1948 "white supremacy" speech would have been more convincing, Meany suggested, if his actions as a judge had demonstrated his conversion.

But the evidence shows, Meany concluded, that his decisions as a federal judge "adhere more to his 1948 white supremacy prejudices than to his suddenly announced 1970 views."

Service Employes Top 400,000 Membership

Membership of the Service Employes topped the 400,000 mark in late 1969, an increase of nearly 50 percent since 1960, Pres. David Sullivan told local union officers in a year-end report.

The 10-year gain in members exceeded 131,000, and the union's rate of growth continues high, he said.

Wilson Pressed On Hong Kong Exports to U.S.

Four AFL-CIO textile unions took advertising space in newspapers on three continents for an appeal to British Prime Minister Harold Wilson to "negotiate a solution to the problem of Hong Kong low-wage exports" to the United States.

The ads—paid for jointly by the Clothing Workers, Ladies' Garment Workers, Textile Workers Union of America and United Textile Workers—appeared in the Washington Post, Manchester (England) Guardian and the South China Morning Post of Hong Kong.

Timed to coincide with Wilson's official visit to Washington, the unions' "urgent memorandum" to the Prime Minister charged that 27-cent-an-hour wages being paid by Hong Kong manufacturers "are flooding the American market with textiles and garments of every description," taking jobs away from workers and economically damaging entire U.S. communities.

January's Rise Highest In 9 Years

The nation's unemployment rate shot up to 3.9 percent in January, the highest level in more than two years and the biggest single-month increase in nine years.

The seasonally adjusted rate for the previous month, the Bureau of Labor Statistics said, was 3.5 percent. A year ago, it was 3.4 percent.

Although the Labor Dept. is "wary" of some of the month-to-month fluctuations in the unemployment rate, the indicators for January almost all pointed to a worsening situation.

There were significant increases in the unemployment rate for adult men and for blue collar workers, a rise in the number of people drawing unemployment benefits, a drop in construction employment and a decline in weekly paychecks resulting from less overtime work.

To Treasury Sec. David M. Kennedy, there was a silver lining in the higher rate of joblessness—the possibility that wage increases can be kept down.

He said in a speech that the latest unemployment figures "may indicate a definite easing of labor markets."

This, he said, along with "declining corporate profits and the expected slowdown in the rate of price increases, will hopefully reduce the inflationary pressure on wage settlements."

And Arthur F. Burns, recently named by Pres. Nixon to be chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, told Congress that even more unemployment and a further decline in housing construction can be expected during the next few months.

"But I think it is a healthy thing," he testified before the House Banking Committee. "It will lay the foundation for stable growth in the future."

Unemployment among Negroes rose from 5.7 percent in December to 6.3 percent in January. For white workers, the increase was from 3.2 percent to 3.6 percent.

Labor Dept. officials noted, however, that the black jobless rate is still below its mid-1969 levels while unemployment among white workers is the highest since October 1967. As a result, in recent months the Negro unemployment rate has been somewhat less than twice the white rate, which has been the pattern of recent years.

The fact remained, however, that Negro unemployment still rose more rapidly than white unemployment.

Campaign Opens to Enact National Health Insurance

Coordinated Talks Shift To 2nd Firm

Pittsburgh—Unions representing 104,000 Westinghouse Electric Corp. employes stepped up their efforts to win new contracts at least on a par with those won in the recent General Electric strike settlement.

Representatives of nine unions have been meeting here daily with management in face-to-face bargaining. Both sides are observing a news "blackout" on the details of their discussions.

Westinghouse workers have stayed on the job, with the approval of the AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee, during the GE strike, which produced improvements valued at $1.05 over 40 months. Westinghouse workers came to the aid of the GE strikers with substantial contributions, the unions noted.

The GE proposal to end the strike has been accepted by unions representing the bulk of GE workers, but some are still on strike. Production has resumed at plants where agreements were signed and pickets withdrawn.

The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, representing nearly 90,000 GE employes, reported two locals still on strike over local issues, with a few unaccounted for. The two are Local 355 at the Maqua Co., a GE printing subsidiary in Schenectady, N. Y., and Local 455 in Trenton, N. J.

The Machinists announced that at last count, 18 IAM locals are still on strike, nine have accepted

LEGISLATION TO SET UP a national health insurance program was unveiled at a Capitol Hill news conference by Rep. Martha W. Griffiths (D-Mich.). Its concept of complete health services for all Americans, regardless of age or income, was unanimously endorsed by the last AFL-CIO convention.

House Bill Parallels Labor Plan

A labor-backed bill to set up a national health insurance program has been introduced in Congress—the first step in a major campaign to make a full range of health services available as a birthright to all Americans, regardless of age or income.

Its sponsor is Rep. Martha W. Griffiths (D-Mich.), a member of the House Ways & Means Committee which has jurisdiction over the bill.

Her proposal closely parallels the program urged by the AFL-CIO convention last October—to make complete health care available to everyone as a public service, just as society provides police protection for its citizens.

The Griffiths bill would cover all needed physician services, from periodic physical examinations and other preventive health care through surgical operations.

It would provide unlimited hospital and nursing home care, as long as it is medically required.

It would cover the cost of prescription drugs and of eye care, including glasses.

Dental care would be provided at a token fee for children under 16, with no charge for periodic dental examinations and teeth cleaning.

The few fees would be modest, and the most anyone would have to pay out of his own pocket

Shultz Seeks to End Overtime Exclusion

There no longer is any reason to give agricultural processing industries a seasonal exemption from overtime pay requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act, Labor Sec. George P. Shultz told Congress.

Shultz proposed that present exemptions be phased out so that firms which don't pay overtime rates after 40 hours a week will no longer have a competitive advantage over the growing number of employers that do so—either because of a union contract "or simply because they believe in fair labor standards."

His recommendation was included in the Secretary of Labor's annual report to Congress on the impact of the minimum wage law on the economy.

As in previous years, the report demolished the myth that increases in the minimum wage add to unemployment and force up prices.

Early in 1969, more than 2 million of the 8.9 million workers brought under the Fair Labor Standards Act in 1966 received pay increases required by law—from $1.15 to $1.30 an hour. The others covered already were being paid above the new rate.

More than 1,000 field employes of the Labor Dept. were instructed to report any evidence of adverse effects of the higher minimum, Shultz said.

The "paucity" of such reports, Shultz said, indicates "the ease with which adjustments to the new standards were made."

There were reports that five establishments planned to lay off workers because of the higher minimum wage. But three of them did not do so, and in fact now employ more workers than they did at the

Senate Faces 3 Major Tests On Civil Rights

The Senate faces at least three major civil rights tests in the weeks ahead—on an aid to education bill which is its pending business, on the nomination of Judge G. Harrold Carswell to the Supreme Court, and on a voting rights bill scheduled to be brought to the floor on Mar. 1.

After a three-day recess to allow Republicans to return home for traditional Lincoln Day speeches, the Senate will resume debate on legislation to extend federal aid to education for another four years.

Nixon Outlines Broad Program To Combat Air, Water Pollution

Pres. Nixon has proposed an ambitious anti-pollution program to purify the air and clean up the waters of the nation.

The wide-ranging plan came in the President's first message of the year to Congress dealing with specific programs. He outlined a 37-point program for "restoration" of the environment that will require 23 legislative acts and 14 executive actions he can implement without Congress.

Expanded government action was urged in four major areas: water pollution control, air pollution control, solid waste disposal and the orderly increase of park lands and open space.

Nixon said that the cost of the program will have to be borne by everyone involved — government, industry and citizens.

A number of the points were unveiled earlier in the State of the Union and the budget messages. Some of them are new, but others have been considered in recent years. Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.) said he was "pleased to note" that many of Nixon's proposals "are similar to those I made last month."

The program boils down to a plan for the wider use of federal money and stricter laws to improve "the quality of American life," the President said.

His new budget, however, makes it clear that the federal government will put up only a small portion of the needed money. It provides no increase in major anti-pollution programs over the amount Congress voted this year—which was more than four times what the President had sought.

For most of the new programs outlined in the presidential message, only token financing is indicated in the budget.

These are the basic proposals for

Rise of Conglomerates Called Serious Threat

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The rise of conglomerates poses a serious threat to American workers and consumers, a group of 27 AFL-CIO unions warned in a detailed and documented study of the "merger mania."

The study was released here by the Conference of Transportation Trades as part of a series on the changing patterns of American corporate life. The 157-page report shows a growing trend toward economic concentration, said C. L. Dennis, chairman of the conference and president of the Railway & Airline Clerks.

Titled "Conglomerates: Concentration, Collusion, Control," the study said conglomerates pose dangers that are "frighteningly clear." Among them it listed:

- The 200 largest industrial companies controlled over 60 percent of the total assets of all American manufacturing corporations by the end of 1968.
- In 1968 a total of 4,000 independent firms "ceased to exist."
- A major steel company, Jones & Laughlin, with over $1 billion in assets, was "gobbled up" by a conglomerate.
- Well-known transportation companies such as Mack Truck and Douglas Aviation were merged into huge conglomerates.
- Grace Steamship Lines was "sold and rebought like 'Park Place' or 'Boardwalk' in a real life game of monopoly.' "
- A conglomerate bought up United States Lines and promptly laid up the flagship of the American merchant marine, the SS United States, and threatens to make the layup permanent unless the government pays $4 million in additional subsidies.

The 27 unions in the transportation field pointed out that "the threat of conglomerates is real for all America; it is particularly real, and particularly menacing, when it touches the transportation industry, a vital nerve center in modern America."

There are no indications, the conference report warned, that the alarming pace of industrial concentration is abating. All previous levels of merger activities were eclipsed in 1968 and during the first nine months of 1969 acquisitions were 6 percent above the 1968 rate.

Ship Unions Set Parley On Island Cargo Rates

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A major conference designed to explore a proposal to substantially reduce waterborne cargo rates between the U.S. mainland and Hawaii, Alaska and Puerto Rico has been called by the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept.

MTD Pres. Paul Hall said top officials of the three areas have been invited to participate in the conference scheduled in Washington, D. C., Apr. 9-10.

The conference of government, labor and industry representatives will discuss a proposal to provide federal aid in the construction of ships for the non-contiguous trade similar to the subsidies now provided shipping in foreign trade.

This federal aid, coupled with extension to operators in the non-contiguous trade of the same right to establish tax deferred construction reserve funds now enjoyed by some operators in foreign trade, could lead to "significant" reductions in cargo rates, Hall said.

A resolution adopted by the MTD executive board called for a "balancing of equities," and pointed out that higher cargo rates "unfairly penalize the American citizens of Puerto Rico, Hawaii and Alaska and put artificial restraints on the growth of their economies and the full development of their potential."

The MTD board acted after listening to presentations by Keith Terpe, president of the Seafarers International Union of Puerto Rico and Morris Weisberger, secretary-treasurer of the Sailors Union of the Pacific.

Reward Renewed On Air Hijackings

The Air Line Pilots and the Air Transport Association, the trade association of the airlines, have renewed for another year their joint offer of a $25,000 reward aimed at deterring hijackings of commercial aircraft. ALPA's share of the reward offer was raised by voluntary contributions of union pilots.

The reward will be paid, to eligible persons, "for information leading to the arrest and conviction of anyone for violating the federal hijacking statute."

The sponsors stressed that they do not want passengers to endanger the aircraft by attempting to apprehend a hijacker so the reward is not payable for action taken against a hijacker while on board an aircraft in flight.

Minority Job Plans Pushed By Labor Dept.

The Labor Dept. has designated 19 cities where, it says, it will apply the controversial Philadelphia plan which sets minority hiring "goals" or "quotas" in major federal construction.

Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz, in anouncing the proposed extension, put it in the form of a warning, saying ". . . we favor voluntary, area-wide agreements to the imposition of specific (hiring) requirements by the government." He set no deadlines.

Shultz called on "contractors, unions, minority group organizations in these 19 cities to speed development of area-wide agreements that would make equal employment in construction work a reality."

Missing from the list of cities is Chicago where building trades unions, contractors and a coalition of black organizations have worked out their own, more far-reaching program.

The Labor Dept. list did, however, include Pittsburgh where an agreement was also reached. Later, a spokesman for the department admitted this was a mistake.

Shultz said that the Office of Federal Contract Compliance will first "focus attention" on six cities: Boston, Detroit, Atlanta, Los Angeles, Seattle and Newark.

The other cities named by Shultz are Buffalo, Cincinnati, Denver, Houston, Indianapolis, Kansas City, Miami, Milwaukee, New Orleans, New York, San Francisco and St. Louis.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has labeled the Philadelphia plan "a concoction and contrivance of a bureaucrat's imagination" that "makes tremendous publicity" but has "no substance to it whatsoever."

In his condemnation of the plan, Meany said that it would well mean not a single black job since contractors could transfer black workers from private to government construction.

Meanwhile, one plan that is working—the labor-backed Outreach program for preparing minority group youths for apprenticeship—drew high praise from another Labor Dept. official, who said it would be expanded.

Arnold Weber, Assistant Secretary of Labor for Manpower, told leaders of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. at Bal Harbour, Fla., that the government hopes to finance Outreach programs in 17 more cities by July 1.

He said the program, operated in cooperation with building trades unions, has trained 5,400 Negro youths for apprenticeships in skilled crafts in the 63 cities where it is operating.

The 17 additional projects, he said, would help another 1,000 young people.

a GE offer and seven are still to report.

Of the striking locals, IAM Vice Pres. Gilbert Brunner said "as far as we are concerned, the boycott of GE products is still on until the last striker has gone back to work."

IAM delegates from 34 GE locations objected particularly that the company has refused to "follow the normal employer practice of wiping the slate clear" of picket line complaints. Instead, the IAM said, GE is "insisting on its full pound of flesh, meting out full penalties and forcing the employe to appeal" to an arbitrator.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said after two unions ratified the company offer Feb. 3 that "the contract does not satisfy the needs of GE workers but it is a truly significant gain over GE's original offer. It spells the end of Boulwarism." Meany was referring to GE's practice in the past of making a single offer and refusing to budge from it. The National Labor Relations Board and a federal appeals court have ruled the practice unlawful because it handcuffs good-faith bargaining and substitutes the company's mandate for the desires of the employes.

Union economists calculated the total value of the GE settlement terms at a gain of 97.8 cents over the full contract period, plus 7 cents in the accumulating value of benefits such as vacation pay.

Retroactivity Sought

The union coordinated bargaining team at Westinghouse recessed contract talks for two days for a meeting of delegates from the IUE Westinghouse Conference Board. Efforts were then resumed to get a settlement retroactive to Nov. 9, the terminal date of the extended contract.

Affiliated unions in the CBC Westinghouse group, besides IUE and the Machinists, are the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Allied Industrial Workers, Carpenters, Steelworkers and Flint Glass Workers. Working closely with the group are the Federation of Westinghouse Salaried Employes and the United Electrical Workers, unaffiliated.

The union negotiators met with pension and insurance experts, and called on other members of the union team to pinpoint the need for improvements in current contract terms.

One labor objective at Westinghouse is a rate differential of 15 percent for employes who do outside work. The union told management these workers often travel hundreds of miles from their homes, spend weeks away from their families and work in dangerous areas.

CWA Backs Campus Action On Pollution

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Communications Workers will be on campus in force in April to help students and faculty set up programs to help clean the air and purify America's polluted waters.

The CWA executive board adopted a resolution at its meeting here calling on members to join the planned Apr. 22 "teach-ins" on environmental problems scheduled for many college campuses.

The resolution urged CWA members to participate in helping organize the sessions and to "follow through on post-teach-in programs to secure environmental improvements." It noted that there are CWA locals in most college towns.

The board also adopted a resolution on environmental quality covering standards, adequate funding, reorganization of government agencies, traffic and slum problems and an approach to "open spaces."

Teacher Strikes Follow Bargaining Breakdowns

Strikes over contract terms put teachers on picket lines in New Jersey's two largest school systems, Jersey City and Newark, and in Superior, Wis.

Theodore W. Kheel and Lewis Kaden, New York mediators, agreed to take part in talks between the Newark School Board and Local 481 of the American Federation of Teachers, which stopped work nearly two weeks ago.

Meanwhile the board secured a restraining order and sheriff's deputies arrested 20 teachers on contempt of court charges. The deputies ordered pickets to disperse at 11 schools and, when they refused, hauled them to jail in police vehicles.

Nearly 3,000 teachers were out at 84 schools, and many of the school district's 84,000 pupils stayed home. At issue are wages, class size, arbitration of grievances, and a voice in transfers, promotions, and school communication with the community.

A strike of teachers represented by the Jersey City Education Association, an affiliate of the National Education Association, closed 34 schools housing 38,000 pupils and 1,650 teachers. Some 250 teachers refused to honor NEA picket lines but union teachers voted to cooperate with the striking group.

The Jersey City dispute is over wages, working conditions and better facilities for pupils and teachers. A Superior Court judge ordered the strikers back to work, but teachers claim the public will support their strike. They are seeking a salary schedule that will not leave the schools at a disadvantage in hiring new teachers and keeping experienced ones.

The association wants an annual increase of $1,800 a year in the salary schedule for beginning teachers, with a $15,200 top for experienced instructors. The board offers a $100-a-year increase, with a range of $7,100 to $10,850.

Before the walkout started, Mayor Thomas J. Whelan had threatened to close the school system next fall unless the state comes to its financial rescue. But Whelan refused an association request that he meet with the teachers.

The AFT reported no progress at Superior, Wis., where 360 members of Local 202 have been on strike since Feb. 2. The union reached agreement on wages last September and walked out after school officials reneged on a promise to negotiate other issues, the AFT said. The school system is seeking a restraining order against the strike.

Contract Goals Set By Rubber Workers

Cleveland—The Rubber Workers will go into 1970 contract negotiations seeking "a greater measure of dignity, equity and security" for 212,000 employes of a profitable industry, the union declared at a two-day policy conference here.

Delegates from 500 URW local unions in the United States and Canada voted for a 1970 economic policy with these major priorities: a substantial wage increase, an escalator clause tied to changes in the cost of living, a sizable hike in pension benefits hitched to the consumer price index, and major emphasis on occupational health and safety.

"Clear and comprehensive language," the conference declared, "must be incorporated in the agreements to protect employes against . . . toxic chemicals, compounds and related work hazards."

This will require managements to "join with the URW in establishing adequate means to inspect, evaluate and correct harmful, potentially life-destroying conditions throughout the industry," the delegates said.

Contract talks with the Big Four rubber firms will begin in March. Union agreements have an Apr. 20 expiration date at plants of the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., Uniroyal Inc., Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. and B.F. Goodrich Co. The firms employ 80,000 URW members.

Union Pres. Peter Bommarito, an AFL-CIO vice president, described the International Policy Committee's program as designed to help URW members achieve "a fair share of the wealth, reasonable and justified improvements in conditions of work, and deserved security."

The committee stressed that besides a substantial wage increase, union negotiators seek an escalator clause based on changes in the Consumer Price Index, combined with general wage boosts at specified intervals during the term of any contract running for more than one year.

The program spells out the need for major increases for skilled trades employes, and other improvements called for earlier last week by delegates to a skilled trades conference.

Other objectives include upward adjustments for hourly-paid production workers, elimination of any interplant or intra-plant wage differentials based on geographic location or type of product.

The policy committee asked that overtime wage rates be increased and that a prohibition against forcing employes to work overtime be included in all URW contracts.

On retirement, the conference emphasized that higher pension benefits keyed to a cost-of-living escalator also should go to workers who have already retired. Present workers should be allowed to retire, it said, after 25 years of service, regardless of age and at their own option without any reduction in the normal benefit payment.

The need for a total health care plan is emphasized in the program. This includes full payment for prescription drugs, dental care, eye and hearing care needs. Covered workers would be given the option of keeping existing plans or changing to coverage under group medical practice plans.

Recognizing new trends, the committee wants hospitalization coverage for employes and their families in surgical transplant operations, among others.

Other provisions include forbidding outside contractors to do work that should be done by bargaining unit employes, establishing more skilled trades apprenticeships, improving the URW Supplemental Unemployment Benefit program, severance, pension and insurance pay in plant closings to compensate for the equity built up by employes over years of service.

PROTEST DEMONSTRATION by union members at Macy's Herald Square store in New York City helped produce a settlement approved by 7-1 vote of Local 1-S of Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union. A new two-year pact raises wages of 9,000 members 65 to 68 cents an hour to a new minimum of $102 a week, plus other benefits. The pickets are led by union Pres. Sam Kovenetsky, left, and Vice Pres. Phil Hoffstein, right.

32-Day Strike Wins Major Gains For City Workers in Cincinnati

Cincinnati—The 32-day strike of 2,400 city employes here ended Feb. 5 with the acceptance by the membership of a 13-month contract providing pay raises of 22 cents to 54 cents an hour.

About 1,400 of the employes, who like the others are members of six locals comprising District 51 of the State, County & Municipal Employes, will get 30 cents an hour.

This breaks down into the 22 cents an hour across the board or 5 percent, whichever is greater, plus an 8-cents-an-hour equity adjustment. The 54-cent rate will go to automobile repairmen.

What this means on a yearly basis to three of the largest segments of workers included in the settlement is: laborers, from $5,812 maximum last year to $6,438 this year; waste collection helpers from $5,977 to $6,601, and truck drivers from $6,637 to $7,263.

Perhaps more important to future negotiations is a provision for the hiring of a skilled, outside agency to do a thorough study of all city jobs.

This could prevent future deadlocks over the basis to be used for bargaining about wages. This time the city insisted on using figures from local industry while union negotiators preferred to use figures for the same jobs in other cities. They said there were no comparable jobs in private industry.

The outside agency, which will be chosen jointly by the city and the unions, will make recommendations not only in job rates, but also in job classifications and duties and changes in grade steps. Any recommendations it makes which are then accepted by the city and the unions will become effective Jan. 3, 1971.

Another important aspect of the walkout was the demonstration that the prohibition of strikes of public employes under Ohio's Ferguson Act is unenforceable.

Early in the strike, three leaders were jailed for 21 days for violation of a court injunction against picketing, but were released after 10 days through union and civic pressure.

Despite city threats to dismiss all employes not reporting for work after three days—an action permissible under the Ferguson Act—the daily number of workers reporting absent did not waver.

They will be protected by other provisions of the new contract which provides for:

- Reinstatement of all employes to former positions without loss of seniority, rights or privileges.
- Dismissal of a suit against the unions by the city and the lifting of an injunction barring picketing, striking, and interference with local business.
- Joint action by the city and the unions to ask court dismissal of contempt charges and penalties against violators of the injunction.
- An increase in the cost-of-living formula for retired members from 1 to 2 percent.

The final, unwritten achievement of the strikers was best expressed by Al Van Hagen, staff director of District 51, who said the workers by their solidarity "had gained a new dignity and respect in the city."

Job Safety Conference Slated by Craft Unions

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A national conference on occupational health and safety with specific application to the construction industry has been approved by top leaders of the building trades unions.

The sessions of the executive council of the Building & Construction Trades Dept. here adopted a proposal to set up a three-day conference in the fall of 1970 dealing with job-site safety inspection, pre-job safety conferences, and occupational health and job environment.

The action came at sessions dealing with a number of internal matters and a legislative report which termed the first session of the 91st Congress "not very productive." The report by Legislative Dir. Walter J. Mason noted the lack of action on "many long overdue and badly needed measures" and the lack of adequate funds for previously approved programs.

The report pledged to continue to keep a close watch on "the 30 or so anti-labor bills pending before Congress and added that "it appears unlikely" that they will receive any consideration.

It expressed concern, however, that the United Mine Workers election and the murder of Joseph A. Yablonski, currently under investigation by a Senate committee and the Labor Dept., will provide a platform for an all-out attack by the historic enemies of organized labor.

The council heard a report on the AFL-CIO Mortgage Investment Trust Fund from John Evans, director of the federation's Dept. of Urban Affairs.

Evans urged the construction unions to invest their pension funds in the mortgage investment trust and thus provide badly needed funds for private housing.

He said that union pension trustees had thus far invested $10 million in the trust fund and that he expected this sum to rise substantially this year. He said that of this, some $3 million had been advanced to Negro contractors in New York, St. Louis, and Washington.

"You have a chance to be of social service and to make money available for housing, a field in which little money is now available," Evans said.

Usery Names Three As Regional Aides

Three new assistant regional administrators were designated by Assistant Sec. of Labor William J. Usery, Jr. to handle federal worker relations in the Labor-Management Services Administration.

William O'Loughlin, for the New York region, formerly was an assistant regional director for the Office of Labor-Management & Welfare-Pension Reports and a National Labor Relations Board field examiner.

Gordon E. Brewer, for Kansas City, formerly was an assistant regional director for the Office of Labor-Management & Welfare-Pension Reports and a labor lawyer.

Eugene Levine, for Philadelphia, is a former assistant regional attorney and a field examiner for the NLRB.

Airline Union Charges National Fostered Raid

Chicago—The Air Line Employes Association accused National Airlines of violating the Federal Aviation Act by encouraging a raid on its membership by the Teamsters to forestall a strike and force a contract settlement more favorable to the company.

Appearing before the CAB in Washington, ALEA Vice Pres. Mort B. Wigderson charged the airline with other unfair labor practices and petitioned the CAB to revoke National's operating license.

The union's 3,500 members at National went on strike Jan. 31 in 43 cities after 12 months of contract talks failed to get management to improve its "take-it-or-leave-it" offer of last May. The strike halted all service by the airline.

National is the nation's sixth largest air cargo and passenger carrier. Its routes link cities from Boston to Miami and across the South to Los Angeles.

ALEA, affiliated with the Air Line Pilots, represents ticket and reservations employes, station and ramp agents, office workers and other non-flying employes.

The union said in a wire to Labor Sec. George P. Shultz that all efforts to get National to bargain in good faith so far have been unsuccessful. It urged that he exercise his "concern and interest" on behalf of the public and the employes.

With the disputants now in mediation in Miami, talks are "at a standstill after previous futile meetings" in Fort Worth, New Orleans and Washington, ALEA Pres. Victor J. Herbert informed Shultz.

Wigderson told the CAB that a company official said "the only way we could block a takeover by the Teamsters would be to sign a three-year agreement on his terms. It also was hinted that the Teamsters would eventually take over, anyhow."

Wigderson, union attorney and chief negotiator, charged this was a "clear violation of the law prohibiting coercion, interference or influence by either party in the choice of a union." He presented other details to substantiate his charge.

Three days before the strike began, Wigderson said, "the Teamsters used a company mailing list to send propaganda to the employes. This list contained errors in addresses and spelling that prove beyond a doubt that it was obtained with the company's cooperation."

The union spokesman also accused National's Pres. L. B. Maytag of making false and misleading statements in a letter to employes Feb. 2.

Herbert said he is not worried about the threat of a Teamster raid or National's appeals to employes. These tactics "serve only to unite and strengthen our membership," he said.

The Health Care Answer

CAN WE GET good medical care for Americans at a reasonable cost? The answer is a resounding yes, best expressed recently by the AFL-CIO in an address by Pres. George Meany. He said:

"The answer is national health insurance, a program that would provide comprehensive health care for every American.

"This comprehensive health care would include every kind of treatment that is necessary to maintain or restore good health. I'm talking about preventive services, all types of physicians' services, hospital and nursing home care, home health services, rehabilitation —in fact, the whole spectrum of health care.

"It would be financed like social security, on social insurance principles but with a government contribution, as we are now advocating for social security itself. Since we think that every American is entitled to decent health care, the poor should be exempt from any payment but should be eligible for the same services as anyone.

"Doctors would continue to practice medicine without any interference. But we would expect the national health insurance system to encourage the highest quality of medical care, improvements in the efficiency of its delivery and effective controls on its cost.

"For example, this would mean stimulating the development of prepaid group practice plans such as Kaiser Permanente, the Health Insurance Plan of New York and the Group Health Association in Washington, D.C.

"We have been impressed by the record of these plans for providing high-quality health care at lower cost than the usual fee-for-service arrangement of doctors in solo practice. That is why the AFL-CIO is cooperating with Group Health Association of America in trying to get such plans under way in a number of cities across the country.

"CAN WE AFFORD national health insurance? I say we cannot afford not to have national health insurance. It is the only system that will provide truly adequate health care to all Americans.

"First of all, more people would get health care and, in addition, people who today get some care, would get even more care.

"The AFL-CIO has made some initial estimates of the cost of national health insurance. Even with the increases in health services under national health insurance, we could probably finance the program for no more and probably less than what we are now spending for medical care.

"It is no secret that the trade union movement is for national health insurance. We have been saying that for a long time. But not so many people know that the majority of the American people are for a national health insurance system.

"In January 1967, a Louis Harris poll asked the question: "Do you favor or oppose a federal plan such as Medicare for older people which would cover all members of your family?" Of the 90 percent of respondents who had an opinion, a substantial majority said yes. This is all the more remarkable when you consider that at that time the issue had not been in the public eye for more than a decade.

"The AFL-CIO is convinced that with national health insurance, Americans would have the best health care in the world. The American people deserve no less. We will do everything we can to obtain enactment of national health insurance at the earliest possible date."

Social Ills Pollute Environment Much Like Smoke and Garbage

By John P. Roche

TO REGISTER RESERVATIONS at this point in time about the great anti-pollution crusade could bring action by the Subversive Activities Control Board. Thus it would be wise at the outset to specify vigorous support for cleaning up our environment, purifying air and water, and generally restoring the ecological cycle to its pristine vigor.

Technically this is not terribly complicated. My scientific friends tell me that strong laws, effective law enforcement, and the annual expenditure of a smaller amount than the American people currently spend on liquor would master the pollution problem in a decade.

If all the energy presently being mobilized were directed to that end, there would be no basis for complaint. A strong federal statute could be devised to handle the major polluters (automobiles, factories, etc.) and it would take a good constitutional lawyer about 15 minutes to devise the ground rules for congressional jurisdiction (the commerce and taxing powers are obvious handles). The program could be phased in over a period of years, with various kinds of financial support and severe penalties for non-compliance.

This, of course, involves the federal government acting like a government—a role that distresses the present Administration—but a moment's reflection indicates that states and local governments are simply incapable of coping with pollution.

We in New England, for example, are simply the last stop for pollutants that may have joined the prevailing westerly winds in Indiana, Missouri, or farther West. If we cleaned up our stretch of the Connecticut River, we would still be at the mercy of our neighbors upstream in New Hampshire and Vermont.

Moreover, states that set up rigorous standards to deal with industrial pollution might well find industry running off to states with less expensive habits of regulation. This occurred in the early years of this century with regard to child labor: the progressive states found themselves competitively handicapped in comparison with those where children could be exploited. It took the New Deal and the Fair Labor Standards Act to provide national equity.

Pres. Nixon's dedication to eliminating pollution has to be considered in this light. While I do not wish to deprecate the rhetorical effectiveness of his State of the Union address (it was a first-rate violin concerto), he proposed, in essence, the "Vietnamization" of the war against pollution.

That is, the federal government would provide moral inspiration (and trivial funds), but the battle would be fought by the state and local governments. Nixon's diagnosis was moving, but his prescription just won't work.

YET THE PRESIDENT mopped up. This brings me to the disturbing aspect of the pollution issue—the extent to which it is a vehicle for copping out, particularly among upper and middle-class Americans. These are the people who can work themselves into a fury over billboards and beer cans on a scenic highway, but will drive unmoved through a slum.

Among my students at the moment there is far more concern about the quality of the atmosphere than about starvation in Nigeria or repression in Czechoslovakia. To them, urban renewal is a way of "recreating the quality of urban life," which in specific terms means replacing poor people with trees.

Curiously, this is not a new phenomenon. The leaders of the conservation movement 60 years ago were strongly racist. One suspects their fondness for forests was largely a function of their distaste for immigrants and the immigrant culture of the expanding cities. Suspicious Catholics (and today Negroes) have sensed similar motives in the movement for "population control."

At the risk of sounding old-fashioned, I will emphasize that poverty, discrimination and disease (to say nothing of totalitarianism) pollute the environment at least as much as carbon monoxide. And that clean water is no more essential to the "quality of life" than civil rights.

Outlook for '70:

Battle Over National Priorities Emerges in Halls of Congress

The following is excerpted from "Congress and National Priorities," an article in the February issue of the American Federationist by AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller.

THE FIRST SESSION of the 91st Congress will be remembered for passage of major tax legislation, the Senate's rejection of a Supreme Court nomination and the drawing of sharp battle lines with the Administration over appropriations, or what amounts to the ordering of national priorities.

The first two are history. The tax reform bill, while not as sweeping as the AFL-CIO proposed, was nonetheless the biggest step toward tax justice since 1912. The rejection of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr. for the Supreme Court is distinctive only as an example of what a concerned coalition can accomplish on a basic issue.

But the appropriations battle has barely started. It will be the name of the game throughout the second session—indeed the first action of the second session was the fight against a presidential veto in an attempt to add much-needed funds to education and health. The bid to override the veto failed in the House, but the fight for such funds will continue.

The AFL-CIO was totally involved on these issues in the first session and will be in the second session—joining the battle for adequate funds for the great social programs begun in the 1960s. Without the money—previously promised by Congress—these programs will wither and die in the 1970s.

Early in 1969 signs of a tax revolt among middle and low-income Americans were growing in the aftermath of publicity given a Treasury report of tax-dodging by millionaires and others of extreme wealth. The report confirmed charges labor had made for some time without getting publicity.

AFL-CIO President George Meany, testified that workers are "willing to pay their fair share" but are fed up with paying a share for millionaires. The federation proposed closing major loopholes to raise $16 billion in new revenue—enough to provide $9 billion for domestic programs and grant $7 billion in tax relief to low-and middle-income families.

The bill worked out in conference passed the House, 381-2, and the Senate, 71-6. All opposing votes were cast by Republicans. It was signed into law by the President on Dec. 30, known as the Tax Reform Act of 1969.

Although the new law narrows long-favored capital gains tax treatment, it does not go far enough. The capital gains loophole remains an attractive tax escape for high income individuals.

However, the law is a good start toward tax justice. It contains notable reforms, most of which were opposed by the heaviest special-interest lobbying on any one bill in history.

The Senate rejected, 59-27, an amendment to the tax bill sponsored by Sen. Paul J. Fannin (R-Ariz.) and pushed by the National Right to Work Committee. It would have stripped unions from tax exempt status if they engaged in political activities, including non-partisan voter registration.

The most dramatic vote in the first session of Congress came in the Senate at just past noon on Friday, Nov. 21. Packed galleries watched intently as the roll of Senators was called. When it was completed, the Senate rejected the nomination of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr. to the Supreme Court, 55-45.

Labor seeks extensive social security reforms through a bill introduced last year by Rep. Jacob H. Gilbert (D-N.Y.). It calls for further improvements in benefits; expansion of Medicare to cover prescription drugs and the disabled; financing of medical insurance on a contributory basis during working years; cost-of-living protection for benefits; an increase in the taxable earnings base and bringing the government in on social security financing.

THE 1969 SESSION passed two important safety bills: The Federal Construction Safety Act authorizing the Secretary of Labor to set safety standards for federal and federally assisted construction, and the Federal Coal Mine Health & Safety Act to set safety and health standards in coal mining and provide workmen's compensation to miners covering "black lung" disease.

These were other highlights of the first session, including the progress or lack of it on issues left to the current session:

- Congress extended for two years from June 30, 1969, the Office of Economic Opportunity and its anti-poverty programs, after the House voted down, 231-163, an attempt by the conservative coalition to turn the program over to the states.
- The same House coalition managed to scrap the 1965 Voting Rights Act to facilitate voter registration for Negroes in the South. It substituted an Administration program that would abolish close supervision of the South. Labor will press for extension of the 1965 act in the Senate.
- Congress approved a $4.8 billion, one-year expansion of major federal programs for public housing, rent supplements, urban renewal and government-backed housing insurance programs.
- The House approved a labor-backed constitutional amendment to abolish the Electoral College and choose the President and Vice President by direct vote. The Senate still must act.
- The Administration proposed extending unemployment insurance coverage to 4.8 million uncovered workers. The House approved an even smaller extension, 4.5 million. The AFL-CIO seeks extension to all of some 16 million workers plus federal standards for minimum benefits.

In this session, the AFL-CIO will press for a number of new social measures, strengthening of some existing ones and completion of some unfinished business from 1969.

Congressional action is needed to extend coverage under the Fair Labor Standards Act and increase its minimum wage to $2 an hour; apply federal standards to workmen's compensation; protect workers' pension rights; expand manpower programs and secure wage increases for federal employes.

Other labor goals will be advancement of a bill to establish a National Health Insurance program covering all Americans, additional consumer protection and critically-needed new restraints on air and water pollution.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

WHEN THE AMERICAN PEOPLE suddenly discovered that a great many of their fellow Americans suffer from hunger or at least malnutrition, despite huge agricultural surpluses, they also discovered that hunger can be a worldwide problem.

There are, of course, areas of the world where hunger has been endemic—India, for example—but for most Americans the thought of a hungry world has been somewhat remote.

Yet, for many food scientists, the problem is by no means a theoretical matter. It is very real. Ever since Malthus published his theory that sooner or later human population would outrun food production, there has been a debate on the subject that is becoming increasingly heated.

There is one school—the "green revolution" one—that is convinced that Malthus was all wrong. They envision a continuing growth of food production through improved agricultural technology, use of fertilizers, new, highly productive and disease-resistant strains of useful plants and the cultivation of that vast storehouse of rich protein, the ocean, as holding the answer to increasing food needs.

There is a second school that takes the position that this optimism is unwarranted. Only recently two Stanford University scientists published a report contending that at least half a billion people in the world are undernourished or "slowly starving" while another billion are malnourished, that is suffering from nutrient deficiency.

They further contend that India alone would need half the world's present production of fertilizers to reach the scale applied in the Netherlands, and that hope for getting more food from the sea is made doubtful by problems of over-exploitation, pollution and economics.

The Population Reference Bureau early this year also published a study making the startling statement that "if all food in the world were equally distributed and each human received identical quantities, we would all be malnourished." This study contended that the only well-fed areas of the world are in the United States and Canada, parts of Western Europe, Australia, New Zealand and La Plata countries of Latin America.

The Russians, East Europeans and Japanese, the study said, belong to an in-between group, while Asia, Africa and most of Latin America are critical hunger areas.

WHATEVER THE MERITS of the conflicting viewpoints, the reality of hunger in the present world, our own country included, cannot be neglected.

Just as the United States suddenly appears to have come to the conclusion that today's pollution of the environment must be met head on and eliminated, so it would appear that a study of our natural resources and their conservation should be next in line.

The United States still has great resources in arable, food-producing land. Yet each year about 1 million acres of arable and semi-arable land are swallowed up by advancing industrialization and population growth—highways, airports, industrial plants—leaving the cities constantly expanding housing developments.

Just the physical loss of land is becoming more and more serious. In addition, the use of pesticides and fertilizers, urgently needed to produce larger and larger crops from smaller and smaller acres, is becoming a pollution problem of major proportions. The day may well come when their use will be barred or limited in the interest of a livable environment.

American expenditures for conservation of our Natural Resources are not commensurate with the problem. The Nixon 1971 budget, for example, earmarks $4.6 billion for natural resources, including recreational facilities, water resources and power. Of this, about $1 billion is for land management and other natural resources work.

These modest outlays in a $200 billion budget are not believed by conservationists to be adequate for the huge job that must be done if our people are to continue to remain among that small group of people who are well fed.

'Real Opportunities' Credited To Labor-Backed Chicago Plan

THE CHICAGO PLAN is directed at results, not rhetoric, in putting more minority group workers into construction jobs, declared AFL-CIO civil rights specialist Robert McGlotten.

The area-wide agreement directly involves the community as well as the unions and the industry in its operations, opening an effective course to "meaningful jobs . . . with real opportunities," McGlotten said.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, McGlotten said the Chicago plan is keyed to four key categories that will mean wider job opportunities for greater numbers of minority group workers.

He pointed out that the plan will open new opportunities for workers who already have journeyman experience, as well as those with limited experience, apprentices and workers who need on-the-job training.

McGlotten said that "if we are really serious about job opportunities, and we are going to get about the business of training people for meaningful employment," the way to do it is to expand, not contract, the "job market." He noted that at about the same time that the Administration was talking about its Philadelphia plan, it was preparing to cut back federal construction by 75 percent, thereby "shrinking" the number of real employment opportunities.

The federal government has to "understand two things" about equal employment opportunities, he declared: "We have got to have volume construction . . . and we have got to have continuity of employment," if there is going to be progress.

MEANINGFUL JOBS with real opportunities for minority workers are the objectives of the labor-backed Chicago plan, declares Robert McGlotten, center, of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights. McGlotten was interviewed on Labor News Conference by Sam Sharkey, left, of the Newhouse Newspapers and William Eaton of the Chicago Daily News. The radio program is aired Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m. on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

A $3 MILLION LOAN from the AFL-CIO Mortgage Investment Trust Fund made possible this housing project in Pittsburgh. When completed, Penn Circle Tower will provide low-cost housing for 152 families.

Labor's Mortgage Trust Held Way To Build Jobs as Well as Homes

The placement of union pension money in the AFL-CIO Mortgage Investment Trust "offers a means to build unionism, create union jobs and aid union contractors caught in the tight money squeeze," AFL-CIO Urban Affairs Dir. John Evans says in an article for the labor press.

Evans explains the five-year-old Mortgage Investment Trust (MIT) as an opportunity for unions to help ease the nation's critical need of new housing for low- and moderate-income families. "At the same time, it is providing a better rate of yield on invested union monies and at a higher degree of security than many pension funds now realize." he observes.

The trust now has construction loans working in five major cities with projects in the planning stage in as many more, Evans says. He notes that the program has been expanded recently because of the housing crisis, which he describes as the worst in 20 years.

"Basically, the supply of housing has not kept pace with population increases or the current steep climb of marriages by the 'war babies' of 25 years ago," Evans says.

"With interest at a 100-year high and land costs high, the day of the $10,000 or $15,000 home is pretty well gone. The average price for a new home is over $20,500 and the typical wage and salary earner is already priced out of it."

All of this has resulted in a drop in housing construction to below the 1950 level, he notes, and the trade union movement is feeling the crunch—with unemployment in housing construction averaging 11.1 percent between 1960 and 1968.

At the same time, Evans points out, various unions have "some $20 billion in union pension and welfare funds invested through banks, insurance companies and other financial institutions and only 5 or 6 percent of the total is invested in mortgages."

Often, the unions are able to exercise little control over this money, it is pointed out, and there is no guarantee that it won't be used for loans to non-union contractors or anti-union firms. Also, the investment may not be yielding as much to the union as the 8 percent that can probably be expected from new investments in the MIT.

The long-range goal for MIT is described as $1 billion, with several hundred million sought immediately. The fund has grown by almost $3 million in the last two calendar quarters, Evans reports, and several million more has been pledged.

Certificates in MIT are issued in units of $500, with a minimum investment of $1,000, Evans explains, and the plan has the flexibility of allowing funds to be withdrawn on 60 days notice.

For unions which do not want to disturb their present investment program, Evans proposes the alternative of pledging a percentage of each month's new available funds to the MIT. The Painters international union and Local 77 of the Operating Engineers have done this recently.

All funds invested are insured by the Federal Housing Authority when held to maturity, Evans explains in pointing out that the security of MIT is often greater than in trusts in which union funds are now invested. If the mortgages are sold before maturity, they are subject to the FHA market prices, Evans notes.

It is a program "which will return a reasonable, secure yield, afford direct control over use of our own money and help solve a national problem too," Evans says. "Similar opportunities do not readily come to mind."

Industry in 'Shambles':

Keenan Asks Action To Revive Housing

High interest rates have foreclosed on the dream of home ownership for millions of American families, the House Banking & Currency Committee was told.

Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers blamed current anti-inflation policies which "have made a shambles of the housing industry and are self-defeating since they are directly responsible for the soaring increase in the price of both new and existing housing."

The housing industry has been victimized by a one-two combination of high interest rates and tight money, he said.

Keenan, testifying at a hearing on housing mortgage funds, said the foremost challenge of the decade will be to assure a decent home and suitable environment for every American family. These goals were established in the Housing Act of 1949 and reaffirmed 19 years later in the Housing & Urban Development Act of 1968, he observed.

An AFL-CIO vice president, Keenan is chairman of the federation's committee on housing.

He told the Banking & Currency Committee that a number of bills it is considering are imaginative responses to the problems strangling the housing industry. They include:

- A proposal by Representatives Leonor K. Sullivan (D-Mo.) and William A. Barrett (D-Pa.) to create a Home Owners Mortgage Loan Corporation. It is intended to assist many middle-income families whose housing needs have been inadequately provided for.
- Committee Chairman Wright Patman's proposal to establish a National Development Bank that would finance housing for low- and moderate-income citizens who suffer from the tight money squeeze and high interest rates.
- Another proposal by Patman for the Mortgage Investment Act, designed to help meet national housing goals through the purchase of mortgages with private pension funds and Federal Reserve assets.

Keenan said there is much overlap between the Sullivan-Barrett bill and Patman's proposal for a development bank. He suggested the committee consider consolidating both bills into a National Housing & Development Bank bill.

He also noted that there is a growing consensus to make the Federal Reserve Board more responsive to the will of both the President and the Congress. Yet, he said, there are strong arguments for keeping an independent Federal Reserve and much more study and information is needed before any changes should be considered.

The impact of present monetary policy and inflation is severely hurting the housing industry, Keenan declared.

"Our nation's money managers in their insensitive wisdom were not satisfied with the impact of high interest rates so they implement policies which dried up the availability of credit," he said.

"Mortgage credit accounted for about one-third of the cutback in total outstanding credit in 1966. It is a gross injustice to impose one-third of the cutback necessary to reduce inflation on an industry which comprises 3.5 percent of the gross national product."

The money crunch has hurt low- and moderate-priced housing the most, Keenan noted. He compared the declines between 1965 and 1966: "The sale of housing priced under $12,500 dropped 51 percent; houses priced between $12,500 and $15,000 declined 42 percent, and those between $15,000 and $17,000 slid 20 percent."

While low and moderate housing was being massacred, the sale of housing priced over $30,000 rose 10 percent, Keenan pointed out.

There is a general agreement on the need to stop inflation, he noted, but "the disagreement is how to stop it and who should bear the burden of anti-inflation policies."

"Organized labor believes in a selective approach—the rifle as opposed to the blunderbuss—whereby efforts are made to control the areas of the economy which are causing the inflation."

Keenan said that inflation has been a convenient excuse for not recognizing the fundamental inadequacies of the mortgage instrument. Mortgages cannot compete with other forms of investment, and the result is that housing suffers even in periods when the economy prospers.

He cited the labor movement's efforts to ease the housing crisis through the AFL-CIO Mortgage Investment Trust. Unions and other labor organizations participate in the trust for investment in federally-insured or guaranteed construction loans and mortgages.

The IBEW pension fund and its affiliated funds own about 16,000 mortgages valued at more than $250 million, Keenan reported. He said the union plans to invest about $40 million in FHA and VA mortgages during 1970.

Nixon Outlines Broad Program To Combat Air, Water Pollution

cleaning up the nation's environment:

WATER—Adopt uniform federal standards for purity. Encourage municipalities to build sewage treatment plants by offering $4 billion in federal grants from fiscal year 1971 through 1974. Stiffen penalties against polluters by authorizing fines of up to $10,000 a day for industries and cities.

AIR—Reduce exhausts from motor vehicles and authorize $9 million for research to develop a "virtually pollution-free" automobile. Set federal minimum standards for air pollution for all communities. Stiffen enforcement with fines up to $10,000 a day.

LITTER—Provide cash incentives for hauling abandoned cars to junk yards.

PARKS—Take a fresh inventory of all federally-owned land, especially that belonging to the Dept. of Defense, to open suitable areas for public recreation.

Particularly significant in the message was Nixon's emphasis on the need for greater federal authority in the enforcement of anti-pollution programs, a departure from his long-time advocacy of local and state controls.

"The present fragmenting of jurisdiction . . . has hindered comprehensive efforts," he said in referring to problems of water pollution control.

Nixon's message suggested that industry faces heavier cleanup outlays in the coming years.

This, he said, is based on the principle that "the nation's waterways belong to us all, and that neither a municipality nor an industry should be allowed to discharge waste into those waterways beyond their capacity to absorb waste without becoming polluted."

He also cited the need for stiffer clean air regulations with federal minimum standards.

The absence of national standards in the Clean Air Act of 1967 has meant that industries in states and communities requiring strict controls are often at a competitive disadvantage against "more permissive rivals," the President noted.

The act requires only that the federal government establish "air quality control regions," so individual states may develop air quality standards. But adjoining states within the same region have developed inconsistent standards, Nixon noted, and some areas of the country have remained outside the program completely.

The time has come, he stressed, for Congress to establish nationwide standards, giving the states one year to provide abatement plans to meet those standards and to provide for strict enforcement as well.

The President gave special attention to the automobile which, he said, accounts for nearly half of all air pollution in the country—dumping an estimated 66 million tons of carbon monoxide into the atmosphere annually.

He said the auto industry is voluntarily making plans to produce a 1972 model car that runs more efficiently on unleaded gasoline.

Under existing authority, Sec. Robert Finch of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare has issued new proposals to tighten federal emission standards for 1973 and 1975 model cars.

Nixon also ordered the start of an effort to "marshal both government and private research with the goal of producing an unconventionally powered, virtually pollution-free automobile within five years."

The President's new three-man Environmental Quality Council will direct a federal research program on such vehicles.

On the proposal for more parks, the President said that the federal government owns thousands of acres of land in and near metropolitan areas that is no longer needed. He said the property would be converted to recreational use or sold to finance new recreational areas.

Federal Standards Needed:

Antiquated Job-Injury Plans Pay Poverty-Level Benefits

Workmen's compensation laws have become so antiquated that the worker injured on the job is left below the bare subsistence of the poverty level in 31 states.

And such inadequacies in the state compensation systems cannot be corrected without increased federal participation, says James O'Brien, an assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, in the current issue of the American Federationist.

The increase in the number of workers injured in the past few years makes the problems even more critical, O'Brien says. More than 200 million man-days are being lost each year to work-related injuries, he points out, and this has been as much as 14 times the number of man-days lost to work stoppages in a year.

O'Brien says the original goal of workmen's compensation was to provide the injured worker with at least two-thirds of the wages lost because of injury. But in 31 of the 55 separate laws covering on-the-job injuries, the worker is left below the government-defined poverty level of $64.41 a week for a family of four.

The state law in Virginia is cited as an example of how this can develop. On its face, the Virginia law says that a worker will receive 60 percent of the wages lost, but it also attaches limits of $51 a week and a maximum of two weeks.

The average weekly wage in Virginia is $107.55, so a worker would lose $322 if he lost three weeks' work to injury. But under the limits, he can receive only $102 —two weeks at $51 a week—or about 32 percent of the lost wages instead of the 60 percent claimed in the law.

Even then, Virginia ranks ahead of 19 other states in the list of state compensation levels. And the example of the worker in Virginia is for one who is covered by compensation laws—many are not.

"Coverage has been limited by elective laws that have been recognized for years as obsolete because of provisions allowing employers to reject coverage," O'Brien says. "Numerical exemptions, along with occupational and industry exclusions, have been recognized by responsible groups as a serious barrier to an effective system.

"It is estimated that the application of these provisions denies 20 percent of the work force the protection of the program—approximately 18 million workers are outside the system at this time."

Consequently, the AFL-CIO program of minimum standards has as its first two items, "compulsory coverage, with no exception for small firms" and "full coverage of agricultural workers."

As an example of the superiority of federal standards, O'Brien points out that a worker in the District of Columbia who loses an arm would receive one-fifth the amount of compensation received by a government employe who is covered by the Federal Employes' Compensation Act (FECA).

In relation to the poverty level, FECA standards equal 6.3 times the poverty index, while the top state, Arizona, provides 2.5 times the poverty level of subsistence. And Arizona has one of only 21 laws above the poverty level.

In other glaring inadequacies of the existing laws, O'Brien points out:

- 26 states limit the amount of medical coverage a worker can receive for an on-the-job injury, leaving him to pay part of it.
- Only 31 states provide full coverage for the worker who is totally disabled for life. In a number of states, benefits are limited to 500 weeks, or less than 10 years, so that the 30-year-old worker and his family would be dependent on welfare by the time he is 40.
- The system of "schedule benefits" applied to the worker who suffers a permanent partial disability leads to such absurdities as an eye being worth $18,000 in Hawaii but only $4,250 in Oklahoma.
- In the case of fatal injuries, only 16 states provide full coverage for widows until death or remarriage and for children until age 18.
- Only 24 states make provision for the time a worker may need to undergo rehabilitation after any injury.
- 21 states handle occupational diseases by issuing lists of what is covered, a virtually impossible task in an industrial society in which 500 or 600 new chemical processes are introduced each year, making any list obsolete as fast as it can be updated.
- In many states, administrators of compensation programs virtually turn their responsibilities over to the insurance carriers, allowing them to accept or reject claims, control payments or terminate benefits with little supervision by the state agency. In some states, state agencies don't have a system of informing the injured worker of his compensation rights, but leave all contact to company supervisors or insurance representatives.

In view of these and other weaknesses in existing state laws, O'Brien calls for minimum federal standards which state laws or employers would be required to meet.

Such a bill was introduced in Congress last year by Rep. Carl Perkins (D-Ky.), O'Brien points out, with standards based on the Longshoremen's & Harbor Workers' Act. While far superior to most state laws, O'Brien notes that even that act has not been updated since 1961.

Detroit Unions Get New Outreach Pact

Detroit's Trade Union Leadership Council received its third "Outreach" contract from the Labor Dept. to prepare 100 youths from minority groups for apprenticeship entrance tests in the building and construction trades.

The one-year contract for $92,266 calls for up to 10 weeks of preparation in the "tutor and cram" program to help the youth pass trade union examinations.

In two previous Outreach programs, the TULC prepared and placed 197 in the trades apprenticeships. In the contract completed last December, the placement of 106 youths exceeded the contract goal by 26.

Railroad Shopcraft Talks Resume, Carriers Reject Fact-Finding Bid

North Miami Beach, Fla.—Talks aimed at heading off a strike of 48,000 shopcraft workers on all U.S. railroads resumed here Feb. 12 after Washington sessions proved inconclusive.

Negotiators for the railroads and the four AFL-CIO unions—the Machinists, Boilermakers, Sheet Metal Workers and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers—have agreed to continue meeting without a lockout or work stoppage until Feb. 21.

Negotiations in the 15-month dispute over wages and work rules, stymied earlier, were resumed after Judge John J. Sirica of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia issued restraining orders. The latest order, the court's third, is due to expire a day before the Feb. 21 deadline.

Sirica restrained the railroads from closing down major lines and locking out employes and restrained the union members from striking. The four unions picked one railroad, the Union Pacific, for a strike which would not have crippled the railroad industry. But managements then threatened a lockout on all lines.

A tentative settlement reached earlier with the help of the Labor Dept. was voided when one of the four unions, the Sheet Metal Workers, rejected the terms. The rejection was reportedly based on a rules change that would have allowed limited crossing of the jurisdictional lines of other unions to permit "incidental" repair work.

Before the talks moved to Florida, Vice Pres. J. W. O'Brien of the Sheet Metal Workers offered a way to settle the dispute but the carriers turned it down. O'Brien proposed that a joint committee from labor and management make a fact-finding study of the incidental-work rule, the key to resolving the dispute.

O'Brien said his union wants to find a way to end the difficulty. Even if the facts favor the railroads, "I'm willing to face them," he said.

Chairman John P. Hiltz of the National Railway Labor Conference, representing management, rejected O'Brien's plan as "not binding" and therefore no help toward settlement.

Vice Pres. William W. Winpisinger of the Machinists heads the shopcraft negotiators.

The unions have been free to strike since Dec. 3 under the provisions of the Railway Labor Act. Before the court issued the restraining order, the unions declared that "we have reached the limit of the workers' patience. We have the right to expect a terminal point somewhere."

Labor Calls for Extension Of Arts Program, Funds

The AFL-CIO urged support in both houses of Congress for twin bills to continue the programs of the National Foundation on the Arts and the Humanities.

Labor's recommendation was made in a letter from AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller to Sen. Claiborne Pell (D-R.I.), chairman of the Senate Labor subcommittee on the arts and humanities and Rep. John Brademas (D-Ind.), chairman of the House Select Education subcommittee.

Biemiller noted that organized labor's campaign for wider dissemination of cultural activities began long before the foundation was created. "The sound manner in which this agency has been administered and the fine contribution it has been able to make . . . has amply justified our belief in the program," he wrote. He urged both committees also to consider a third bill that would make the foundation a permanent agency.

"We are pleased to note that Pres. Nixon has requested additional funds for the foundation in the fiscal 1971 budget," Biemiller added. "We hope the Congress will not only continue the life of the National Foundation on the Arts and Humanities, but that it will also provide the agency with a much-needed increase in appropriations."

Washington State Law Hikes Jobless Payments

Olympia, Wash.—Maximum unemployment benefits will be raised substantially but low-income workers will have a harder time qualifying for any jobless benefits under a newly-enacted state law.

Washington State AFL-CIO Pres. Joe Davis said the compromise legislation fell short of labor's proposals and the state labor movement will seek "substantive changes" in the next session of the legislature.

On the plus side, he said, the new law's "most significant" improvement is the pegging of maximum benefits to the average wage in the state instead of the previous flat dollar limit.

The new maximum is set at 50 percent of the average weekly wage in covered employment.

When the law takes effect in April, the top benefit will be about $70 a week and the average benefit about $50. Under present law, the maximum benefit is only $42 and the average is $34 a week.

In addition, a worker's benefit will be computed on his highest earnings for any quarter during the base year—the 12-month period before he became unemployed. The formula will be 1/25 of his high-quarter wages, up to the $70 ceiling or a higher amount if the state average wage goes up.

During periods of high unemployment, the duration of benefits can be extended to a maximum of 39 weeks, as compared with the normal 30-week maximum.

To finance the program, employers will be taxed on the first $4,200 of each worker's wage, starting in 1971. That's a $1,200 increase over the $3,000 taxable wage base in effect since 1939.

If additional funds are needed, the taxable wage base can be further increased up to 75 percent of the average annual wage in the state.

To qualify for benefits, however, a worker must have earned at least 15 percent of the state average annual wage during his base year and must have been employed at least 16 weeks or 600 hours during that period.

Davis charged that "this amounts to unemployment compensation legislation designed to disqualify unemployed workers, not to assist them."

In addition the bill doubles the waiting period for a worker who quits or is fired for misconduct to 10 weeks, although he may requalify with five weeks of intervening employment.

Increased benefits under the new law will add an estimated $23 million a year to the state's economy. It will increase employer costs by about 1.4 cents per hour worked.

As it passed the House, the bill would have been effective next July. But the Democratic-controlled Senate moved the date up to April and the House went along.

Davis said the State AFL-CIO will sponsor a series of workshops to explain the changes in the law.

AFGE Wins Vote At California Base

Sacramento, Calif. — The Government Employes won exclusive bargaining rights for more than 7,400 workers at the big McClellan Air Force Base here.

The vote was 4,094 for the AFGE to 1,216 against union representation.

time. And the two actual layoffs involved a total of only eight employes.

Only a handful of price increases, almost entirely in the South, could be attributed to the higher minimum wage, the report stressed. By far the biggest part of the general increase in prices during the period took place in industries not affected by the step-up in the minimum wage, Shultz observed.

The wage floor for the recently-covered group discussed in the report moved up to $1.45 an hour this month and Shultz estimated that it will have a measurable impact only in the South. For two large categories of affected workers, he predicted that the wage bill of hospitals would be pushed up only three-tenths of 1 percent, while educational institutions will pay an average of 1 percent more in wages.

Shultz did not recommend any overall increase in the federal minimum wage—now $1.60 for most American workers.

Last year, in his final report as Secretary of Labor under Pres. Johnson, Willard Wirtz recommended a $2 floor on wages and elimination of all overtime exemptions.

That's the minimum needed, he said, for a worker "to maintain himself and his family decently."

Labor-Backed Bill Introduced:

Campaign Opens to Enact National Health Insurance

would be $50 a year for an individual or $100 for a family.

The program would be financed by a 7 percent payroll tax.

Employers would pay 3 percent of their payroll into the program and the federal government would match that amount.

Workers would pay a 1 percent payroll tax as their share. This would replace the present Medicare deduction under social security. And unions could, through collective bargaining, negotiate employer payment of the workers' share.

The wage base subject to taxation would rise in two steps to $15,000 a year.

Mrs. Griffiths estimated that the federal government's contribution to the program would be about what federal, state and local governments now are paying for existing health programs and services.

Thus, she noted, the federal government would be relieving state and local governments of a considerable tax burden.

Costs would be held down, she suggested, for the same reasons that health care costs are consistently lower under prepaid group practice plans such as the Kaiser plan in California and smaller group plans elsewhere. These include an emphasis on preventive care to reduce hospitalization, better utilization of the time of physicians and cost-conscious administration.

Under the Griffiths bill, the program would contract with both organized group practice plans and with local medical societies on a price to cover the full range of health services called for in the legislation.

If emphasis on preventive care reduced the time and cost of treating illness, the entire medical group would benefit—thus providing an incentive for keeping patients well.

Mrs. Griffiths said the negotiation of a single health care rate with an organized group of doctors or with a local or county medical society would prevent the price-gouging abuses revealed in a Senate Finance Committee report on the Medicare and Medicaid programs.

The report cited examples of doctors charging high fees for minimal services and hospitals and nursing homes using Medicare payments as a crutch for inefficiency.

The Griffiths bill would leave the entire issue of compensating individual doctors to the medical group that negotiates the overall contract with the program. Thus they could be paid either on a flat salary basis or on the traditional fee-for-service basis, but the medical group—not the government—would be responsible for the payments.

Quality Incentive

When a contract is made with a local medical society, the bill requires the society to establish a review system to make sure that beneficiaries receive top quality medical care. There would also be a system of appeals to regional administrators as an added safeguard for patients.

Physicians who did not choose to participate in the program could, of course, continue in private practice, treating patients who were willing to pay their fees without any reimbursement from the program.

The comprehensive health services under the program would, however, be available to every person who has resided in the United States for at least a year, regardless of employment, age or physical conditions.

In terms of family finances, Mrs. Griffiths said, the biggest benefit would come to middle-income Americans who presently are ineligible for health care programs for the needy but can't afford the high cost of lengthy illness.

Poor Would Benefit

The legislation, she suggested, would also increase the availability of medical care by making it financially possible for doctors to practice in poorer areas without worrying about the problem of collecting bills.

At present, she noted, some 115 rural counties in 23 states have no doctors. And the heaviest concentration of doctors in larger cities is in the affluent neighborhoods, with an "appalling" shortage in poorer sections.

The legislation would establish a 9-member board to administer the program. The three government representatives would be the Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare, his Under Secretary for Health, and the Commissioner of Social Security. Non-government members would include representatives for labor, management and medical professionals and three members chosen on the basis of professional competence in medical care organization. They would be assisted by two advisory committees, one representing consumers and the other providers of medical care.

Regional administrators, also aided by advisory committees, would negotiate medical service contracts in each section of the nation.

'Whoa!'

January Jobless Rate Climbs to 3.9 Percent

In other highlights of the January employment data:

The jobless rate for adult men rose from 2.2 to 2.5 percent, the highest level since mid-1967. The Labor Dept. said the biggest increase was among men in the 25 to 54 age group, "many of whom lost their jobs due to production cutbacks."

The traditionally fluctuating unemployment rate for teenagers, many of whom sought part-time jobs, moved up from 11.8 to 13.8 percent between December and January.

Blue collar unemployment continued its steady rise—to 4.6 percent in January as compared with 4.3 percent in December and 3.8 percent in mid-1969.

White collar unemployment, on the other hand, has shown little change in recent months. One by-product has been a relative stability in the unemployment rate for women.

While most of the January rise in unemployment took place outside the manufacturing sector of the economy, the jobless rate for manufacturing workers — at 3.8 percent — was significantly higher than the 3.2 percent of a year ago.

Construction unemployment, 7.1 percent, was below the seasonally adjusted peak reached in early fall. But the rate was substantially above the 6 percent figure in December and the 5.6 percent of January 1969.

On a seasonally adjusted basis, total unemployment was up 300,000 in January, with over half the rise accounted for by women 20 to 24. But the number of people looking for work was up even more, thus increasing the unemployment rate.

Of the estimated 3.4 million unemployed workers in January, 447,000 had been unemployed 15 weeks or longer, compared with 357,000 in December.

Hourly wages for nonsupervisory workers on private payrolls averaged $3.14 in January, up 2 cents. But average weekly earnings dropped 81 cents to $116.81 because of a decline in the workweek.

Factory overtime hours, seasonally adjusted, dropped from 3.5 to 3.2 hours with the decline concentrated in the durable goods sector.

As it does at the start of each year, the Bureau of Labor Statistics slightly revised its unemployment data for the past year by incorporating new seasonal factors. Thus the 4 percent unemployment rate it originally reported for last September has now been modified to 3.8 percent, slightly less than the 3.9 percent January 1970 level. The last time the rate had reached 3.9 percent was in November 1967.

Senate Showdown Near On 3 Civil Rights Tests

regation that had been imposed by law in southern states and rectifying "de facto" segregation based on neighborhood school boundaries.

An amendment by Sen. John C. Stennis (D-Miss.) to erase the distinction got unexpected support from Sen. Abraham A. Ribicoff (D-Conn.), who said the North is guilty of "monumental hypocrisy" on the issue. But most northern senators who spoke on the issue termed the distinction valid and opposed the Dixie amendment. And Ribicoff said he will oppose a second Stennis amendment to validate "freedom of choice" in school assignments.

The civil rights record of Judge Carswell continued to draw opposition to his confirmation—but mostly from liberal Democrats.

The Senate Judiciary Committee, which recommended confirmation of Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., last year, hasn't formally acted on the nomination but is expected to support it. That would shift the battle to the Senate floor.

The 76-member Democratic Policy Council, headed by former Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey, urged the Senate to reject the nomination.

Humphrey said a Supreme Court nominee "must be devoid of any record of racial bias, discrimination or intolerance." And Carswell, he charged, does not meet this "minimum requirement."

A bipartisan proposal to extend the 1964 Voting Rights Act will be put before the Senate as a substitute for the Administration's bill which has been passed by the House.

Its co-sponsors are expected to be Senate Republican Leader Hugh Scott of Pennsylvania and Michigan Democrat Philip A. Hart.

Their bill, supported by civil rights groups, would extend the Voting Rights Act undiluted for another five years and also adopt two provisions of the Administration proposal—a flat ban on literacy tests as a voting requirement in any state and a waiver of residence requirements for voting in a presidential election.

The first test of the Hart-Scott proposal will come in the Senate Judiciary Committee which has been directed by the Senate to report out a bill by Mar. 1.

ILO Chief David Morse To Quit After 22 Years

United Nations, N.Y.—David A. Morse will step out May 31 as director general of the International Labor Organization after some 22 years of service, he announced at a press conference here. Morse emphasized that he is resigning, not retiring.

The ILO's Governing Body will meet in March to act on the resignation and name a successor, he said.

Morse will be 63 on the day his resignation becomes effective. He and his wife, also a New York native, want to "return to our country" after a quarter-century of living overseas, he said.

Urban problems, slums and ghettos and rural poverty are the problems he understands best, he observed, and they are the problems he hopes to tackle in the future, he told reporters.

Morse previously resigned in 1961 but withdrew the resignation at the urging of delegates from the United States, Europe and Africa.

Born in the Bronx, Morse graduated from Rutgers College and Harvard Law School. He gave up his law practice in New Jersey after Pearl Harbor and joined the Army. After service as a captain in North Africa, Sicily and Italy, he became chief of the labor division of the Allied Military Government.

Pres. Truman in 1946 named him assistant secretary of labor, then under secretary and later acting secretary. In 1948 he was elected ILO director general and has been re-elected to successive five-year terms.

Under his directorship, the ILO recently was awarded the Nobel Prize for its services to the cause of peace. The United Nations agency observed its 50th anniversary in 1969.

32 Fire Deaths Cited in Appeal For Study Unit

Pres. William H. McClennan of the Fire Fighters said a fire that killed 32 of the 46 patients in an Ohio nursing home last month points up the urgent need for a national commission on fire prevention and control.

"An active commission, investigating and publicizing fire hazards and how to combat them, would go a long way toward preventing loss of life and property" where newly developed materials have been inadequately tested for fire safety, he said.

A Senate subcommittee ended hearings Feb. 10 on the Marietta, O., fire with a statement by Chairman Frank E. Moss (D-Utah) that federal fire safety rules are inadequate.

McClennan's union wants implementation and funding of the 1968 Fire Research & Safety Act. It urged Pres. Nixon to appoint the national commission authorized by the act and Congress to provide funds for it.

Council Cites Urgent Need For 'Substantial' Pay Gains

REPORTERS COVERING Executive Council sessions question AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at a news conference following a council meeting. They represented most of the nation's leading newspapers, news services and news magazines.

Says Workers Have 'No Other Recourse'

By Saul Miller

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Substantial gains at the bargaining table for American workers in 1970 are essential to offset increased living costs and to achieve an advance in living standards, the AFL-CIO declared.

Given the economic circumstances of the past few years, the federation's Executive Council said, workers "have no other recourse than to seek substantial wage gains in collective bargaining."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told reporters that the "shoe is on the other foot" as far as the economic situation is concerned. The average worker who earns his living from wages, he said, should not be asked to make a further sacrifice by holding back on what he is honestly entitled to in wage increases. The moderation should be coming from those earning large profits who should be cutting back on prices.

Meany emphasized that American workers currently are in a "catch up" situation trying to recover wage gains that have been washed out by inflation.

The economic facts, the council said, are that:

- Little if any gain in buying power in the after-tax earnings of large groups of workers has been made in the past four years.
- Living costs rose 5.4 percent in 1969 on the heels of a 4.2 percent increase in 1968.
- It now costs over $10,000 to maintain a modest standard of living for an urban family of four.
- Deferred increases under existing contracts—covering about 5 million workers—come to an average of 5.6 percent in 1970.
- There have been sharp increases in profits, executive pay and other forms of executive income in recent years.

In addition to the bargaining position, the council adopted statements on tax policies, national health insurance, occupational health and safety, the Carswell nomination and a number of other matters in the opening days of the mid-winter meeting here. They are covered in separate stories appearing in this issue of the News.

At press conferences held in conjunction with the sessions, Meany made the following points:

- The federation has not seen the latest reported Administration proposals for handling "national emergency" strikes scheduled to be presented to Congress, but organized labor is opposed to compulsory arbitration in any form regardless of how it is "sugar-coated."
- There is every indication that the rise in unemployment is

Opposition Mounts:

Carswell Nomination Called Degrading to Supreme Court

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Judge G. Harrold Carswell is the "least qualified" person nominated for the Supreme Court in this century, the AFL-CIO Executive Council charged as it called on the Senate to reject "this appalling appointment" as an "insult" to the federal judiciary and to Negro Americans.

Carswell's nomination "degrades the stature of the court and treats it as part of the political spoils of office," the Executive Council declared. And it "clearly contradicts" Pres. Nixon's campaign pledge to look for Supreme Court justices of the caliber of the late Oliver Wendell Holmes and Louis D. Brandeis.

"It is all too plain that Judge Carswell was chosen not in quest of a Holmes or Brandeis, but to appease the white segregationists in the South," the council observed. (Excerpts from statement on Page 4.)

Carswell received a 13-4 endorsement from the conservative-led Senate Judiciary Committee—a bigger margin than the committee had given to Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., last fall. This time, all seven Republicans on the committee voted to support the nomination reflecting a reluctance on the part of GOP moderates to oppose the President twice in a row on a Supreme Court nomination.

Opposition continued to build up, however, both in and out of Congress. Leading newspapers, prominent lawyers, organizations such as the National Education Association and religious leaders joined with the trade union and civil rights movements in urging defeat of the nomination.

Floor action on the nomination has been put off until March, giving a double-edged strategic advantage to Senate liberals.

First, there is more time for public unhappiness with the Carswell nomination to be transformed into Senate votes.

And secondly, if the nomination is put off until after the Senate acts on voting rights legislation, there is less of a threat of delaying tactics by Southern senators to prevent extension of the Voting Rights Act.

Nine Unions Weighing Westinghouse Proposal

Pittsburgh—The Westinghouse Electric Corp. capped four months of negotiations by offering employe unions a new contract proposal generally equivalent in its economic terms to the strike-settling agreement with the General Electric Co.

Negotiators for nine unions met to analyze the Westinghouse proposal, which they said fell short of meeting union expectations as to retroactivity of wage increases, length of contract and several other issues.

The unions want wage hikes retroactive to Nov. 9, terminal date of the old contract. Management's most recent offer is tied to the date of Feb. 9. The negotiators said they will seek to keep the contract talks going until this and the other unsettled issues have been explored.

Westinghouse has 104,000 employes covered by contract. They stayed on the job during the 100-day GE strike with the approval of the AFL-CIO committe which coordinated this year's bargaining with both firms. Most of them made regular contributions to the AFL-CIO GE Strike Relief Fund, which raised well over $2 million for the strikers.

Labor Presses Drive For Health Insurance

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Declaring that "every American is entitled to comprehensive quality health care," the AFL-CIO called on Congress to consider and act on national health insurance legislation.

The federation's Executive Council proposed a set of guidelines for national health insurance and strongly endorsed the bill introduced by Rep. Martha W. Griffiths (D-Mich.), which "incorporates these fundamental principles."

Despite the achievements of medical scence, the council said, the nation faces a crisis in health care with "a sophisticated 20th century medical technology shackled to an 18th century delivery system."

Symptoms of the crisis, it said, include "the unconscionable escalation in costs, unavailability of physicians when they are needed, and a distorted distribution of health manpower and facilities."

Declaring that "patchwork solutions are no longer viable," the council said "only a complete restructuring of the delivery system will do the job. This can come only with enactment of a national health insurance program."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told reporters that he is "very optimistic" that a national health insurance law will be enacted in a

Job Safety Bill Called 'Must' For Congress

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Passage of a strong occupational safety and health bill is a must item on the agenda of this session of Congress, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

It reiterated "in strongest terms" the endorsement by the 1969 AFL-CIO convention of legislation introduced by Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) and Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.) to provide on-the-job safety and health standards.

The measure would direct the Secretary of Labor to set the standards and enforce them with the power to shut down an unsafe operation in an emergency. Health standards would be based on recommendations from the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

Adoption of the legislation, adequately funded and staffed, "will be the first decisive step toward the ultimate achievement of a safe and healthy place of employment for all American workers," the council said.

The council's statement urged all AFL-CIO affiliates "to immediately use every means within their power" to build support in Congress.

"As every working man and woman knows," the council said, "the danger of death or crippling illness or accident on the job is a constant and growing hazard."

Yet, it continued, there is no state with a completely adequate safety and health law and in many states such laws "are absolutely inadequate."

Noting that both the previous and present Administrations have urged enactment of federal legislation, the council added, "The issue is no longer whether or not any legislation should be adopted, but what kind of legislation."

With that made clear, the AFL-CIO leaders urged Congress to stop the mounting death and injury toll by enacting the O'Hara Williams bill "at the earliest possible date."

IMPORTANCE OF labor's campaign for national health insurance is stressed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at Executive Council session. Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel is at right.

Full Support Pledged To Newark Teachers

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The teachers of Newark, N.J., have the backing of the entire American labor movement in their fight for a satisfactory contract, the AFL-CIO Executive Council assured striking members of the Newark Teachers Union.

Calling on the Essex-West Hudson Labor Council and the New Jersey State AFL-CIO to "mobilize all necessary help" for the teachers, the council reiterated its long-held position that "injunctions will not educate children."

As the council acted to line up national labor support for striking AFT Local 481, negotiations over a new contract broke down despite the intervention of Newark Mayor Hugh J. Addonizio. Sheriff's deputies then resumed their raids on school picket lines, arresting Pres. David Selden of the American Federation of Teachers among others for picketing in violation of a blanket injunction.

Selden said he will stay in jail until the strike ends. The others were released in personal bond to await trial for ignoring the injunction secured by the Newark Board of Education.

More than 100 pickets have been arrested since Local 481, representing nearly 3,000 teachers, left the classrooms Feb. 2 to demonstrate for higher wages, smaller class sizes and a larger voice in community relations. About 84,000 pupils in the state's largest public school system are affected.

Meanwhile another strike by Jersey City teachers continued while 360 members of AFT Local 202 ended a strike that began Feb. 2 in Superior, Wis.

The Jersey City walkout, called by the local affiliate of the National Education Association, closed 34 schools with 38,000 pupils and 1,650 teachers.

The Superior strike ended when the school board rescinded restrictive rules and agreed to mediate a dispute over school conditions.

The council statement noted that Newark teachers are in the third week of their strike "for the most basic rights of workers —acceptable working conditions and a grievance procedure with final and binding arbitration."

Instead of negotiating in good faith, the council observed, the school board "resorted to a sweeping injunction under which scores of union members—teachers and supporters—have been arrested."

The statement continued: "This Executive Council has repeatedly made clear its intention of supporting the AFT and its local unions in their fight to achieve decent wage levels and working conditions for America's teachers.

"It is our firm opinion that one of the fundamental requirements for properly educating children is a teaching force of the highest caliber. Obviously teachers cannot be paid substandard wages or be expected to work under unacceptable conditions." The council said "we intend that the teachers of Newark have the backing of the entire trade union movement."

Administration Warned:

New Proposals Seen Gutting Tax Reform

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO pledged to vigorously oppose any Administration bid to cut corporation taxes, impose a value-added sales tax or any other steps that would undo the limited progress achieved by the tax reform act of 1969.

The federation's Executive Council specifically singled out tax forgiveness devices—so-called tax incentives—and no-strings federal tax revenue shared with the states as "haphazard, costly and wasteful approaches" to meeting the nation's goals.

The tax reform of last year was an "important first step toward tax justice," the council said, "but it is not the end of the road." The statement listed a series of additional reforms and changes in the tax laws that are badly needed to achieve real tax justice.

It listed five achievements, however, of the 1969 law which it said moved towards AFL-CIO goals:

- Removal from the federal income tax rolls of those with incomes below the poverty level.
- Provision of a measure of tax relief for moderate and middle-income Americans who have shouldered far more than their just share of the tax burden.
- Trimming, though not eliminating, many loopholes and gimmicks that provide special, unfair tax bonanzas for the very wealthy.
- Elimination of the 7 percent tax credit for business investment which has been a major inflationary pressure.
- Ending the unfair temporary surtax which did not reach "tax-sheltered income."

But despite these gains, the council said, as long as unearned income from stocks and other capital assets sold at a profit are half-taxed and certain forms of income are never taxed, "tax justice has not been achieved."

It urged high priority to reforms in the area of capital gains, estate and gift taxes, an end of the tax exemption for interest on state and local bonds, elimination of maximum tax provisions in the new law and further cutbacks in depletion allowances.

"We will fight vigorously," the council asserted, "every attempt by the Administration to cut corporate taxes. We disagree completely with Treasury Sec. Kennedy's belief that there is 'a high priority need' for reducing business taxes. Already business holds a favored position in the tax structure. It would be patently unfair to give business an even better tax break and we shall do everything we can to stop it."

"Moreover, tax-forgiveness devices—so-called tax incentives—as well as no-strings federal tax revenue shared with the states are in our view haphazard, costly and wasteful approaches to meeting the nation's goals. Tax forgiveness has the same impact on the federal budget as a direct expenditure. Yet, through such gimmicks, the federal government relinquishes budgetary control, without federal performance standards, to wealthy investors and businesses who reap most of the benefits.

"Similarly, the nation's best interests will not be served through no-strings aids to states and localities that are not geared to specific programs, developed in line with congressionally defined national priorities and subject to federal standards of performance."

Finally, the council said, the nation has the resources to meet its domestic problems and help the financial crises facing many states and large cities, but that "so long as there are injustices in the tax structure, America's ability to marshal these resources will be unnecessarily hampered."

Labor Presses Drive For Health Insurance

"fairly reasonable time" although he did not expect action in the current session of Congress.

He declared that there is a growing concern throughout the country about the rising cost of medical care and that this concern would be translated into legislation reasonably soon. He said there is a greater pressure now for national health insurance than there was for Medicare when it was first introduced many years ago. He stressed that national health insurance is a "high priority item" on the AFL-CIO list of needed legislation.

The council insisted that national health insurance must do more than simply pay whatever fees doctors and hospitals choose to charge.

It should "provide financial incentives to improve the availability of health services and the efficiency by which they are delivered," the council said. The resources of the program must be used as a "lever" to improve the organization and delivery of medical care.

Along with the program, the statement urged, there should be more funds for federal health manpower programs, including "many more scholarships for students who desire to enter the medical and health professions."

An effective national health insurance program, the council said, should include these basic principles:

- Universal coverage, regardless of age, income or employment.
- Comprehensive benefits, from preventive care through treatment in and out of hospitals to rehabilitative care when necessary.
- Financing by means of an employer payroll tax, matched by the federal government, with workers contributing at about the same rate they now pay for Medicare.
- The program would contract for all medical services on a prepayment basis, similar to the method by which group practice plans now operate.
- Patients would have free choice of doctors and health care systems. Doctors could still practice outside the system if they could find patients willing to pay their fees without reimbursement.
- Financial assistance would be provided to help set up comprehensive systems of health services.

Urging the need for such a program, the council noted that the United States spends more for health care than any other industrial nation, but has dropped to 16th in infant mortality, 22nd in male life expectancy and 10th in female life expectancy.

John A. Shuff Dies, Ex-IATSE Officer

Miami—Former Sec.-Treas. John A. Shuff of the Theatrical Stage Employes died here at Abby Clinic Feb. 16. He was 68.

Shuff had been a vice president of IATSE from 1954 until he was appointed secretary-treasurer in November 1965. He was re-elected in 1966 and served in the post until last October.

Shuff began his career as a motion picture projectionist in 1918 and joined IATSE Local 364 in Akron, Ohio, in 1922. He served as secretary and business agent of the local from 1930 to 1965. Funeral services were to be held in Akron.

Retired Vice Presidents Lauded for Services

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Three former members of the AFL-CIO Executive Council have been designated by the council as vice presidents emeritus of the federation.

The three, honored in separate resolutions, are David Dubinsky, Paul L. Phillips and P. L. Siemiller.

Dubinsky, who headed the Ladies' Garment Workers for 34 years before stepping down from that post in 1966, was praised as "a giant and pillar of the free trade union movement."

The council recalled that in more than 50 years as an officer in his union, Dubinsky had served as an "outstanding representative" of workers on numerous public, governmental and international bodies and commissions.

It noted that he served on the council from the time of the AFL-CIO merger in 1955 to his retirement last year after earlier service on the AFL executive council.

Phillips, a member of the AFL-CIO council from 1957 to 1967, was given "heartfelt thanks" for his services, particularly his contributions to the Committee on Economic Policy.

The council saluted his "dedicated" leadership as president of the Papermakers & Paperworkers from 1957 to his retirement in 1968, and his leadership of the Paper Makers from 1948 to 1957.

It was Phillips's "quiet confidence and leadership that helped lead the way toward the merger of the Papermakers & Paperworkers" in 1957, the council said.

Siemiller, who served on the council from 1965 until his retirement last year, was praised as "a source of common sense and sage wisdom" to the federation's governing body.

A resolution singled out his service as an adviser to former Pres. Harry S Truman, a representative at the International Labor Organization and a specialist in industrial safety affairs.

Siemiller, who retired as Machinists' president last July 1 after heading the IAM for four years, "devoted his working life to the trade union movement and to achieving a better land for his fellow man," the council said.

'Substantial' Wage Gains Called Urgent

Council Documents Real-Earnings Lag

going to be more than moderate and could become very sharp, rising possibly to a rate of 6 percent.

- The President is "in error" in believing that he can beat back inflation with tight money and curbs on government programs without a rise in unemployment.
- As much as labor abhors controls they might be an answer on inflation: controls over all forms of income affecting all segments of society, not only workers. Meany underscored, however, that labor is not advocating controls, that it is simply one possible approach based on experience in World War II and Korea.
- He is quite hopeful that negotiations at Westinghouse will be concluded without a strike and that the contract will meet the standards established at General Electric.
- There are no present plans to charter a national union of police officers; neither a national demand nor desire for such a union has been demonstrated.
- Meetings with representatives of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions will continue later this year—probably in June in Geneva—on the reaffiliation of the AFL-CIO to the world labor group.

The council, acting on a report of its Economic Policy Committee, documented the case for substantial wage increases this year. It noted that for the year 1969, for example, the median increase in wages and fringe benefits in terms of real purchasing power was only 2.8 percent. This takes into account a 5.4 percent rise in the Consumer Price Index.

It compared the average weekly gross earnings of 47 million non-supervisory workers of $117.25 and the take-home pay of a worker with three dependents of $102.01 for December 1969 with similar figures four years ago and found the real purchasing power slightly less.

In the 1960s, the statement declared, "the record shows that the accelerated rise in living costs came first, long before the push for larger wage settlements." It was not until 1966-67, as living costs began to rise sharply that collective bargaining settlements also began to move up. Business, the resolution stressed, raised prices at an accelerated pace in an attempt "to maintain or even widen profit margins."

The present inflation, the council stressed "is largely a profit inflation" and a key part has been corporate profits. It noted that in the first half of 1969 corporate profits after taxes were up 93 percent from 1960 whereas the after-tax weekly earnings of the average non-supervisory worker were up only 34 percent, three-fifths less than profits, and that "in terms of buying power, the gain was only 10 percent."

The Administration, in the face of these facts, has imposed a severe squeeze on the economy with very tight money, the highest interest rates in 100 years and cuts in public construction.

The AFL-CIO, the council pointed out, "has urged the government to combat inflation through selective measures, specifically aimed at profit-inflation, the business investment boom and other trouble spots, rather than a severe squeeze on the economy as a whole. . . ."

Workers and trade unions are seriously concerned with the inflation that has plagued the economy in the past few years, the council stressed, and in absence of Administration policies to cope positively with the problem the major economic issues of rising living costs, washout of real buying power and an improved standard of living will be major issues in 1970 bargaining.

Herbert S. Thatcher, Union Counsel, Dies

Atty. Herbert S. Thatcher, who represented the Postal Clerks and other unions over the years, died unexpectedly at 60. He was buried in Milwaukee after services Feb. 18 in Arlington, Va.

Thatcher was an associate of Joseph A. Padway, general counsel of the former AFL, in the 1930s. Later he became a partner in the law firm of Woll, Glenn and Thatcher, which also represented the federation.

Nomination of Carswell Termed Insult to Court

told newsmen after the Executive Council session that "the more we learn about Carswell, the less attractive he looks as a member of the Supreme Court."

He expressed the hope that as Carswell's record becomes known, the chances of defeating the nomination will increase.

Noting that Carswell has a record of being repeatedly overruled by higher courts in civil rights cases, but had not sat on enough labor cases to make a record, Meany commented that in his experience "a judge who is anti-Negro is also anti-labor."

An American Bar Association committee gave a tepid concurrence to Carswell's nomination, stopping barely short of saying he shouldn't be confirmed.

Its Committee on Judicial Appointments rated him "qualified" rather than "exceptionally qualified."

The president of the ABA was quoted as indicating that such a designation means that the committee is not opposing the nomination but wouldn't have appointed Carswell to the Supreme Court if it were in a position to do so.

The council resolution said Carswell's recent disclaimer of bigoted statements he made as a candidate for the legislature would have been more convincing if his actions as a judge gave evidence of a change of heart.

But "quite the contrary," the council noted, both his court decisions and his attitude to attorneys appearing before him suggested a continued hostility to civil rights.

There are federal judges of distinction in the South, the council said, who have shown "moral courage" and have won distinction as jurists.

"Now these judges are passed over," the council said, "in favor of a nonentity whose only appeal is to forces determined to resist progress in civil rights and human rights."

Peace Corps Gets Backing on Recruits

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Labor has reaffirmed its "wholehearted" support of the Peace Corps and pledged its fullest assistance to the program's latest recruitment campaign.

"For nearly nine years," an AFL-CIO Executive Council resolution pointed out, "the United States has sent thousands of Peace Corps volunteers all over the globe as a tangible expression of America's willingness to help others."

The council promised the AFL-CIO's support "to a cooperative recruitment campaign" to fulfill the Peace Corps' need for volunteers who are craftsmen or who possess other skills or special knowledge.

Council Action Pays Tribute To DeAndrade

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The labor movement paid tribute here to the late Anthony J. DeAndrade in a memorial resolution adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

DeAndrade at his death Jan. 20 was president of the Printing Pressmen and an AFL-CIO vice president.

In a resolution mourning the death of their colleague and extending "heartfelt sympathies and most sincere condolences" to his wife and family, members noted that DeAndrade had served as "a dedicated member" of the Executive Council since 1965.

DeAndrade "devoted his entire life to democratic trade unionism," the council said, in more than 50 years of service to his union, including 10 years as president.

The resolution praised DeAndrade for combining his "great contributions to the labor movement with equally outstanding service to his nation and the entire world." Also he "gave wise counsel on pioneering progressive printing trades practices, and served the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. as vice president."

He was a man, the resolution observed, whose "friendship, wisdom, interest and accomplishments inspired all who knew him."

Labor Renews Support For Iowa Beef Strikers

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council called on all union members to continue supporting the strike and boycott of the Meat Cutters against Iowa Beef Packers, Inc., and urged the federal government to "vigorously police" the Mexican border against the recruiting of strikebreakers.

The council reiterated the pledge of support voted by the 1969 AFL-CIO convention for 1,200 union members who have tried since last Aug. 24 to get a strike settlement with the nation's largest beef producer in Dakota City, Neb.

The company, the council said, "engaged in ruthless strikebreaking, recruiting strikebreakers from as far away as Mexico; published propaganda that is false and malicious; sought to create violence; forced workers in its other plants off the job and filed multi-million-dollar suits against the union."

It noted that "the strikers have stood firm and the picket lines have been solid during one of the most bitter winters in history." It said "their demands have been reasonable, and they have demonstrated their belief in the justice of their cause by agreeing to submit the dispute to final and binding arbitration by a three-man panel" chosen by the Secretary of Labor.

The strike goes into its seventh month Feb. 25 with renewed effort by the strikers to work "unceasingly" for a fair settlement. Managment not only rejected efforts by the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service to get the parties back to the negotiating table but also turned down the union's proposal for a fact-finding panel.

The union pointed out that it has been trying to negotiate an "honorable settlement of the dispute." IBP's last offer, the union said, would "keep employes working at substandard wages and conditions."

Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman of the Meat Cutters, in a letter to all of the union's locals, said that the arbitration proposal had been designed to "dispel the many statements of the company that our international union was demanding a contract the company could not possibly agree to."

IBP, it was learned, is broadcasting "help wanted" ads in Spanish on a radio station just across the Rio Grande from Texas. Leaflets in both English and Spanish describe the jobs in glowing terms, but never mention that the work is strikebreaking. The English section of the leaflet suggests the workers may find they are being picketed, but the Spanish section of the leaflet notes only that the workers will find they are well-guarded.

The strike started in August after Iowa Beef Packers, a rapidly-growing and highly profitable corporation, insisted on a wage structure far below the standards of its competitors in meat packing.

United Funds Set Guidelines On Bargaining

The United Community Funds & Councils of America were praised by the AFL-CIO for urging their more than 2,700 associated voluntary agencies to accept new guidelines for collective bargaining.

The UCFCA board of directors declared that two requisites to "harmonious employe-management relations" must be "payments of at least minimum wages" and "the right of . . . employes to join organizations of their own choosing for collective bargaining and grievance purposes."

AFL-CIO Community Services Dir. Leo Perlis noted that the UCFCA action follows an AFL-CIO Executive Council statement of two years ago directed toward this goal.

Perlis added that UCFCA will appoint a staff member to keep AFL-CIO Community Services informed on the implementation of the UCFCA policy.

CWA Rebuffs Raid On New York Unit

The Communications Workers handily beat back a raid by an unaffiliated union to retain bargaining rights for a 34,000-worker unit.

Plant department employes of the Bell System in upstate New York voted by better than a 2-1 margin for CWA.

The statewide mail ballot tally was 16,398 for CWA to 7,963 for the unaffiliated Technical Electronic Communications Union and 322 votes for no union.

An Appalling Appointment

THE AFL-CIO EXECUTIVE COUNCIL deplores the nomination of Judge Carswell to the Supreme Court. We strongly urge the Senate to reject this appalling appointment.

This nomination degrades the stature of the court and treats it as a part of the political spoils of office. It clearly contradicts the President's own assertion, when he was a candidate, that he would look for a Holmes or a Brandeis.

Judge Carswell is not a Holmes or Brandeis. Prominent legal authorities attest that Judge Carswell is, from the standpoint of distinction as a lawyer or public servant, the least qualified nominee during this century. As a district judge he was noteworthy only for his hostility to Negro litigants, Negro attorneys, and Negro rights.

It is all too plain that Judge Carswell was chosen not in quest of a Holmes or Brandeis, but to appease the white segregationists in the South.

Such a nomination is an insult, both to the judiciary and to the nation's Negro citizens. There are judges on the federal courts in the South, including Republican judges, who have over many years both won distinction as jurists and have shown moral courage in vindicating the legal rights of minorities despite adverse community pressures. Now these judges are passed over, in favor of a nonentity whose only appeal is to forces determined to resist progress in civil rights and human rights. . . .

WHEN HE ASPIRED only to the Georgia legislature, Judge Carswell avowed his belief in white supremacy. Perhaps this irresponsible demagogery could be forgiven if it had been repudiated by subsequent acts, but it has not been. The verbal repudiation came only after he had been nominated to the Supreme Court and faced the necessity of confirmation. . . .

As a federal district judge, Judge Carswell was repeatedly overruled by the higher court because of his refusals to protect the legal and constitutional rights of Negro litigants. Lawyers who handled civil rights cases before him, including one who is now in the Dept. of Justice, have testified that he not only refused their clients justice, but was hostile and overbearing to counsel. There is nothing in any of this that suggests that Judge Carswell has ever repudiated, in deed as well as word, his devotion to white supremacy. . . .

The Leadership Conference on Civil Rights had opposed Judge Carswell's elevation to the Court of Appeals a few months before his nomination by the President to the Supreme Court because of his record, while a district judge, of hostility to civil rights and civil rights lawyers.

This nomination is an affront to the responsible elements in the Negro community, and all believers in civil rights, and appeals only to the support of racist elements.

But that is not the end of the matter. The Senate can refuse to give its consent to this appointment, and we hope that it will show the statesmanship commensurate with its constitutional responsibility.

We urge that the Senate reject this nomination.

Tactics of Right-Wingers Echo Policies of Communist Russia

By John P. Roche

SINCE THE TIME of Lenin, the American Communist movement has been considered something of a bad joke by the Kremlin. When, in 1945, Joseph Stalin decided to dump Earl Browder as head of the American CP, the news was broken to the American comrades by the old New York World-Telegram, which featured a denunciation of Browder that had appeared in the theoretical journal of the French Communist party. How had the World-Telegram scooped the Daily Worker? A Soviet diplomat tipped them off.

As I read my nut mail, I think I can appreciate the Comintern's historic contempt for its U.S. branch office. What are the Communists doing today in this country? Agitating away on peace, racism, and related issues.

Except for the Federal Bureau of Investigation, they have a very unreliable constituency. With no serious base in the trade union movement, with student rebels flitting off towards something they call "Trotskyism" (though Trotsky is doubtless spinning in his grave), they have been desperately trying to tie with black nationalism, notably with the Panthers. But the evidence suggests that the blacks are playing their own hand and regard the CP as just another one of "Whitey's bags."

Yet, as my correspondence indicates, the CP really has a tremendous potential constituency, one that is in a state of disorganization and could probably be simple to infiltrate. It would call for a little imagination to do the job right, but the materials are at hand.

All the Communists have to do is "tell it like it is" about the Soviet Union. Properly understood, the USSR is a nut right-winger's dream of heaven.

For example, where else in the world can one find an "anti-parasite" law to deal properly with hippies, crazies, yippies, and the like? The anti-parasite law is very simple: a parasite can be sent off to Siberia for five years by administrative action. For what? Obviously, for being a parasite. None of that petty-bourgeois nonsense about "due process of law." With effective Communist leadership, the law-and-order forces in California could have this up for referendum in two years.

Or take the related problems of teenage alienation, addiction to rock music, dirty language, drugs, and similar indices of capitalist degeneration. In the Soviet Union such anti-social behavior is dealt with summarily.

A recent news story would warm the hearts of the Minutemen: it told how a Soviet community, plagued by teenage disorders, organized vigilantes and beat hell out of "the hooligans." The town elders, far from feeling ashamed of their brutality, advertised it as something other communities should keep in mind. Would Minutemen really have trouble becoming Red Guards?

BUT THE CLINCHER, which would give the American Communists a wave to surf on, is anti-Semitism. The USSR is a Jew-baiter's paradise. Where else would a reference to "rootless cosmopolitans" be welcomed with such knowing winks? Where else could one find such an enthusiastic audience for exposes of the "international Zionist conspiracy?" Some of the stuff I get in the mail might even be published in Izvestia, while in the United States the "ruling circles" have effectively suppressed it.

Without laboring the point, a number of other aspects of Soviet policy would be heartwarming. No modern art, for one thing. And if liberals make trouble, you pack them off to lunatic asylums. Finally, of course, they know how to deal with their minorities.

All in all, it is hard to understand why—when they have such a good thing going for them—the American Communists refuse to cash in. One can appreciate, I guess, why every time someone mentioned the American CP, Lenin is alleged to have groaned and Stalin to have spat.

Improved Delivery System:

AFL-CIO Proposes Guidelines For National Health Insurance

THE AFL-CIO Executive Council proposed these basic principles for a national health insurance program, to be financed by employer, government and worker contributions:

1. Every man, woman and child in the nation—rich or poor, working or unemployed, old or young—should be eligible for the complete range of services.

2. Benefits should be comprehensive, including preventive, outpatient, inpatient and rehabilitative care in every appropriate setting.

These inclusive benefits would permit the physician to select the exact type of treatment appropriate for the patient's need regardless of cost factors.

3. The program should be financed like social security with payments by employes at about the presently scheduled Medicare rate, with the federal government and employers splitting the remaining payroll cost. The self-employed would also contribute.

The program would absorb Medicare and Medicaid. For the first time we would have equal rights to health care, regardless of income.

4. The national health insurance program should contract for all medical services on a prepayment basis.

Eligible contractors would include medical and dental societies, hospitals, groups of primary physicians and multi-specialty groups. All would be paid on a per capita basis but how each contractor distributed the funds it received to individual doctors would be strictly an internal matter.

5. National health insurance should enhance, not contract, the freedoms of patients and doctors alike. Patients should have free choice of physician and free choice of health delivery systems.

Physicians should not have to practice within the system if they could find patients outside it. But if they did choose to participate—and this council is convinced that the overwhelming majority would—there would be no interference whatsoever with the clinical practice of medicine.

Solo practitioners could contract to provide services on the same per capita basis as medical societies or groups. However, doctors who accepted payment on a capitation basis or were members of groups, would be substantially free of all paper work. They could devote their attention to the prevention and treatment of illness.

6. The program should have as one of its principal aims improving the organization and delivery of health care. Therefore, financial assistance should be provided for planning, development and initial staffing of comprehensive health delivery systems.

Fact Sheet Report:

Costs Mount, Quality Declines As Nation Faces Health Crisis

A FACT SHEET on "the health care crisis" documented the Executive Council endorsement of national health insurance. Following are excerpts:

For the fiscal year that ended June 30, 1969:

- The nation's spending for health reached $60.3 billion and accounted for 6.7 percent of the gross national product. Expenditures for health services and supplies came to $56.1 billion.
- Health expenditures per person—$294—were nearly 11 percent greater than in the previous year.
- Public outlays for health rose nearly 15 percent in one year and reached $22.6 billion.
- The largest single government program for health is Medicare, with outlays reaching $6.6 billion or 44 percent of all federal health outlays in 1969.
- Public assistance, primarily Medicaid, is the second largest government health program, with expenditures now totaling $4.4 billion.
- Hospital care expenditures increased 17 percent in one year and reached a total of $22.5 billion.
- Expenditures for physicians' services rose 9 percent to a total of nearly $12 billion.

There has been more than a 15-fold increase in medical care outlays since 1929. In that year expenditures were under $4 billion and represented 3.6 percent of the gross national product. In 1950, health care expenditures took 4.6 of the GNP and in fiscal 1969 they accounted for 6.7 percent. We are first among industrial countries in the amount of money we spend for health care.

Quality of care is very difficult to measure. However, objective standards, such as infant mortality rates and life expectancy at birth can be measured.

In 1950, the United States was sixth in infant mortality. By 1960 we had fallen to 11th place and now we are 16th.

In 1959, we were 13th in male life expectancy. By 1965 we had dropped to 22nd place. American women do a little better. Their life expectancy only dropped from seventh to 10th place in the international ranking.

An examination of the medical records of a sample of 430 patients admitted to 98 different hospitals in New York City indicated only 57 percent of all patients and only 31 percent of the general medical cases received "optimal" care.

Income Tax Plan Pressed:

State and Local Reforms Urged To Cut Sales, Property Taxes

TAX REFORM at the state and local level is needed to make the systems more equitable and more effective in meeting the growing demand for more and better public services, an AFL-CIO tax expert declared.

"Most states and virtually every single large city are up against it financially," said Arnold Cantor, an economist in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research. He pointed out that neither property nor sales taxes—the main revenue producers for city and state governments—is a "good measure of wealth or ability to pay."

"Property taxes are close to 90 percent of municipal revenues," Cantor said, yet they are "very, very sluggish revenue producers" and "very poorly administered." He said that the "migration of middle- and upper-income citizens" has reduced the tax base and increased the proportion of "high-cost" citizens in the ghetto areas, who are least able to bear the increasing costs of education and other urban needs.

Questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, an AFL-CIO produced network radio interview, Cantor said that "increasingly, the states are recognizing that they have to help their cities." He credited the reapportionment of state legislatures as a major factor in that recognition.

He said that, by and large, "states are making good efforts" to improve their tax systems, particularly through fuller use of income taxes. He said that states "have to increase their reliance on taxes that are fair and taxes that grow a little faster than economic growth generally, if they are going to keep up with their needs."

"It is one of the happy accidents," he declared, that "the fairest taxes are also the most productive," which, he noted, "leads you right into an income tax."

Reporters questioning Cantor were Stanley Levey of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Harry Conn of Press Associates, Inc. The public affairs interview is broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

'Not the End of the Road':

Tax Reforms Called Short of Real Justice

Following are excerpts from a statement on tax reform adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council, Feb. 18, 1970, at Bal Harbour, Fla.

THE TAX REFORM ACT of 1969 has placed the federal income tax on the road to tax justice.

Almost a full year of congressional study, inquiry and deliberation—conducted in the face of Administration hostility and unprecedented counter efforts by the advocates of special interest loopholes—has produced a law which:

1. Removes from the federal income-tax rolls those whose incomes are below the poverty level.

2. Provides a measure of tax relief to the hard-working, taxpaying, moderate- and middle-income Americans who have shouldered far fore than their just share of the tax burden.

3. Trims, though does not eliminate, many loopholes and gimmicks in the tax structure which provide special, unfair tax bonanzas for the very wealthy.

4. Eliminates the 7 percent tax credit for business investment which has been a major inflationary pressure in the economy.

5. Puts an end to the unfair temporary surtax which did not reach tax-sheltered income.

These are all goals of the AFL-CIO.

Thus the Tax Reform Act of 1969 is an important first step toward tax justice, but it is not the end of the road. So long as wages, salaries and other forms of ordinary income are taxed in full; unearned income from stocks and other capital assets sold at a profit are half-taxed; and certain forms of income, such as interest on state and local bonds, never even appear on the tax form, tax justice has not been achieved.

The House Ways & Means Committee has made a commitment to continue its work on tax reform and to specifically consider action on estate and gift taxes. We urge the committee to take up this important work as soon as possible. High priority should be given to the whole area of capital-gains taxation.

In addition, we urge more far-reaching tax-reform measures. Among them are:

- Elimination of the maximum-tax provisions in the new law;
- Further cutbacks in depletion allowances;
- A strengthened minimum tax;
- Elimination of the tax exemption for interest on state and local bonds.

MANY OF THE NEW tax-raising devices being considered by the Administration would undo much, if not all, of the good accomplished through the Tax Reform Act. The value-added tax is a sales tax pure and simple. All of the burden falls on the consumer, and the greatest portion is shouldered by those of low and moderate incomes. Such a tax is unfair and should be rejected. We just as determinedly oppose across-the-board increases in excise taxes.

We will fight vigorously every attempt by the Administration to cut corporate taxes. We disagree completely with Treasury Sec. Kennedy's belief that there is "a high priority need" for reducing business taxes. Already business holds a favored position in the tax structure. It would be patently unfair to give business an even better tax break and we shall do everything we can to stop it.

Moreover, tax-forgiveness devices—so-called tax incentives—as well as no-strings federal tax revenue shared with the states are in our view haphazard, costly and wasteful approaches to meeting the nation's goals. . . .

We believe America has the resources to meet our domestic problems and help solve the financial crises facing many states and most large cities. We also believe that so long as there are injustices in the tax structure, America's ability to marshal these resources will be unnecessarily hampered.

REFORM OF TAX SYSTEMS at state and local levels is urged by AFL-CIO Economist Arnold Cantor, center, on Labor News Conference as he cites the weakness of property and sales taxes. Interviewing Cantor are Harry Conn, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Stanley Levey of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers.

MARITIME UNIONS reaffirmed their support for expanded world trade but warned that it "must be based on equity" so as not to destroy U.S. jobs. A resolution setting forth the stand was adopted by the AFL-CIO Maritime Trade Dept.'s executive board meeting in Florida.

Two Key HEW Officials Hit White House Policies

Two top officials of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare voiced public dissatisfaction with Nixon Administration policies.

One resigned under what he termed "political pressure." The other told a Senate subcommittee he didn't agree with testimony that "someone else wrote for me."

Leon E. Panetta, who has been chief of HEW's civil rights office, said he turned in his resignation after reading in a newspaper story that he was going to be "dumped" because he had antagonized conservatives in Congress by his active support of school desegregation.

Panetta, who was an aide to former Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel (R-Calif.) before coming to HEW, said he has been "particularly disturbed" by statements from White House aides and from Vice. Pres. Agnew indicating a retreat on civil rights.

"There are those around the President," Panetta said in an obvious reference to the GOP "southern strategy" advocates, "whose principal goal is . . . to win the next election."

He wrote HEW Sec. Robert H. Finch that "such pressures have been brought to bear on my position . . . that my resignation is the inevitable result."

On the same day, Dr. Roger O. Egeberg, assistant secretary for health of HEW, testified before a Senate subcommittee on a bill by Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.) to double federal aid for medical research and treatment centers, and add kidney disease to existing programs for heart disease, cancer and stroke.

Before reading a key paragraph opposing any new construction of medical research facilities, Egeberg told Yarborough and other subcommittee members that he wasn't the author of the statement, leaving the clear implication that he disagreed with it and supported the added funds.

John Baer Dies at 83, Noted Labor Cartoonist

John M. Baer, cartoonist for Labor newspaper since 1921 and former two-term congressman, died in a Washington, D.C., hospital after a short illness. He continued to sketch labor subjects for the railroad unions' newspaper until a few weeks before his death at 83.

Services were set for Feb. 21 at Joseph Gawler's Sons funeral home.

Baer was born Mar. 26, 1886, at Black Creek, Wis. He began drawing cartoons when he was 12, and after graduation from Lawrence College, moved to Fargo, N.D.; to work for the Fargo Courier-News.

Active in farm-labor politics, Baer made "chalk talks" a feature of the campaign that won him election to Congress. Sworn in for the first of two terms in 1917, he was 31, the youngest member at that time.

He continued to draw cartoons while serving in Congress. He sold his works to Scripps-Howard and Hearst newspaper syndicates. The drawings usually had a strong Populist or farmer-labor flavor, lampooning big business practices, bloated tycoons and congressmen who did their bidding.

The cartoons aroused the ire of those he lampooned. After Baer was defeated in the Harding landslide of 1920, a writer said of him "he cartooned himself into Congress and then he cartooned himself out."

He joined the staff of Labor newspaper, never ran again for office and never returned to North Dakota to stay.

In 1931, he drew a cartoon which depicted the farmer, the worker and "honest business" saying to card-playing allies of "Big Biz" the phrase "We demand a New Deal." Baer sent a copy to Franklin D. Roosevelt, then governor of New York, who used the phrase in his campaign for President and his acceptance speech for the 1932 Democratic nomination.

Baer and his wife were to observe their 60th wedding anniversary this year. They have three sons and several grandchildren.

Lithographers Union Boosts Strike Benefits

New York—Increases in strike and lockout benefits for members of the Lithographers & Photoengravers have been voted by LPIU members in a secret ballot referendum. Benefits were raised from $50 a week to $60 for the first four weeks, and to $70 thereafter.

Voters also increased the ceiling on the union's emergency defense fund from $3 million to $4 million. Four other propositions were approved and two defeated.

Equity Termed Vital Factor in Global Trade

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. reaffirmed its commitment to expanded world trade but warned that trade expansion "must be based on equity."

The warning came in a resolution adopted at the MTD executive board's mid-winter meeting here highlighting a number of reports, studies and discussions of maritime and related problems. MTD Pres. Paul Hall told the board that continued attention to these matters is urgent and that the department will continue its efforts to keep the "pressure on."

Resolution Presented

The trade resolution was presented by Charles Feinstein, president of the Leather Goods, Plastics & Novelty Workers Union and chairman of the MTD's legislative committee.

Recounting the role of American labor in aiding the economies of other nations and passage of legislation to enlarge world trade, the resolution said there must be "a partnership in fair trade" and that America cannot be expected to shoulder the burden alone.

The statement reviewed the statistics on imports of footwear and manufactured leather goods, toys and sporting goods, transportation equipment, textiles, electrical appliances, stone, glass and clay products and the increase in foreign-flag shipping. It added:

"Trade is a two-way street. It is unfair and dangerous for foreign nations to have 95 percent, as in the shipping industry, and the United States to have only 5 percent."

Reciprocity Stressed

It is unfair and dangerous also, the resolution continued, "for products of low-wage, foreign-government assisted corporations to continue to be exported to the United States while, at the same time, all kinds of official and unofficial barriers are erected to keep the production of U.S. workmen out of their countries."

The board voted to work closely with the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. to make possible "a sharing of information and a pooling of resources to counter the present unfair situation in foreign trade." Feinstein was instructed also to make a definitive study and recommend a course of action to the next board session.

Maritime Trades Resolution:

Federal Ban Asked On 'Lie Detectors'

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The use of lie detectors as one aspect of the "invasion of privacy in America" should be banned by federal legislation, the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. declared.

The use of polygraphs or similar lie detecting devices "is clearly violative of constitutional rights," the department's executive board said in a resolution. It called the polygraph "an unreliable device for the measuring of truth or deception."

The resolution was based on a detailed 174-page study devoted to the use of lie detectors by industry, government and law-enforcement agencies.

The report, "The 'Lie Detector'—Guilty Until 'Proven' Innocent," was presented to the board by Edward J. Carlough, director of organization of the Sheet Metal Workers and chairman of a special study committee created by the MTD to look into all aspects of invasion of privacy in America.

The lie detector report is the first of a series scheduled to be produced by the MTD including studies of electronic surveillance, pre-employment tests, counseling questionnaires in schools and indiscriminate gathering and dissemination of personal information by credit bureaus, Carlough said.

In addition to its call for a flat prohibition against the use of lie detectors, the MTD board urged:

- Inclusion in all collective bargaining agreements of a clause prohibiting management from compelling, or even requesting, workers to submit to such tests either during pre-employment screening or after they are on the job.
- Use of grievance and arbitration machinery to protect workers against being compelled to submit to lie detector tests.
- Action at the state level to win passage of laws banning the use of "lie detectors" in employer-employe relations until federal legislation can be enacted in the field. Carlough said there are now a dozen states that have these laws on the books, and that's a good beginning.

The report contains a lengthy analysis of the development of the polygraph from devices originally used only for medical purposes, and cites numerous court cases and the testimony of educators challenging the validity of the assumptions on which the "lie-detecting" process is based.

It contains also case histories of workers who have lost their jobs either for refusing to submit to such tests or on the basis of the "conclusions" of the polygraph operators that they were not telling the truth.

All of these factors, the study concluded, are "cause for alarm." It urged a total ban of the devices, even in "so-called national security cases."

Convention Resolutions Considered by Council

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council acted on 32 resolutions referred to it by the last convention of the federation, concurring with the general objectives of a half dozen and reaffirming previous AFL-CIO policy in other areas.

Following closely the recommendations of a council committee of Vice Presidents Joseph A. Beirne, James A. Suffridge and David Sullivan, the council rejected 13 resolutions, held for further study seven others, referred to other departments three additional matters and deemed no action was necessary on another.

It reaffirmed the position of the 1967 convention in dealing with a proposal on safeguarding private health, welfare and pension plans via federal legislation. This resolution dealt with fiduciary responsibility, funding, vesting and reinsurance of pension plans and was adopted, the committee noted, after a "painstaking and detailed study" by a special committee of the council.

No new facts have been developed since the adoption of the 1967 resolution "that would indicate any significant change in the consensus of views of affiliated unions, the committee said, recommending that the issue be kept under continuing review.

The council concurred in general terms with a resolution on picket lines after approving substitute language declaring that affiliates which secure contractual clauses protecting members who honor lawful picket lines are to be commended. It approved with amendments another resolution urging affiliates and their members to patronize unionized banks in both personal and organizational terms.

The council concurred in the creation of the John J. Grogan Memorial Fund and recommended that "an appropriate contribution be made by the AFL-CIO" to honor the late council member and president of the Shipbuilders.

Proposals to encourage greater teenage participation in COPE, to study labor participation in the upcoming U.S. bicentennial and to urge use of organized dental laboratories were among the resolutions receiving general concurrence.

The use of civil defense personnel during labor disputes was one of the matters held over for further study and investigation.

$1 Strike Fund Rate Voted by Machinists

The Machinists announced that members voted by a 3-1 margin in a national secret-ballot referendum to raise their own payments into the strike fund from 50 cents a month to $1 a month.

Sec.-Treas. Eugene D. Glover said the vote in 1,571 local unions was 69,246 yes, 24,790 no. Increased per capita payments go into effect for the month of April to help overcome a strike fund deficit and pave the way for higher benefits.

Strike benefit payments will rise next October from $25 a week to $40. New members can qualify after three months, instead of the present six.

IAM Pres. Floyd E. Smith said the vote is a demonstration of the "determination, unity and understanding of our membership."

Labor Tells Congress:

Federal Standards Vital to Jobless Aid

Steady deterioration of the nation's federal-state unemployment system can only be halted by the adoption of strong federal standards, the AFL-CIO told Congress.

The "federal partner," the federation added, must also assume a greater role in the system by extending it to cover workers who now have no income protection for lost jobs.

The testimony was given to the Senate Finance Committee by Clinton M. Fair, an AFL-CIO legislative representative, on behalf of Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller. Fair was accompanied by James O'Brien, an assistant director of the federation's Dept. of Social Security.

The Senate committee is holding hearings on a bill passed by the House in November that would extend unemployment insurance coverage to 4.5 million additional workers.

The measure also provides for an extended period of jobless benefits during periods of high unemployment by raising the payroll tax slightly and increasing the taxable wage base.

Fair described the House bill as a "meritorious effort to improve the system, but still lacking the most essential ingredient—minimum federal standards."

He noted that when the issue of federal benefit standards received congressional attention in 1965, lawmakers were assured by opponents of such standards that states would improve their benefit structures under unemployment insurance laws.

But between that time and the end of 1969, he pointed out, the number of states paying a maximum weekly benefit of 50 percent or more of the statewide average weekly wage—a goal of the Administration — was increased by only four states to total 20.

He reiterated the AFL-CIO's call for the establishment of a minimum federal benefit standard that would assure jobless workers a weekly benefit equal to at least two-thirds of their lost pay during periods of unemployment.

The federation further urged amendments to the House bill to include a benefit standard on duration of jobless benefits, a $6,000 taxable wage base and a "completely federal" program of benefits for long-term unemployed.

The AFL-CIO said the House bill's extension of unemployment insurance benefits to cover additional workers should be strengthened to include all farm workers, domestic workers and public employes.

The additional coverage under the House bill would apply mainly to some employes of non-profit institutions, workers in small establishments and those in agricultural processing plants.

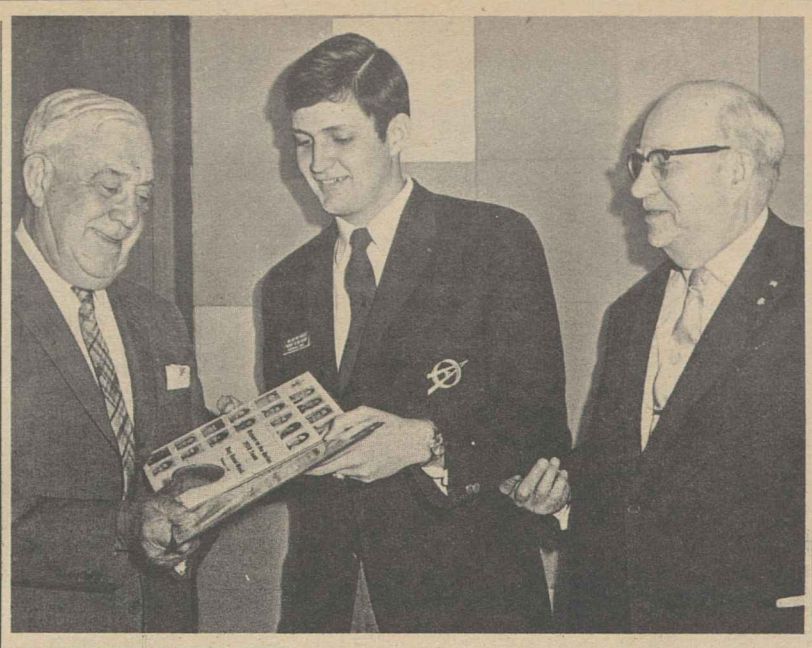
Extending coverage to all public employes, Fair said, would be in conformity with the federal government's provision of compensation protection for its employes.

As for extending coverage to farm and domestic workers, he emphasized, "Their need for unemployment insurance protection is, in many cases, greater than the need of other working people."

Crafts to Act On Problems In Construction

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. is working on a program to strengthen the competitive position of union contractors and skilled union craftsmen.

The program will be drafted by presidents of nine affiliated unions in the department, said BCTD Pres. C. J. Haggerty.



Members of the "summit committee" are Russell K. Berg of the Boilermakers; Charles H. Pillard, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; M. A. Hutcheson, Carpenters; S. Frank Raftery, Painters; Edward F. Carlough, Sheet Metal Workers; Peter T. Schoemann, Plumbers & Pipe Fitters; Peter Fosco, Laborers; R. Wayne Williams, Elevator Constructors, and John H. Lyons, Iron Workers. Haggerty will serve as chairman.

The committee was established by the 17 union presidents of the building trades department.

It was set up after the presidents met with representatives of the National Constructors Association, who asked for joint action by the unions and union contractors in tackling situations affecting the construction industry.

Topics included in the program will be seasonality, scheduling of work by contractors, adequate supply of skilled manpower, work stoppages and productivity.

The BCTD and the NCA have agreed to meet again within 60 days.

SCOUTING REPORT—including an expression of thanks to the AFL-CIO and its affiliates for support and assistance to the Boy Scouts of America—is presented to the federation by Explorer Scout William Von Forrest. Accepting the report are AFL-CIO Vice Presidents Joseph Keenan, left, and Richard Walsh. Explorer Scout Von Forrest is the son of a United Transportation Union member from Pocatello, Idaho.

Nationwide Contract Signed With Schrafft's

Cincinnati—The Hotel & Restaurant Employes capped a five-year organizing drive by winning a national agreement covering all directly-operated food, beverage, hotel and motel operations of Schrafft's, Inc. outside the Greater New York area.

The new pact extends union contract coverage for an additional 3,000 union employment positions. Not included are operations in New York, where Restaurant Local 11 of the same international union has a separate agreement for 5,000 Schrafft's employes.

Affected by the settlement are Schrafft locations in Bal Harbour and Fort Lauderdale, Fla.; Newark, Del.; Philadelphia, Jenkintown and Monroeville, Pa.; Buffalo, Niagara Falls and Hempstead, Long Island, N.Y.; Providence, R.I.; Troy, Mich., and Atlanta, Ga.

Employes at other locations will be affected by the new compact after all state and federal legal requirements have been met, the union said.

The agreement was signed at Fort Lauderdale by union Pres. Ed S. Miller and Vice Pres. Raymond J. Markey of the Frank G. Shattuck Co., parent company of Schrafft's.

Miller also announced the successful completion of negotiations on a contract covering 800 employes of the new Regency Hyatt House in Atlanta. The contract with Local 151 provides gains in wages, hours and working conditions, and a new health and welfare program, all effective Feb. 1.

The union won a National Labor Relations Board election at the Atlanta establishment nearly 18 months ago. Management challenged the result without success and finally agreed to contract terms after local union committees and the international union organizing staff consolidated the election victory.

Miller predicted that the agreement should spur the organization of additional hotel, restaurant, cafeteria and tavern workers in the Atlanta area.

Morse Named Arbitrator for Cloak Industry

David A. Morse has been chosen impartial chairman of the New York cloakmaking industry, to arbitrate disputes under a contract covering 40,000 members of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

Union and industry leaders offered the post to Morse shortly after he announced his resignation as director-general of the International Labor Organization, effective May 31. Morse served in the ILO post for nearly 22 years and is a former under secretary of labor and National Labor Relations Board counsel.

He will succeed Arthur J. Goldberg, former Supreme Court justice and ambassador to the United Nations. Goldberg who held the post since mid-1968, has resigned because of the pressures of other obligations.

The post of impartial chairman was established in 1910 under the "protocol of peace" which ended a historic 10-week strike by New York cloakmakers. It was first held by Louis Brandeis, later to become a Supreme Court justice, and subsequently by a series of prominent public figures.

ILGWU Pres. Louis Stulberg predicted that Morse will carry on "the noble tradition" of his predecessors. And Henoch Mendelsund, manager of the ILG's Cloak Joint Board, said Morse's background and proven ability "ensure that he will make a most meaningful contribution toward preserving and strengthening peaceful relations in our industry."

Top officials of trade associations representing coat and suit employers joined in the selection.

Union Bargainers Weigh Westinghouse Proposal

and Westinghouse management have been negotiating since September. No major progress toward settlement was made while the GE strike continued, but the pace stepped up after the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers and other unions voted to accept the GE contract proposal.

The value of the GE package of benefits was put at $1.05 an hour over the 40-month term of new contracts. It contained 53 cents more an hour in direct wages, 7 cents for pension improvements, 4 cents for skilled trades classifications, 12.8 cents in insurance and vacation improvements, paid days off, hospitalization and other gains.

Added Money

Union economists added 7 cents for the "snowball" effect on costs of such benefits as vacation pay.

The Coordinated Bargaining Committee at GE reported this week that "GE is just about wrapped up" as to contract ratifications.

The Machinists said all except three small IAM locals have settled their contract differences with GE and have reported for work at reopened plants. The three are at Bloomington, Ill., York, Pa., and Houston, Tex.

At the Evendale, O., jet engine plant, the CBC said all units but the Plant Guards have ratified the GE offer. The guards continued to work without a contract.

Machinists Lodge 1669 in Utica, N.Y., turned down the proposed contract originally but later voted 790-93 to return to work.

Most of the local IAM settlements were reached when GE management agreed to a uniform callback date and agreed to drop all disciplinary charges against strikers.

Only two unions, the IUE and the United Electrical Workers, negotiate national pacts with GE. After they settled, several smaller unions continued picketing while they pursued a settlement of local issues.

Council Cites Two Who Died In Colombia

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Two union men who lost their lives in Colombia on a union-to-union mission were on a final assignment in careers devoted to the betterment of mankind, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said in a statement.

The council expressed sympathy to the families of the late B. R. Ramey, secretary-treasurer of Pasadena, Tex., Local 4-367 and Al Chandler, secretary-treasurer of Long Beach, Calif., Local 1-128, both of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers. They were on assignment for the Dept. of State on recommendation of their union, visiting union members when they were killed in a traffic accident Jan. 26 near Baranquilla.

A resolution said the two "outstanding leaders of the OCAW gave their lives in service to their union, their country and the cause of world-wide democratic trade unionism."

ADOPTION OF PLANS for a national conference on occupational health and safety this coming fall and discussions of legislative programs highlighted sessions of the executive council of the Building & Construction Trades Dept. in Bal Harbour, Fla.

School Segregation Issue:

Dixie Senators Win On Civil Rights Test

With both sides claiming the blessings of the White House, the Senate adopted a Mississippi senator's proposal aimed at reducing federal pressure to desegregate southern schools which had originally been segregated by state and local laws.

Its sponsor, Sen. John C. Stennis (D-Miss.), termed the 56-36 vote "a turning point." It was the first victory in many years for Southern senators on a civil rights issue. Earlier, a substitute intended to defang the Stennis amendment narrowly lost, 48-46.

At issue was whether the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare should continue to make the distinction the federal courts have made between school segregation stemming from unconstitutional laws and de facto segregation resulting from residential patterns of predominantly black or white neighborhoods.

HEW guidelines, backed up by the power to withhold federal funds, have been aimed at segregation by law—primarily in the South but also including some gerrymandered school districts in the North, where boundaries have been drawn along racial lines.

Stennis Amendment

The Stennis amendment would require all sections of the nation to be treated alike in HEW desegregation guidelines—in itself a noncontroversial statement. But it includes the key phrase, "without regard to the origin or cause of such segregation."

The narrowly-defeated substitute, proposed by Senate Republican Leader Hugh Scott (Pa.), stated that federal guidelines would be applied uniformly "in dealing with unconstitutional conditions of segregation."

Ironically, it was the votes of a few liberals sensitive to charges of "hypocrisy" by northerners which tipped the scales against the Scott substitute and for the Stennis amendment. Sen. Abraham A. Ribicoff (D-Conn.) was the first to ally himself with Stennis, and Senate Democratic Leader Mike Mansfield voted with him on the two issues.

The Leadership Conference on Civil Rights strongly opposed the Stennis amendment, warning that it could "cripple enforcement" of Title VI of the Civil Rights Act, which bars federal funds from discriminatory programs.

The White House position appeared to shift from day-to-day, starting with an implication that Pres. Nixon approved the goals of the Stennis proposal and ending with a letter from Bryce Harlow, counselor to the President, saying that the Administration "preferred" the Scott amendment but "other approaches" would be acceptable as well and noting that the President had indicated "support of the concept" of the Stennis amendment.

As a result, Scott was unable to carry a majority of Republicans with him—either in support of his substitute or in opposition to the Stennis amendment.

The Scott susbstitute was supported by 28 Democrats and 18 Republicans; it was opposed by 26 Democrats and 22 Republicans.

Voting for the Stennis amendment were 29 Democrats and 27 Republicans; opposed were 24 Democrats and 12 Republicans.

While the Senate continued its debate on the basic aid to education bill, the House tackled once more the appropriations bill carrying funds for current education programs, health research and other activities of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, the Labor Dept. and several independent agencies.

Nixon Vetoed

The bill was vetoed by the President as too costly. He followed through with a "compromise" proposal for a $449 million increase for various programs as compared with the $1.3 billion increase in the vetoed bill.

The House Appropriations Committee boosted the amount an additional $365 million—but made the added increase virtually meaningless by proposing a change in the law to permit the President not to spend the money.

It also added two anti-civil rights provisions aimed at legalizing "freedom of choice" plans aimed at evading desegregation.

In a letter to House members, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said labor was "dismayed" with the attempt to undercut desegregation of schools set up on racial grounds.

At the prodding of House Democratic leaders, the House Rules Committee refused to grant a special rule that would allow the optional spending authority—a change in legislation—to be considered as part of the appropriations bill.

Another Veto Threatened

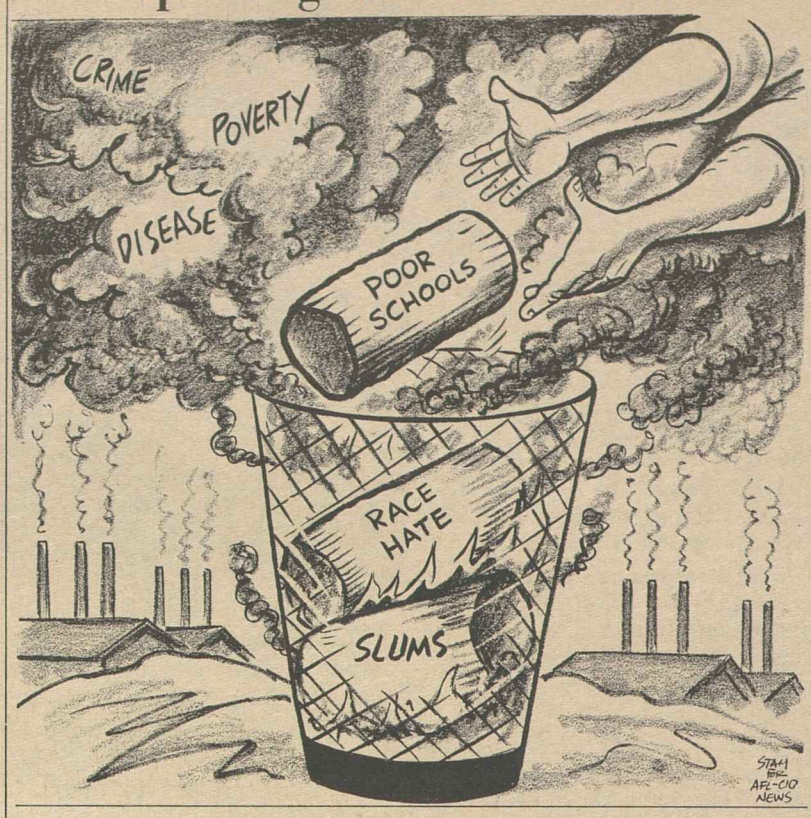
From the White House view, this changed the whole ball game. Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Robert H. Finch said the provision enabling funds to be held back was "critical" to the bill and he strongly hinted that it would be vetoed without such a provision, unless the amount of money was sharply cut back.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, the House was engaged in debating:

- A labor-supported proposal to add another $80 million to the bill.
- Labor-opposed proposals to cut the amount of education and health funds.
- Labor-supported proposals to uphold the right of the government to act against unconstitutional segregation.

1970 Census Opens Jobs for Older Persons



The 1970 Census, beginning Apr. 1, offers a "unique employment opportunity for older persons," according to the Administration on Aging in the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

Its commissioner, John B. Martin, wants older persons to know that the Census Bureau has established no age limit for hiring the 160,000 enumerators it will need.

Qualifications for enumerators are that they be a U.S. citizen, be physically fit to carry out their duties, pass an examination, be able to work the necessary hours and attend training sessions, and not be receiving pensions as retired federal employes or military officers.

Martin urges older citizens to check their newspapers, radio and television for publicity that will accompany the opening of local census offices and the hiring of enumerators.

Speaking of Pollution . . .

Court Deadline Near In Shopcraft Talks

A new court deadline approached in the railroad bargaining dispute involving 48,000 shopcraft workers as negotiations in Florida produced no signs of progress toward a settlement.

The talks between the nation's railroads and four unions—Machinists, Boilermakers, Sheet Metal Workers and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers—sought to resolve a work rule problem that has held up a settlement.

The Labor Dept., which had intervened in the negotiations, shifted them from Washington to Florida since the presidents of the unions were there for meetings of the AFL-CIO Executive Council and federation departments.

Judge John J. Sirica of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia set Friday, Feb. 20, for hearings on restraining orders he has issued in the dispute. The orders are to expire Feb. 21.

Orders Issued

He restrained the carriers from closing down all major railroads and locking out employes in retaliation for the unions' strike on a single railroad, the Union Pacific, and he restrained the strike itself.

The controversial work rule would permit limited crossings of craft lines to perform "incidental" work at certain repair-work locations.

This was believed to be the reason that members of the Sheet Metal Workers voted to reject a settlement, worked out in earlier negotiations, which also called for a wage increase of 68 cents an hour over two years.

Although members of the other three unions voted approval, it had been agreed earlier that all four must accept the pact to make it effective.

The unions have been free to strike since Dec. 3 under terms of the Railway Labor Act. However, they have consistently maintained that they would strike only one or a few railroads to avoid a national emergency.

Negotiations in a second dispute, involving 18 unions and railroad managements, also were held here without any reports of progress.

This dispute focuses on proposals by the unions for improvements in health, accident and life insurance programs, and the carriers counter-demands that the workers pay a share of the costs of programs, now financed by management.

Under the procedures of the Railway Labor Act the unions will be free to strike on Mar. 2 unless the White House intervenes to appoint an emergency board to study the dispute and make recommendations.

Employer-Paid Pension Plans Show Increase

An increasing percentage of private pension programs are noncontributory, multi-employer and vested, according to a government study.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics took a look at the provisions of 17,400 private pension plans filed with the Labor Dept., covering some 19.5 million workers.

It compared their provisions with those of the 16,000 plans filed in 1962, which covered 15.8 million workers.

In 1962, 75 percent of the workers were covered by noncontributory plans—where the full cost was borne by the employer.

Last year, the percentage was up to 80 percent.

Plans with vesting provisions —which give workers permanent pension rights after a specified number of years of employment —increased from 59 percent in 1962 to 76 percent in 1969, the BLS said.

The 1969 data showed that 87 percent of workers covered by single-employer plans had vesting rights, compared to 51 percent of workers in multi-employer plans.

The percentage of workers covered by multi-employer pension plans increased from 25 percent in 1962 to 30 percent last year.

Only plans covering 25 or more workers were considered in the BLS survey. The bureau commented that the growth in the number of workers covered by private pension plans during the seven-year period is primarily the result of higher employment in firms with pension plans, rather than to the adoption of new plans.

Council Scores NLRB Appointment, Urges Close Scrutiny by Senate

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council called upon the Senate to "closely scrutinize" the qualifications of the new nominee to the National Labor Relations Board to determine if he can administer labor law "fairly and impartially."

The council issued its statement after Pres. Nixon announced the nomination of Edward B. Miller, 47, of Chicago, a management attorney, to be an NLRB member. He would replace Sam Zagoria, a former assistant to Sen. Clifford P. Case (R-N.J.). Nixon chose not to appoint Zagoria to a new term.

The White House also said that if Miller is confirmed, he would then be named NLRB chairman, to succeed Frank W. McCulloch, whose term expires in August.

Miller is a partner in the law firm of Pope & Ballard in Chicago, which specializes in representing employers in labor-management negotiation. He told newsmen that he has never represented a union but enjoys the respect of labor leaders.

Miller has served as an employer member of the Governor's Commission on Collective Bargaining for Public Employes in Illinois. He has represented the Symphony Association in bargaining with the Musicians, and the Movers' Association in negotiations with the unaffiliated Teamsters.

The Executive Council pointed out that the NLRB is a semi-judicial agency and said its members should ideally be labor relations specialists with a neutral background — "not protagonists of either the employer or union viewpoint."

The statement noted that Democratic Presidents have usually appointed labor relations specialists but "none has ever appointed either a union or an employer lawyer."

But Pres. Eisenhower departed "from this sound practice," the council recalled, by appointing to the NLRB or as its general counsel a number of employer lawyers who were "all-out advocates" of the employer view and after brief NLRB service returned to representing employers.

Warning that the present Administration "evidently proposes to repeat this pattern," the council declared that Congress "should not permit it."

"As a needed safeguard for the future," the council said, "Congress should amend the National Labor Relations Act to forbid any member or general counsel to practice before the board for five years after leaving it."

Earlier, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany summed up labor's opposition to Miller's nomination in this way, "The job is not a place for a corporation attorney, any more than it is for a labor attorney."

Real Wages Down For 12th Month

The buying power of workers' paychecks remained below year-ago levels for the 12th consecutive month in January as prices continued to soar higher, the Labor Dept. reported.

A rise of four-tenths of 1 percent in living costs sent the Consumer Price Index to 131.8. That means goods and services valued at $100 in 1957-59 cost $131.80 in January.

The index as a whole was 6.2 percent above its level for January 1969. It was the sharpest 12-month advance in prices since the 12-month period ending in November 1951, the Bureau of Labor Statistics said.

On the earnings side, the government said gross average weekly earnings of production and non-supervisory workers dropped 81 cents between December and January to $116.81.

The decline was attributed to a half-hour reduction in the average workweek, which more than offset a 2-cent gain in average hourly pay. Adjusted for price increases, gross weekly earnings were down 1.1 percent over the month and two-tenths of 1 percent over the year.

Weekly take-home pay levels were higher in January, BLS said, but this was due to a reduction of the income tax surcharge from 10 to 5 percent at the beginning of the year.

For the worker with three dependents, weekly take-home pay increased 22 cents to $102.52. For the worker with no dependents, the increase was 78 cents to $93.95.

But the tax relief was not enough to prevent the fourth consecutive month of "erosion" in

New Approach Sought:

Nixon Welfare Plan Called 'Inadequate'

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO called for a "bold new approach" to public welfare so that needy families "can live in decency."

The federation's Executive Council took a critical look at the Nixon Administration's welfare reform proposal, crediting it for good intentions but faulting it for proposing "grossly inadequate" benefits and "unacceptable" features that would subject the poor to exploitation and leave them mired in poverty.

Under the Administration's proposals, now being considered by the House Ways & Means Committee, a family of four with no wage earner would receive a federal payment of $1,600 a year and be eligible for food stamps. States would have the option of supplementing the federal payment.

Families with very low earnings would be able to keep the first $720 a year of earned income without reduction of benefits. Thereafter, the federal payment would be reduced 50 cents for each dollar earned. Able-bodied adults, including mothers of school-age children, would be required to take jobs or job training as determined by the Labor Dept.

This would replace the present AFDC program—Aid to Families with Dependent Children.

Persons without minor children would be eligible for assistance only if they were old, blind or disabled. In those cases, the federal benefit would be $90 a month.

The Executive Council statement stressed the need for a fully federal welfare program, "with adequate payments" based solely on need. (Excerpts, Page 7.)

It said the proposed payment level of the Administration plan would provide higher payments to less than 20 percent of families now receiving AFDC benefits. "Moreover," the council noted, "since it fails to provide for periodic updating, payments might be held at present sub-poverty levels indefinitely while living costs continued to climb."

As for mandatory work and training programs for welfare recipients, the council said: "People cannot be forced into jobs that do not exist. They can't

Westinghouse Deadlock Spurs Stepped-Up Talks

Pittsburgh—Union negotiators intensified their efforts to reach contract agreement with the Westinghouse Electric Corp. and to resolve a deadlock over terms of nine pacts covering some 104,000 workers.

Unions in the AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee prepared to continue negotiations over the weekend in an effort to bring the Westinghouse offer up to parity with the strike-settling agreement with the General Electric Co.

The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, representing 40,000 Westinghouse workers, earlier turned down a company offer and set 12:01 a.m., Mar. 2, as the deadline for reaching agreement. Other unions in the CBC took similar action but continued meeting with management to head off a walkout.

The major unsettled issue is retroactivity to Nov. 9, the date that union contracts were due to expire. The date was extended on a week-to-week basis, but the nation's second largest electrical goods maker has offered retroactivity of wages and other economic terms only to

Decisive Changes In Policy Urged

By Saul Miller

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Decisive and substantial changes in national economic policy with particular attention to world trade, along with a bold new approach to public welfare, are needed in the next few years to keep America on the progressive road.

This theme, coupled with a carefully documented case for substantial gains at the bargaining table for American workers in 1970, highlighted the mid-winter sessions of the AFL-CIO Executive Council here at the Americana Hotel.

The council spelled out its views in dozens of statements and in reports prepared by standing committees. A session of the COPE Administrative Committee was dedicated to the critical need for major efforts in registration and get-out-the-vote campaigns and to other political activities in the 1970 elections.

The stakes are the survival of liberal and progressive voices in Congress, the committee emphasized. (Story, Page 4.)

The inflation question was placed directly before the council by Pres. Nixon in a letter read to the body by Labor Sec. George P. Shultz and expanded on later at a press conference held by the labor secretary.

Shultz said that, before he came to the council meeting, Pres. Nixon had told him to tell the leaders of organized labor that he would be an "activist" president and take strong measures if unemployment rises sharply.

The secretary commented, in reply to questions, that the economy is cooling off but there is no prospect of a steep rise in unemployment.

His reception by the council was courteous and friendly although there were matters of disagreement, Shultz noted, including the so-called Philadelphia Plan for hiring minority group workers on construction projects.

Shultz indicated he preferred area-wide voluntary agreements similar to those reached in Chicago and Pittsburgh but believes that the government presence is desirable and useful in the equal employment opportunity area.

The council's analysis of the state of the national economy stressed the need for change and the use of selective measures aimed at restraining specific causes of inflationary pressures.

The key element, it said, is a reduction of price pressures "without a growing army of unemployed." (Story, Page 2.)

At press conferences held to announce council actions, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany expressed fear of an increase in unemployment in the coming year and noted that workers can no longer make the sacrifice of holding back on what they are honestly entitled to in terms of wage increases as living costs soar.

The council took special note also of Nixon's policies on welfare reform. "Despite some small improvements, we cannot support the Administration's welfare proposal," the council said. The statement warned that it would leave most recipients still in poverty "and could force many of them into dead-end jobs paying substandard wages." (Story, this page.)

The council also:

- Urged the Senate to approve a bipartisan proposal to extend the 1965 Voting Rights Act as "vital" to prevent disfranchisement of southern Negroes. It said the House-passed Administration bill weakening the law would be "a disaster to the cause of civil

New Directions Asked In U.S. Trade Program

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A substantial change in U.S. policy is needed for the orderly expansion of world trade on a reciprocal basis, the AFL-CIO Executive Council was told.

A 40-page report from its Economic Policy Committee declared that U.S. government policy has failed to face up to new developments in world trade and that present policy is "more applicable to the world of the late 1940s, and 1950s, than the 1970s."

The U.S. position in world trade has deteriorated with harsh effects on workers and their communities because of new developments in the postwar years that "accelerated in the 1960s." These include the spread of managed national economies, with direct and indirect government barriers to imports and aid to exports; the internationalization of technology; the skyrocketing rise of investments by U.S. companies in foreign subsidiaries; the spread of U.S.-based multi-national corporations.

Therefore a "thorough revision of U.S. government posture and policy is required to meet present realities in world markets," the study said.

In every year since 1894 the United States has had an excess of exports over imports. But by 1968 and 1969 the surplus of merchandise exports over imports almost disappeared.

Council Elects Frank Raftery Vice President

Bal Harbour, Fla.—S. Frank Raftery, 51, president of the 200,000-member Brotherhood of Painters & Allied Trades, was elected to the AFL-CIO Executive Council here and a vice president of the federation.

Raftery fills the vacancy on the council caused by the death of Anthony J. DeAndrade, president of the Printing Pressmen.

The new council member studied labor relations at St. Louis University in the city where he was born, and served as a business agent, organizer and general representative. He was elected president of the Painters in 1965.

He is a vice president of the Building & Construction Trades and Metal Trades departments and serves on the executive board of the Industrial Union and Maritime Trades departments. He serves as a trustee of the AFL-CIO Mortgage Investment Trust and is on the labor committee on national policy of the National Planning Association. He serves also on a number of apprenticeship and trade advisory committees and research groups.

Federation Hails Barbers Week

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Union members can honor "a fine AFL-CIO affiliate" by helping observe National Barbers Week, beginning July 12, the Executive Council said.

Its statement emphasized that the Barbers "have long been a leading supporter of the union label and the union shopcard program of the AFL-CIO."

NATO Cutback Bid Seen Threat to Peace

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO warned that a "drastic cut in American troop strength in Europe at the present time" would be a "grave threat to the security of the United States, the freedom of Europe and the peace of the world."

The federation's Executive Council unanimously adopted a statement expressing strong opposition to a resolution proposed by Sen. Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.) calling for a speedy and major withdrawal of American forces from Europe.

Tracing the establishment of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) 20 years ago to block Soviet control of all Europe, the council, acting on the recommendation of the Committee on International Affairs, described the "assumptions underlying the Mansfield resolution as unrealistic and fallacious."

Its initial fallacy is that the Soviet Union "no longer harbors expansionist designs in Europe." Unfortunately, said the council, all available evidence "points to the contrary." Secondly, the belief that the Mansfield approach would lessen tension in Europe is in error and a unilateral move such as removing troops would have the opposite effect.

A third fallacy, the statement said, is that U.S. forces could be easily replaced by European forces. In effect, what would happen would be the interpretation of such a cutback as a return to isolationism which would encourage and facilitate the step-up of Soviet pressure and blackmail tactics.

The final fallacy is that improved transport facilities would enable American combat units to return speedily to Europe. This argument completely underrates the danger of planes being intercepted and landing areas destroyed.

American commitments to Europe go beyond NATO, the council pointed out, noting the moral responsibility the United States assumed under the Non-Proliferation Treaty.

It noted also that compared with 1962 there are today "almost 100,000 fewer U.S. soldiers in Europe" and that "any further major reduction would weaken our military presence to such an extent that the credibility of our commitment might be seriously questioned."

The council called on the Administration to maintain an adequate level of U.S. troop strength in Europe "as long as the Soviet threat persists and an agreement on a reciprocal and balanced troops withdrawal has not been concluded with the USSR."

Military Aid Held Vital To Israel's Self-Defense

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The United States should provide Israel "planes and other military supplies she urgently needs for self-defense and survival," the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

The vital national interests of the United States and the best hopes for world peace depend on such action by the United States "in view of the escalation of Soviet and French arms shipments to Egypt and other belligerent Arab regimes," the council said in a unanimously adopted resolution.

Despite the courage and capacities of the Israeli fighting forces, the council asserted, they are at a "tremendous disadvantage" because of the heavy military imbalance in the Middle East, estimated to be a ratio of four to one in favor of the Arab nations.

"Only the correction of this imbalance can prevent another war in the Middle East which might lead to a nuclear world conflagration," the council warned.

Reviewing the so-called big four preliminary talks and proposals, the council said that neither the Soviet Union nor France are qualified to play the "role of peacemakers." The bitter fruit of the proposed talks has been to mask Soviet rearmament of Egypt, an increase in terrorism and "further Arab-Israeli armed confrontation instead of negotiation."

For the United States to persist "in its futile quest for joint efforts with the USSR to achieve an equitable and durable settlement in the Middle East," actually hurts the cause of peace, the council said. Our government would be "well advised to seek alternative measures for promoting peace in the Middle East, the statement said, urging that world opinion be rallied to have both sides "honor fully the cease-fire arrangements they accepted in June 1967."

The United States has a "vital political as well as moral interest in helping Israel preserve her nationhood," the council warned.

"We must never forget that the very forces which preach and seek the destruction of Israel are the ones who are actively engaged in seeking to drive U.S. influence and all American interests out of the Middle East and subjecting this entire pivotal area to Soviet domination."

Edith Green Loses Bid for Committee

Rep. Edith Green (D-Ore.) has been rebuffed in her bid to bypass the House Education & Labor Committee and have herself named chairman of a new Select Committee on Education to "oversee" the administration of federal education programs.

Mrs. Green has frequently been allied with House Republicans on education issues, backing "no strings" grants to states in contrast to having funds earmarked for specific programs. Her bid for a new committee had Republican support but was strongly opposed by Democratic members of the Education & Labor Committee and by the AFL-CIO.

By an 8-7 vote, the House Rules Committee put off action on her resolution to set up a select committee—in effect pigeonholing it.

TWUA Wins Fight For Jobs, Back Pay

Elkin, N. C.—A four-year battle was won here by the Textile Workers Union of America when Chatham Manufacturing Co. paid $223,912 to 34 former employes illegally fired for union activities.

At the direction of the National Labor Relations Board, the firm rehired 17 of the involved workers in 1969 and it has offered reinstatement to the remaining 17. The illegal discharges occurred in 1966 and 1967.

The highest single award went to Hazel Gaither who was among the first fired. She received $16,650.

Unemployment Mounts:

Labor Urges Action To Bolster Economy

Bal Harbour, Fla.—"A decisive change in national economic policy" is needed to slow the rise in prices "without a growing army of unemployed," the AFL-CIO Executive Council said.

The council charged that the Administration's policy of "severe economic restraint" isn't working.

Tight money and high interest rates have had a "devastating impact on homebuilding" but haven't halted the inflationary expansion of business investment in new plants and machines, the council noted.

"Skyrocketing interest rates . . . in the guise of fighting inflation" have themselves been a major cause of higher prices.

And after more than a year of the Administration's economic medicine, "America is now confronted by both an economic slump and rapidly rising prices." (Excerpts from statement, Page 6.)

The council cited the mounting evidence of an economic downturn—higher unemployment, cuts in working hours and weekly earnings, a lack of sufficient job opportunities for a growing labor force.

Warning Sounded

It warned that the impact of rising unemployment falls hardest on the least skilled, the most recently hired and young people.

"The government's programs to encourage employment of the hard-core jobless, especially minority-group workers, are being undermined and threatened with destruction," the council stressed.

A change in policy is needed "without delay," it declared. "Selective measures, aimed at restraining the specific causes of inflationary pressures, should be adopted. Homebuilding—particularly low- and middle-income housing — should be provided with immediate federal assistance."

Among specific measures, the Executive Council urged:

- Direct restraints by the Federal Reserve System on inflationary business loans for new plant and equipment.
- Federal curbs on business mergers which are concentrating economic power in "a narrowing group of giant companies and banks."
- A congressional review of monetary machinery and policies "to achieve much-needed reform."
- Practical, selective steps to hold down sharply rising costs of physician fees, hospital charges, auto and property insurance and housing costs.

The council stressed the need for "immediate assistance" to homebuilding, warning that high interest and mortgage rates have put decent housing "out of the reach of even middle-income working people" as well as intensifying the serious shortage of low-income housing.

To meet this crisis, the council said:

"The federal government should provide direct loans for the creation of low- and moderate-income housing.

"Congress should direct the Federal Reserve to buy up to $5 billion of government-guaranteed housing obligations.

"A portion of the GI Life Insurance Fund should be earmarked for veterans' mortgage loans at reasonable interest rates.

"Congress should require that a portion of bank trust accounts, including pension funds, should be invested in government-guaranteed mortgages to qualify for tax exemption."

The council reiterated the AFL-CIO's position that, if the President determines that controls are necessary, labor will cooperate "so long as such restraints are equitably placed on all costs and incomes—including all prices, profits, dividends, rents and executive compensation, as well as employes' wages and salaries."

New Directions Sought For U.S. Trade Policy

Foreign trade, the study noted, accounts for only a small portion of the total U.S. economy with exports accounting for about 3.5 to 4.5 percent of the gross national product and imports accounting "for a roughly similar percent of total national production." Exports and imports are important to specific industries and product lines.

After a thorough and documented review of changing trade patterns and trends, the study concludes that "old textbook theories about international trade have become increasingly obsolete." It noted that attempts to explain deterioration of the U.S. trade balance in terms of differences in hourly wage rates or overall labor costs between the United States and other countries are not always complete, that buyers do not purchase wage rates, they buy products at a price and that can be importantly affected by profit margins, costs of raw materials and energy as well as the cost of labor per unit.

Product design, the study pointed out, is "of great importance in the export and import of many items. Other non-price, competitive factors in world trade include patent and licensing arrangements and the servicing of foreign-purchased equipment."

The choice in revising trade policy, the study stressed, is not free trade vs. protectionism but an effort to face up to the need to move ahead with an orderly expansion of world trade as a two-way street and the development of realistic policies to deal with foreign investment of U.S. firms and multi-national corporations.

A battery of policies and mechanisms is needed "to make it possible to get at the varied causes of the specific problems that affect different groups of workers in different industries. Different groups of workers are adversely affected by differing sets of trade problems and require different combinations of remedies."

The study added that "each affiliated union, expert in the conditions of workers in its jurisdiction, should press for the specific policies and mechanisms it wishes to apply—while the AFL-CIO seeks adoption of the needed battery of policies and mechanisms to handle varying and differing sets of problems."

rights." (Story, this page.)

● Called for "immediate, effective controls" of fees charged by doctors and nursing homes under Medicare and Medicaid. A Senate staff report cited price-gouging by doctors to the point where the programs are in "serious financial trouble." (Story, Page 5.)

● Declared that federal employes are entitled to a promised comparability pay raise and said the AFL-CIO will "fight vigorously" to see that they get it. The Administration has proposed delaying an already overdue comparability increase until 1971 so that its proposed budget will show a surplus. (Story, Page 4.)

● Asked "major improvements" in social security benefits, with a contribution from the federal government in addition to worker and employer payments. (Story, Page 5.)

On foreign trade, an extensive report from the federation's Economic Policy Committee declared the United States has failed to face up to new developments in world trade. It said new, modern policies are needed to make trade a two-way street without causing injury and harm to American communities and their workers. (Story, Page 1.)

In the area of international affairs, the council also:

● Warned that a drastic cut in American troop strength in Europe would present a "grave threat to the security of the United States, the freedom of Europe and the peace of the world." It said the assumptions underlying a resolution by Sen. Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.) calling for a pullout from Europe are "unrealistic and fallacious." (Story, Page 2.)

● Expressed "deep concern" over continuing cuts in U.S. foreign aid funds, warning that "our nation's prosperity cannot have a lasting foundation in a world plagued by massive poverty." (Story, Page 4.)

● Backed a call for emergency aid to the people of Nigeria with a $5,000 contribution and pledged to cooperate with Nigeria's free trade union movement in rehabilitation programs. (Story, Page 4.)

● Called on the United States government to provide Israel with the planes and military supplies urgently needed "for self-defense and survival." Israel must be able to defend itself "in view of the escalation of Soviet and French arms shipments to Egypt and other belligerent Arab regimes." (Story, Page 2.)

● Pledged full support to the efforts of the American Red Cross "to gain humane treatment for U.S. prisoners of war in North Viet Nam." It said the free world has been shocked by North Viet Nam's "inhumane treatment" of prisoners of war. (Story, this page.)

● Expressed "warm appreciation" to David A. Morse, who resigned after 22 years as director general of the International Labor Organization. (Story, Page 12.)

On matters affecting the trade union movement, the council elected S. Frank Raftery, president of the Brotherhood of Painters & Allied Trades, an AFL-CIO vice president and council member to succeed the late Anthony J. DeAndrade, president of the Pressmen. (Story, Page 2.)

It adopted statements dealing with continued support of the farm workers' long strike, warned of raids by the so-called independent National Association of Government Employes and noted the continuing success of the federation's Internal Disputes Plan.

It set the next meeting of the council for May in Washington with the date to be selected by the executive officers. The Economic Policy committee, headed by Vice Pres. I. W. Abel, announced that background sessions with Administration leaders on major economic issues would be held Apr. 13-15 at White Sulphur Springs, W. Va.

Meany announced that an existing council committee created to meet with Labor Dept. officials on the operations of the Landrum-Griffin Act would be actively looking into a number of matters. It is now headed by Vice Pres. Hunter P. Wharton and includes Vice Presidents Joseph A. Beirne, Floyd E. Smith, I. W. Abel, Lee W. Minton and David Sullivan.

A special committee was named by Meany to look into the formation of the Lyndon B. Johnson School of Public Affairs at the University of Texas. The committee is made up of Vice Presidents Abel, Joseph D. Keenan and Louis Stulberg.

The council voted contributions of varying amounts to the National Council of Senior Citizens; the John Grogan Memorial Fund, which will work for expansion of a Hoboken, N.J., Hospital; the United Church of Christ to promote fairness in broadcasting; Conference for Economic Progress; National Housing Conference; Citizens Committee for Peace and Freedom in Viet Nam; Group Health Association of America; National Institute for Rehabilitation and Health Services; a Workers Defense League-A. Philip Randolph Institute program of training and upgrading.

It had earlier voted funds for Nigerian relief as well as continuing appropriations for the operations of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, African-American Labor Center—including help in furnishing a new labor center in Addis Ababa and impact programs—and the Asian-American Free Labor Institute.

PROJECTS of the National Alliance of Businessmen to employ workers from minority groups were reported on to the AFL-CIO Executive Council by Paul W. Kayser, NAB executive vice chairman. Kayser, center, is shown with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland and P. L. Siemiller, standing, former Machinists' president and now labor liaison representative with NAB.

Disputes Plan Success Laid To Mediation

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The operation of the AFL-CIO Internal Disputes Plan is continuing successfully, the Executive Council was told, with 60 percent of complaints settled at the mediation level.

In 1969 there were 119 complaints filed under the plan with two more for the first month of 1970 bringing the total since 1962 to 967. Of these, 581 were settled in mediation or mediation is still in progress. The impartial umpires have found violations of Article XX of the AFL-CIO Constitution setting up the disputes plan in 242 cases.

Sixty-seven complaints of noncompliance with the determinations were received by a special council subcommittee. Compliance was achieved in 36 cases, non-compliance found in 16, eight cases were withdrawn and seven cases are pending.

Under Section 14 of Article XX sanctions are in effect on the Air Line Pilots Association, International Leather Goods, Plastics & Novelty Workers, National Maritime Union, Brotherhood of Railway Carmen and the International Typographical Union.

Farm Workers Get Renewed Support

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Labor will continue to support the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee "every inch of the way" in its valiant fight for the right to have a union, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

That means the "complete and wholehearted support of the entire labor movement" for the continuing boycott of non-union California grapes, a council statement pointed out.

The council also made a promise to growers who negotiate agreements with UFWOC—"that we will promote the sale of grapes produced by union workers—union label grapes—while we continue to support the boycott of scab grapes."

Hanoi Policy On Prisoners Held Inhumane

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Labor has pledged its fullest support to the American Red Cross in its "important and vital campaign to gain humane treatment for U.S. prisoners of war in North Viet Nam."

An AFL-CIO Executive Council statement pointed out that North Viet Nam has refused to abide by the 1949 Geneva Convention on the treatment of prisoners of war, despite the fact that Hanoi signed the convention.

Further, it charged, North Viet Nam has refused to provide the names of prisoners, guarantee them adequate diet and medical care, give them their mail or allow neutral Red Cross teams to visit prison camps.

This "inhumane treatment by the North Vietnamese has shocked the entire free world" and has led the International Red Cross to "unanimously call upon Hanoi to end its deplorable practices," the council said.

"We support the efforts of the American Red Cross," the council concluded, "and will do all we can to help American prisoners of war and their families, who have our deepest sympathies."

Senate Urged to Extend '65 Voting Rights Act

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Extension of the 1965 Voting Rights Act is "vital" to protection of the civil rights of southern Negroes, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said.

The council urged the Senate to adopt a bipartisan proposal to extend the law an additional five years and called for defeat of a House-passed Administration bill that would dilute the law and cripple its enforcement.

Voting rights legislation is scheduled to reach the Senate floor Mar. 1 and the Executive Council announced its support of an amendment drawn up by Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) and Sen. Hugh Scott (R-Pa.). The Hart-Scott proposal would:

● Extend the Voting Rights Act unchanged an additional five years. The law, which paved the way for more than 800,000 black Americans in the South to become registered voters, otherwise will expire in August.

● Include two relatively noncontroversial provisions of the Administration bill—a nationwide ban on literacy tests as a requirement for voting and easing of residency requirements for voting in presidential elections.

The 1965 law has been described as "the most successful civil rights law ever enacted," the council noted, and its continuation should be non-controversial.

"Unfortunately," the council said, "the Administration deliberately sought to use this important law as another weapon in its 'southern strategy.'"

The council statement termed Atty. Gen. John N. Mitchell the leader in the drive to "sabotage" the law, "with the full cooperation of the White House and House Minority Leader Gerald R. Ford."

It said a coalition of Republicans and Southern Democrats won a narrow 208-203 victory in the House for the Administration bill. One of its key provisions eliminates the present requirement that states which have discriminated in the past must obtain federal approval before changing their election laws.

"Passage of the Administration substitute by the Senate would be a disaster to the cause of civil rights," the AFL-CIO charged. "In the name of political expediency, millions of Americans—once again—would find their voting rights denied."

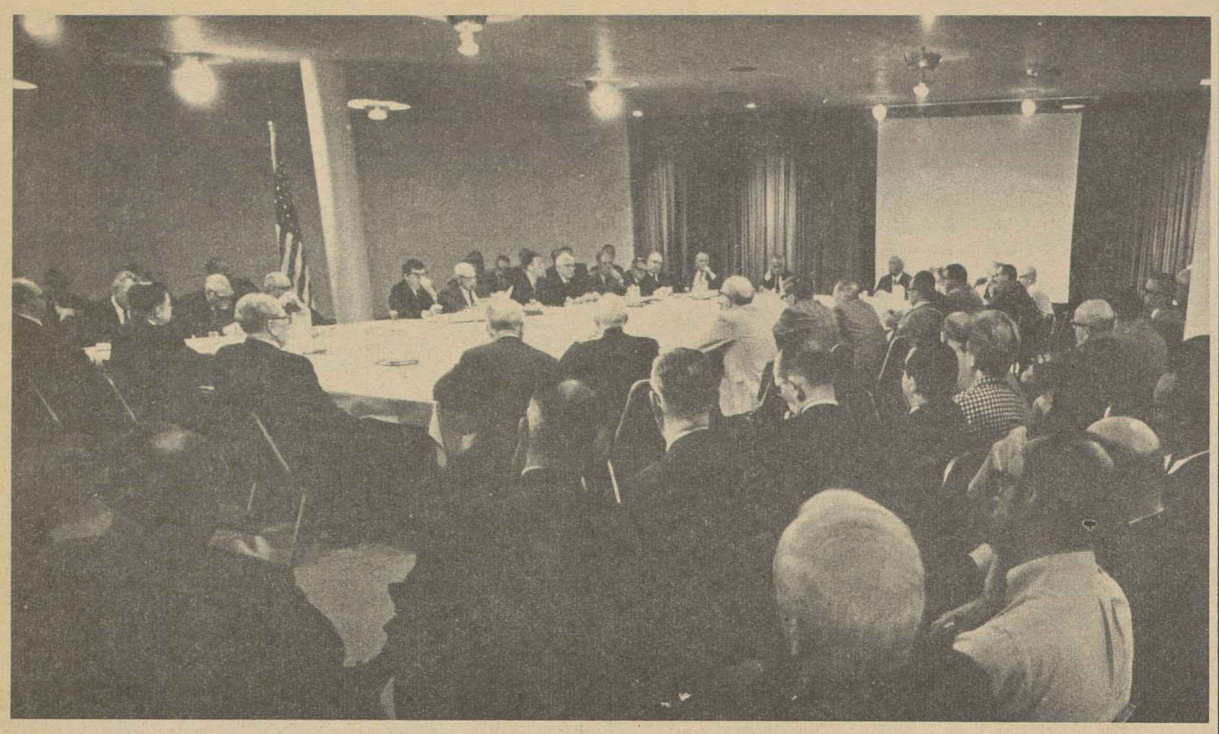
Calling on the Administration to get behind the Hart-Scott proposal, the council said that to do otherwise "would be to prove without question that the Executive Branch of the government is more interested in pursuing the 'southern strategy' votes than in the right to vote for all its citizens."

Results Cited In Efforts to Aid Minorities



Bal Harbour, Fla.—AFL-CIO civil rights programs "have shown significant results," the federation's Executive Council was told.

The review of policies by newly named Civil Rights Committee Chairman Frederick O'Neal shows the development of affirmative action programs to end discrimination, the council heard in a report on the Dept. of Civil Rights by its director Donald Slaiman.

The elimination of segregated locals, opening of apprenticeship opportunities to minority group youths, involving minority group trade unionists in the policy-making process, providing equal benefits of union membership to all workers regardless of race or national origin—all of these have received greater effort and attention from affiliates, the report said.

There is no slowdown in organizing minority group workers or in expanding the opportunities for those already in unions, and "the American labor movement has had no second thoughts on the value of integration and the elimination of segregation."

Implementation of present civil rights laws, the state of the national economy and confusion among some liberal and civil rights groups on the goal of integration are all present causes for concern, the report pointed out.

SUBJECT IS POLITICS, and specifically the 1970 elections, as the Administrative Committee of COPE meets during a break in the AFL-CIO Executive Council sessions at Bal Harbour, Fla. Labor's effectiveness in the election was seen as crucial to hopes for progressive legislation in Congress and the states.

COPE 'Determined':

'Tough' Fight Seen In Elections Drive

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The 1970 congressional elections are going to be "tough," but the AFL-CIO is going to put up a determined fight to elect its friends in both houses. And it is convinced that the fight can and will be won.

"We are entering the campaign in a determined mood," said Albert J. Zack, AFL-CIO public relations director at a press briefing following a meeting of the COPE administrative committee. "We are not at all impressed with the idea that the liberal cause in the United States has come to a dead end."

COPE—the federation's Committee on Political Education—enters the campaign, according to Pres. George Meany, in "its best shape yet" to carry out its registration and get-out-the-vote drive than it ever has been. COPE Dir. Al Barkan, in a report to the administrative committee of COPE, said that its registration preparations are ahead of any previous year.

Barkan did not minimize the difficulties of the 1970 election. He noted that the "arithmetic" of the election makes it of particular importance to labor since 75 or 80 key seats are at stake in the House and about 20 in the Senate.

Many of these seats are filled by young newcomers to Congress elected during the past four years, he noted, adding that they will be up against tough competition this year and will need all the help that organized labor can give them.

A second problem, as outlined by Zack, is a disappointing showing among union members' registered for the election. Studies have been completed in 14 states showing that much work still remains to be done to get union members on the voting rolls. In general they showed a union registration lower than that of the national average of 50 percent.

There are some 250,000 union members in Maryland, for example. Of these, 47.3 percent are registered, leaving a considerable margin to be registered before the national rate is attained. In California only 42.8 percent of union members are registered.

Zack said there were a number of possible explanations: the fact that a great number of union members are under the general voting age of 21, that registration is made difficult for workers in many states and that thousands of workers lose their votes because of moving from one section to another.

Zack said labor strongly deplores the tendency of voters to regard non-presidential years as "off years" and not too important.

"We would like to see the term 'off-year' disappear from the American political vocabulary," he said.

"There are no 'off-years.' The election of members of Congress and of state legislatures and municipal bodies are of the highest importance and it is our hope to persuade union members to take non-presidential elections just as seriously as they do presidential ones."

Zack said that every effort should be made to make registering and voting easy. He said the AFL-CIO believes that there ought to be a permanent, uniform, national registration list that would keep American voters constantly eligible to vote no matter how often they move.

Nixon Hit for Attempt To Delay Pay Raise

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Federal employes are entitled to a pay raise and the AFL-CIO will "fight vigorously" to see that they get it, the Executive Council declared.

The council charged Pres. Nixon with "breaking the nation's pledge and his personal promise to federal workers" by demanding that they wait an additional six months for an already overdue "comparability" pay raise.

By dropping the 5.7 percent pay raise, scheduled for July 1, from his proposed budget, the President was able to claim a thin surplus for the coming fiscal year. The "savings" accounted for $1.3 billion of the estimated $1.4 billion surplus.

"We do not believe the government should buy a budget surplus at the expense of its workers," the Executive Council said. The "pledge" of comparability "must be redeemed."

Even if the increase were paid on schedule, the council noted, it would be 15 months late.

The statement pointed out that the amount was based on a comparison of government and private industry wage scales as of March 1969, nearly a year ago. At that time, federal employes were 5.7 percent behind private industry. And even though the gap has widened substantially since then, the anticipated July 1 increase would still only be 5.7 percent.

"Now the President proposes delaying that raise another six months," the council noted, "until Jan. 1, 1971. It is an abdication of his own campaign promise to federal workers to cut down the comparability gap. Instead he now would put the wages of postal and classified workers 21 months behind comparability."

The labor movement, the statement pledged, will battle "in support of federal workers so they will get the raise they were promised and on which they have relied."

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The continuing cut in foreign aid funds is a "distressing manifestation of the growing neo-isolationist" trend in the country, is curtailing the already inadequate assistance to the developing nations and harming the prospects for peace, the AFL-CIO declared.

The Executive Council warned that this trend is harmful to the best interests of the American people. "We view with deep concern the desperate needs of the two-thirds of humanity who are poor. Our nation's prosperity cannot have a lasting foundation in a world plagued by massive poverty."

The council reaffirmed its vigorous opposition to "all moves, under whatever guise, to weaken or eliminate the Agency for International Development by 'restructuring it' in any manner which would tend to deprive it of its vital functions."

The need in all the underdeveloped nations whether in Latin America, Africa or Asia, is for "a literate, skilled and healthy work force" in addition to technicians, etc. Hence, said the council, "the great importance of responsible effective free trade unions in nation-building."

The council cited the contributions, despite rather limited resources, of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, the African-American Labor Center and the Asian-American Free Labor Institute.

The statement also underscored the gap within developing countries between the "privileged few and the impoverished great mass of the people," and said that the development of international fair labor standards is, therefore, the indispensable first requirement for overcoming the poverty gap."

Labor Pledges Aid to Nigerian War Victims

Bal Harbour, Fla.—All-out economic and social assistance to the people of Nigeria to be distributed equitably and speedily was called for by the AFL-CIO.

It backed its statement with an immediate $5,000 contribution for Nigerian relief.

Now that the tragic war is over, the Executive Council said, "maximum speedy aid to the victims is most urgent. At the same time it is vital to reinforce Nigerian national unity through massive programs of rehabilitation and reconstruction of the war-torn country."

American labor pledged to assist these efforts in cooperation with the free trade union movement in Nigeria—the United Labor Congress of Nigeria.

The council called on the U.S. government and the American people to channel all assistance to the Nigerian people "through the legitimate recognized national institutions of the country," to assure effective aid and strengthening of the forces of Nigerian "national unity and democracy."

Raids by 'Independent' Termed Attack on All

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO pledged its full strength and support to any federation affiliate raided by a so-called independent union, the National Association of Government Employes.

The federation's Executive Council adopted a statement taking note of raids by NAGE on "many AFL-CIO unions which have established representation rights for federal workers."

The council did not spell out the various raids but a number have been reported at shipyards and similar federal installations. They include two raids that failed for lack of employe interest—at the Philadelphia Navy Yard last year and the Portsmouth, N.H., Navy Yard about two years ago.

The AFL-CIO Coordinated Committee on Organizing Federal Employes has filed formal protests with the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of Labor against the conduct of an election petitioned for by NAGE at the Norfolk, Va., Naval Shipyard.

The election result was protested on the ground that NAGE used "fraudulent and deceitful tactics" in getting permission for the election among 7,800 blue collar workers represented since 1923 by the 5th Naval District Metal Trades Council, AFL-CIO.

Noting that these raids are divisive and weaken the organized effectiveness of workers, the Executive Council stressed it wanted to make its position clear to NAGE "or any other union outside the ranks of the AFL-CIO: We consider a raid against any union of the AFL-CIO as a raid against the AFL-CIO itself. We pledge the full strength of the AFL-CIO will be used to support any AFL-CIO affiliate raided by any outsider."

Murphy to Retire As N.J. President

Newark — Vincent J. Murphy, who has served as president of the New Jersey State AFL-CIO since 1961, has announced his retirement from the post, effective Mar. 1.

Murphy, a former mayor of Newark, had been secretary-treasurer of the predecessor State Federation of Labor for 28 years. He is a member of the Plumbers.

Under the state organization's constitution, Sec.-Treas. Charles H. Marciante will summon the executive board within 20 days to name a successor to serve until June, when new officers will be elected by the state convention.

Wayne Morse Declines To Run for House Seat

Former Sen. Wayne Morse announced that he will not run for an Oregon congressional seat now held by Republican John Dellenback despite the urging of many supporters.

Morse said that polls indicated that divisions among Democrats in the district have not healed and that he would not be able to unite the party behind him.

Text of Nixon's Letter To Executive Council

Following is the text of a letter from Pres. Nixon to the Executive Council at its winter meeting:

Greetings to the members of the AFL-CIO Executive Council as you meet to discuss and seek solutions to our economic and social problems.

Over one hundred years ago Abraham Lincoln said: "Labor is the great source from which nearly all, if not all, human comforts and necessities are drawn." The central social and economic questions of our time are: can we as a free people make that source available to those who have been denied its use and can we maintain a stable economy that will enable all workers to purchase those "comforts and necessities" without the cruel, hidden tax of inflation?

This Administration says we must—and we can. The unskilled and unemployed American must be provided training and job opportunities; the workingman must know the dollar he earns is not being secretly eaten away by inflation even as he earns it. These are not merely economic issues. They are, fundamentally, moral issues. It is as immoral to stop a man from getting a job for which he is qualified as it is to allow a worker to be robbed of his money by inflation.

I know you and all the members of the AFL-CIO share these goals, for they are goals of decency and respect for workingmen everywhere. Working together, I know we can attain these goals. It is my hope that out of your deliberations come solutions that help America confront the problems of the Seventies with the determination and common sense typical of the American workingman.

'Patchwork' Not Enough:

Improved Social Security Held Essential for Elderly

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Congress must enact "bold reform and not patchwork" legislation to provide the nation's elderly "with the dignified secure retirement they deserve," the AFL-CIO declared.

The federation's Executive Council urged quick action on "major improvements" in social security and Medicare proposed in bills introduced by Rep. Jacob H. Gilbert (D-N.Y.) and Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.).

On social security, a council statement called for an immediate 20 percent across-the-board increase in benefits (including the 15 percent enacted in late 1969) to be followed by an additional 20 percent increase in two years.

Thereafter, the council said, benefits should be adjusted in accordance with an appropriate measure of increases in wage levels "so beneficiaries can participate in the increased standard of living they made possible."

"A cost of living mechanism would be a good first step only if it is clear public policy that benefits will be adjusted upward periodically in addition to cost of living adjustments," the council said.

Its program also called for:

- Increasing the minimum benefit to $90 for a single person and $135 for a couple with a further increase in 1972 to $120 and $180 respectively. The present minimums are $64 for a single person and $96 for a couple.
- Improvements in widows' benefits; higher benefits for those who retire before age 65; permitting a retiree's benefits to be based upon his highest 10 years' earnings out of any 15 consecutive years after 1950.
- Raising the amount of income a person can earn and still get full social security benefits; increasing the lump-sum death payment from $225 to $500; and improvements in disability benefits.
- Elimination of the requirement that men who retire at 62 must compute their average earnings by including years up to 65—a requirement that lowers retirement benefits excessively.
- Ending deductions from assistance payments for recipients whose incomes are so low that their social security benefits must be supplemented by public assistance, as well as ending deductions for injured workers receiving workmen's compensation.
- Financing the medical insurance part of Medicare, now paid for partly by the retiree, through contributions paid during the beneficiary's working years, in the same way hospital insurance is now financed.
- Expansion of the present insurance coverage under Medicare to include the cost of prescription drugs, and expansion of the entire program to include persons under 65 who are receiving disability benefits through social security.
- Increasing the earnings base on which social security taxes are paid from its present $7,800 level to $9,000 immediately and $15,000 in 1972.

Increasing the general revenue contribution to social security gradually until the federal government is paying one-third of the costs of the present employer-employe paid program.

The council expressed gratification that Congress enacted a 15 percent across-the-board increase in social security benefits last year, but emphasized that lawmakers recognized that much greater improvements were needed.

"Enactment of the 15 percent increase," the statement concluded, "must not be an end but only the beginning of action by Congress in the whole area of social security reform and improvements."

MEMBERSHIP CARD in the Newspaper Guild is presented to Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.) by ANG Sec.-Treas. Robert M. Crocker, left, who also hails from Maine. Muskie now writes a syndicated column. When he applied for Guild membership, Muskie congratulated Crocker on his recent election to the ANG office, noting: "It is good to know that a man from Maine can win national elections."

New Approach Sought For Welfare Program

take training programs that aren't functioning or put their children in day care centers that haven't been built."

And the working poor will still be poor, the council stressed, unless the minimum wage is increased and employers are required to pay decent wages. "For those who cannot obtain private employment, we need a large-scale public service employment program providing well-planned, useful jobs paying at least the statutory minimum wage."

The Executive Council urged a new approach to public welfare based on these key features:

- A federal welfare system with uniform standards of eligibility and payments no lower than the poverty level, increasing as living costs rise.
- Provision for employable welfare recipients, without children in their care, to be referred to work or work-training by the same standards used in the unemployment compensation system. Thus, there would be no referral to jobs paying substandard wages or in which a labor dispute exists.
- A requirement that employers of welfare recipients should be required to pay at least the minimum wage, as a protection against exploitation.
- Large-scale federal funding to establish day care centers for mothers who wish to work—with federal standards so that the centers will provide "an enriching experience for the children involved," not just custodial care. "In addition, other critical gaps in social services must be closed."

The council said that a substitute Senate bill comes closer to meeting the need for "a compassionate and equitable welfare program" than does the Administration proposal.

But it emphasized that "no conceivable reform of welfare can solve all of America's domestic and social ills."

More than welfare reform is necessary to provide "education, health, jobs, housing and legal services, or eradicating racial discrimination, or supplying many other unfilled social needs."

In part, the council noted, public welfare is the result of "the failures in other areas to meet human needs."

LABOR'S ROLE in the arts is discussed at the Executive Council meeting by Actors' Equity Pres. Frederick O'Neal, left, and Pres. Herman D. Kenin of the Musicians. Both are AFL-CIO vice presidents.

TWUA Asks Curb on Dust In Cotton Mills

New York—The Textile Workers Union of America has called for an "immediate" Labor Dept. inspection of cotton mills with government contracts to determine if they are spreading "brown lung" disease among employes.

The check of mills doing work under the Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act was called for by TWUA Pres. William Pollock in a letter to Labor Sec. George P. Shultz.

The determination by the department is needed at once, Pollock declared, in view of evidence of a high incidence of byssinosis, a lung disease, among workers exposed to cotton dust.

Pollock referred to a recent statement by Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Robert H. Finch that byssinosis "is a serious occupational disease that has been too long ignored in the United States."

Finch cited 1968 surveys taken in two cotton mills where it was found that up to 25 percent of the workers were suffering from byssinosis, and a third where it was found that 28 percent had symptoms of the disease.

The present "threshold limit" for cotton dust of one milligram per cubic meter of air in cotton mills, Pollock added, gives the department the authority to ascertain facts that "have not been available to government inspectors in the past."

He explained that Public Health Service investigators have been hampered by cotton mill managers who have refused to allow them on their premises.

Medical Fee Controls Pushed to Curb Abuses

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO has called for "immediate, effective controls" on fees charged by doctors and nursing homes under Medicare and Medicaid programs in light of a recent government report.

The report, prepared by the Senate Finance Committee's staff, showed that Blue Cross, Blue Shield and other medical insurance carriers have let doctors charge the programs more for specific services than the companies pay doctors on behalf of their own clients.

The report listed thousands of doctors and doctors' groups who received more than $25,000 in payments from Medicare and Medicaid in 1968, including scores who received more than $100,000.

The committee's staff, which also exposed other abuses of and defects in Medicare and Medicaid, said that reforms are urgently needed to reduce costs because the "programs are in serious financial trouble."

An AFL-CIO Executive Council statement said the report shows "how many doctors and other health providers and insurance companies have exploited weaknesses in the Medicare and Medicaid law for exorbitant financial gain."

The council noted that Medicare and Medicaid were enacted with the strong support of labor "to provide urgently needed medical care for the elderly and the poor who could not afford to pay for it out of their meager incomes."

The programs have enabled millions of Americans to obtain needed medical care and they have been "conscientiously administered" by responsible government agencies, the statement added.

But, it continued, even the conscientious administration has not been able to correct "the glaring defects in the law" that established the programs, nor has it been able to halt "gouging" by unscrupulous doctors.

Warning that high fees of physicians are adding to the programs' costs and threatening their needed expansion, the council declared, "The tide of ever-mounting medical costs must be stemmed."

"What is needed," it said, "are immediate, effective controls of doctors' fees and hospital and nursing home charges and establishment of incentives for high quality and efficiency. All are lacking in the present law."

At the same time, the council stressed that while such improvements will help the poor and elderly "they will do nothing for the rest of the population suffering from inadequate care at costs which have all but priced them out of the market."

"The Senate Finance Committee staff report," the statement said, "has emphasized what most Americans already know—health care in America is inadequate, inefficient and much too costly."

"There is just one way of curing the ills of our health care system—early enactment of national health insurance," it concluded.

In another development, an Administration spokesman told Congress that the time has come to set ceilings on doctors' bills and hospital payments under Medicare and Medicaid.

"We need changes in the law that will help control the increases in the amount that the programs will recognize in the charges of individual practitioners," said Under Sec. John G. Veneman of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

Testifying before the Senate Finance Committee, Veneman called specifically for an amendment that would limit the rate at which increases in doctors' bills would be recognized by the programs. He said fee structures could be negotiated, but if that fails, ceilings should be imposed.

Labor Dept. Seeks Safety Engineers

The Dept. of Labor announces job openings for safety engineers to help administer the new Construction Safety Act. The work will involve developing health and safety standards for the construction industry.

Applicants must be graduate engineers or have four years of progressive technical engineering experience, and they must understand industry operations and have knowledge of plant machinery design, work standards and engineering techniques.

Grades range from GS-9 through 14, with beginning salaries of $11,186 to $18,571. Applications should be submitted to the Bureau of Labor Standards, Dept. of Labor, Washington, D. C. 20210.

The National Economy

AMERICA IS NOW confronted by both an economic slump and rapidly rising prices, after more than a year of the Administration's policy of severe economic restraint, imposed in the name of combatting inflation.

Residential construction is in a deepening recession. Industrial production is declining. Sales of autos and other consumer hardgoods are moving down. Layoffs and cutbacks in working hours are spreading in numerous industries. Unemployment is increasing. Industry is operating at less than 82 percent of productive capacity. But the rise in consumer prices accelerated from 4.2 percent in 1968 to 5.4 percent in 1969, as a whole, and a yearly rate of approximately 7 percent in the final two months.

The squeeze on the economy tightened during the course of 1969. The nation's money supply hardly increased at all between May and December; interest rates skyrocketed to peaks never before reached in the memory of any living American; federal construction projects were cut.

A decisive change in national economic policy is needed, without delay. The squeeze on the economy must be eased. Selective measures aimed at restraining the specific causes of inflationary pressures should be adopted.

Since the present inflation is largely a profit inflation, with demand pressures from a one-sector capital goods boom, specific measures should be taken to curb this major problem. The repeal of the 7 percent tax credit for business investment in equipment is one step in this direction. Additional measures are needed.

Business loans for plant and equipment, which soared last year, should be directly restrained by the Federal Reserve System.

A comprehensive congressional review is needed of the nation's monetary machinery and policies—to achieve much-needed reform.

The specific causes of such price pressures as physicians' fees, hospital charges, auto and property insurance rates and housing costs should be examined for the development of practical, selective government measures to dampen these pressures.

Homebuilding is in need of immediate assistance. The federal government should provide direct loans for the creation of low- and moderate-income housing. Congress should direct the Federal Reserve to buy up to $5 billion of government-guaranteed housing obligations. A portion of the GI Life Insurance Fund should be earmarked for veterans' mortgage loans at reasonable interest rates. Congress should require that a portion of bank trust accounts, including pension funds, should be invested in government-guaranteed mortgages to qualify for tax-exemption.

Moreover, we state again, as on numerous occasions in the past four years: If the President determines that the situation warrants extraordinary overall stabilization measures, the AFL-CIO will cooperate, so long as such restraints are equitably placed on all costs and incomes—including all prices, profits, dividends, rents and executive compensation, as well as employes' wages and salaries. We are prepared to sacrifice as much as anyone else, so long as there is equality of sacrifice.

A reduction of price pressures can—and must—be achieved without a growing army of unemployed. The forward advance of the American economy must be permitted to continue.

A Word Edgewise:

Once-Upon-a-Time Revolution Dissolves Into Media Fantasy

By John P. Roche

WHAT HAPPENED to the "Revolution?" Two years ago, every newspaper, magazine, and columnist was devoting extensive coverage to the revolutionary situation. The Establishment allegedly was coming apart as the youth, the blacks, the poor struck out at the "corruption of our society."

The crescendo was deafening, the universities seemed about to fall, the very symbols of legitimacy seemed to be tottering. The United States, according to most accounts, seemed up for grabs.

Now, a bare two years later, it seems as though we were in a different country. The President again wanders, hand-shaking, into crowds, nobody throws excrement at the Secretary of State, the National Guard has returned to its former inertia, the professional revolutionaries are squabbling in garrets, the ghettos are quiet.

The media, which waste no time on ancient history, are following Vice Pres. Agnew around, the columnists have turned to new pastures. Even the faithful Mary McGrory sounds as though she were writing from St. Helena.

Well, what did happen to the "Revolution?" The subject would make a fascinating TV commentary, though the networks would take the Fifth Amendment before they prepared one.

The answer, of course, is that there never was a "Revolution" brewing in the first place. Admittedly American politics were out of joint, but any serious commentator on our society realized that what was impending in 1968 was a shift to the right, not the left. (Richard M. Scammon, the distinguished election analyst, read the omens in this fashion from 1966 on.)

In this respect the view from the university—from what I call the ivory foxhole—is fascinating. A tiny statistical segment of the college and university population (at most 5 percent) was the hardcore of demonstrations and disruptions.

However, because there are about 7 million young Americans in colleges, 5 percent is a sizable mob, particularly when its membership is affluent and highly mobile. (Some characters flew in from San Francisco last winter to help the local storm troopers at Harvard, Boston University, Brandeis, and other schools in the neighborhood.)

Aside from the Negroes, who were attempting to move up in the system rather than destroy it, these hard-core activists were a strange group of young people. The line between revolutionaries and eccentrics is often hard to draw but, to use a broad brush, a revolutionary tries to destroy a system in the name of utopia, of a new vision of community. An eccentric, on the other hand, destroys to fulfill his ego needs; he is fundamentally a nihilist.

Revolutionaries, drawn by a common dedication to something beyond themselves, can organize. Nihilists, who are by their very nature incapable of trusting anyone, wander off into random acts of senseless violence. They can burn a building, but any organization they create begins to split the moment it meets.

Campus extremists fell into the eccentric category. (During Harvard's time of troubles, business at the university's psychiatric clinic fell off 25 percent.) And they were, by and large, wealthy eccentrics. Only two of the 138 students who came before the Harvard disciplinary committee in connection with the seizure of the dean's office were on scholarship—in a student body where one-quarter receives financial assistance. They struck at society in a wild rage, leaving in their wake not a revolution—just debris.

UNFORTUNATELY they did achieve one thing: they triggered an ice age which those of us who are dedicated to the ideals of the academy must now cope with. They turned against the Yahoos and, characteristically, took out their credit cards and left for Kabul or Katmandu or wherever the eccentrics are rallying this year. And, as usual, the poor have to pay the bill these rich eccentrics ran up.

The cutback in funding of universities, the tuition charges at public institutions, and other assaults launched by vengeful middle-Americans, hit the lower economic sectors, not alienated suburbia.

On campus, then, there never was a revolution. We merely had eccentrics engaging in extremely destructive therapy, in political temper tantrums. It was pretty nasty at times, but it never shook the Republic.

Bold New Approach Urged:

Labor's Welfare Plan Stresses 'Security and Dignity' for Poor

The following is excerpted from a statement on Welfare Reform by the AFL-CIO Executive Council, Feb. 23, 1970, Bal Harbour, Fla.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S proposal for welfare reform, though manifestly inadequate, has had the merit of focusing public attention on the glaring deficiencies of the present welfare system.

The Administration should be credited for recognizing the need for a federal minimum floor under what are often pitifully meager welfare payments and federal eligibility standards, improvements the AFL-CIO has long advocated. It has also proposed an income floor of $90 a month for public assistance recipients who are aged, disabled and blind, the so-called "adult categories."

But the level of payments proposed by the Administration for families with children, $1,600 for a family of four, is grossly inadequate and other features of its plan are equally unacceptable.

It is essential that the whole area of public welfare be put in its proper perspective. No conceivable reform of welfare can solve all of America's domestic and social ills.

Indeed, to pretend it can, makes correction of these ills impossible. Public welfare cannot assume the responsibility of providing education, health, jobs, housing and legal services, or eradicating racial discrimination, or supplying many other unfilled social needs. In fact, public welfare exists in part because of the failures in other areas to meet human needs.

Public welfare should have one basic purpose—to get cash into the hands of those unable to provide for themselves. Therefore, there is just one valid criterion for both eligibility and the payment amount: need. But that need must be assessed realistically and humanely so that people forced to depend on public welfare can live in decency, as measured by acceptable standards in today's America.

The AFL-CIO long opposed the former practice of reducing dollar-for-dollar payments to welfare recipients who were able to obtain jobs. We therefore welcomed the 1967 amendment which, though inadequately, instituted for the first time federal participation in financing of work incentive payments. But incentives for those who can obtain jobs must not be used as an excuse to hold at sub-poverty levels incomes of welfare recipients who cannot work.

The proposals in a substitute Senate bill would implement both concepts by improved work incentives for those who can work and benefit payments at no less than the poverty level to recipients who cannot work.

The Administration's proposal of a federal minimum payment of $1,600 for a family of four would leave welfare recipients receiving it mired far below the poverty line. The $1,600 represents less than half of the poverty level and will be even less adequate in 1972 when the plan is supposed to go into effect.

Even with the addition of $750 in food stamps that the Administration has recommended, such families would still have to eke out a living at approximately 40 percent below the poverty level.

A fundamental fallacy in the Administration's proposal is its fatalistic attitude toward the existence of the working poor. It was the AFL-CIO which first directed attention to the shameful fact that millions of Americans who work fulltime receive such low wages that they and their families are forced to live in poverty conditions.

To correct such conditions, the labor movement has fought through the years to extend minimum wage coverage to all workers and to raise the minimum wage to a decent level. Today, that is, at the very least, $2 an hour.

Despite some small improvements, we cannot support the Administration's welfare proposal. It would leave most recipients in poverty and could force many of them into dead-end jobs paying substandard wages.

Instead, the AFL-CIO calls for a bold new approach to public welfare geared to the needs and the potentialities of millions of poor Americans. The main features of such a program should:

1. Provide uniform national standards of eligibility and payment amounts no lower than the poverty level. Payments should at least keep pace with living costs. This will require a federal welfare system.

2. Provide that employable welfare recipients, without children in their care, be able to participate in work or training, with suitability standards set by the existing time-tested criteria in the unemployment compensation system. There should be no referral to jobs paying substandard wages or in which a labor dispute exists.

3. Provide no hidden subsidies to substandard employers. The substitute Senate bill would maintain full welfare payments for recipients who refuse to take jobs paying less than the minimum wage. But this is not enough to assure that unconscionable employers will not exploit welfare recipients. There should be a flat prohibition of payments supplementing substandard wages so that if employers wish to employ welfare recipients, they will have to pay them at least the minimum wage.

4. Provide adequate day care services for mothers who wish to engage in training or employment. This will require sizeable federal funds for training of personnel and construction of facilities. Appropriate federal standards should be established for day care so that it will be an enriching experience for the children involved. In addition, other critical gaps in social services must be closed in foster care, adoptions, protective services for children, counseling and guidance and legal services for the poor.

5. Administer public welfare on a decent, humane basis recognizing that its participants are dependent disadvantaged Americans who deserve not further punishment but ungrudging help. Separation of social services from the payments machinery is one important way of meeting this objective.

In short, we call for a federal welfare program that brings both security and dignity to its recipients.

As Medical Costs Soar:

Public Concern Spurs Demand For National Health Insurance

PUBLIC DEMAND for a national health insurance program providing "all basic family medical services" is mounting faster than most expected it would even a few years ago, an AFL-CIO legislative representative declared.

Clinton Fair, of the Federation's Dept. of Legislation, said acceptance of Medicare, coupled with the sharp and continuing rise of medical and hospital costs, "has increased the concern" of Americans over the need for an "integrated program of prepaid services." He cited the growing number of articles published on the subject as a sign of the public's interest and concern.

Questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, Fair said legislation recently introduced by Rep. Martha W. Griffiths (D-Mich.) closely parallels the program outlined by the 1969 AFL-CIO convention.

Noting that the federation has formally endorsed the Griffiths bill, he spelled out the main points of the proposal:

- Coverage for all U.S. citizens and aliens with one year's residence.
- Inclusion of dental care, prescription drugs and eyeglasses.
- Unlimited hospital and nursing home stays and out-patient treatment.
- Diagnostic doctor and dentist visits and physical examinations.
- Financing under the social security system with a payroll tax of 3 percent on employers and 1 percent on workers, plus a federal contribution equal to the employer tax.

Fair said that removal of the barrier to original doctor and dentist visits would make earlier diagnosis and treatment of illnesses and disorders possible, and result in overall savings.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

ON APRIL 11, 1965, outside a former one-room schoolhouse at Stonewall, Tex., which he once attended, Pres. Johnson signed into law the first general aid to education law in our history.

The Elementary & Secondary Education Act was landmark legislation. Within one year after its enactment, ESEA was assisting education at all levels from pre-school through college and adult education.

Before ESEA, lower levels of education had always been considered a responsibility of states and municipalities. The financial burden was oppressive and millions of children were being deprived of first class education.

ESEA has not resolved the educational lag and the fight for full funding of the programs is still continuing in the Congress. However, even with partial funding there has been a marked difference.

A comparison in educational statistics, as reported by the U.S. Office of Education, shows this with clarity. Here are some comparisons between the fall of 1958 and the fall of 1968:

- Total enrollment of students in public elementary and secondary schools rose from 34 million to 45 million.
- Number of full- and part-time teachers rose from 1.3 million to 1.9 million.
- Teacher median salary rose from $4,797 to $7,900 annually.
- The pupil-teacher ratio dropped from 26.1 to 23.1.

In its report for the fall of 1958, primary emphasis was placed on classroom and teacher shortages. The Office of Education reported that there were 1,843,000 children in our public schools than there was room for. The classroom shortage was put at 132,400.

Neither teacher shortage nor classroom shortage is presented in the report on the fall of 1968. This does not mean that there are no such problems in these areas but it does mean that they are not nearly so serious.

A large part of the difference can be attributed to the role of federal funds in education.

In 1960 the outlay was $2 billion. By fiscal 1970 it had reached $10.1 billion. And the biggest and most significant spurt was between 1965 and 1966 when outlays jumped to $5.8 billion from $2.6 billion. And the biggest increase was in elementary and secondary education which increased from $800,000 to $2.2 billion in the two years.

Since ESEA is the cornerstone of our federal aid to education it is important to understand what the legislation seeks to accomplish.

THE PRIME THRUST of Title I of the act was aid to children in areas of low income. Although 95 percent of the counties in the country were eligible for such aid the great bulk of the money was concentrated in the deprived inner city and impoverished rural areas.

There are eight titles in ESEA but the first is the most important. It has become the center of hot dispute between the present Congress and Pres. Nixon.

The Labor-HEW bill which Nixon vetoed carried a $35 billion authorization to extend ESEA for four more years. If a large portion of this could be funded it could make a considerable difference. The original 1965 ESEA bill called for $13 billion in appropriations but only $5 billion actually came through.

The fight for adequate federal funding for our schools has the support of organized labor and almost every educational group in the country. They have set up the Emergency Committee for Full Funding.

What is apparent is that the limited gains cited above are not sufficient. Our educational systems are in various forms of crisis and the demands are becoming more serious as the complexities and the problems of society, generally, multiply.

ACCEPTANCE OF MEDICARE and the continuing sharp rise of medical costs have combined to stimulate a growing public demand for national health insurance, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Clinton Fair, center, told Judith Randal of the Washington Evening Star and Murray Seeger of the Los Angeles Times on Labor News Conference. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview is aired Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on Mutual radio.

Nixon's Veto Chokes Off Loans For Collegians Short of Funds

By Sidney Margolius

WORKING FAMILIES trying to help their children through college are being especially hit by Pres. Nixon's recent veto of an appropriation of $1.2 billion for national education and health needs.

The increased funds voted by Congress, among other needs, would have made more money available for National Defense Student Loans.

The colleges, especially the state and metropolitan universities who provide educational facilities for most low-income youngsters, had been counting on these funds to provide low-cost student loans.

But the veto has forced colleges to cut back on their "defense" loans. As a result, thousands of students already are reported to have been forced to leave school this term because of lack of funds.

The bill passed by Congress would have increased the appropriation for "defense" loans to $229 million a year instead of the present $161 million, reports Edward Sanders, vice president of the College Entrance Examination Board. The present level of funds already represents a cutback from the $191 million the government provided last year. Because of the cutback, college financial authorities expect only about $135 million may be available for next year.

Colleges have had to resort to a number of emergency measures to try to keep financially-needy students in school, reports Allan Purdy, director of student financial aid at the University of Missouri.

For example, the University of Missouri had $137,000 less available in federal student aid funds this year than last. But at the same time the student body had increased 5 percent and tuition and board had gone up 7 percent. Thus, there has been less money available to try to cover more students needing more help—a three-way bind.

It has become obvious that Pres. Nixon is committed to passing educational costs on to the students and families themselves by making it necessary for them to get the so-called "guaranteed" loans from banks rather than the lower-cost "defense" loans.

The "defense" loans carry an interest of only 3 percent a year. The interest does not start accruing until a year after graduation.

While the funds are provided by the government, students apply for such loans directly to the colleges. They may take up to 10 years after graduation to repay. If they go into teaching, 10 percent of the loan will be cancelled for each year of teaching, up to 50 percent of the loan.

The other government-sponsored program is the "guaranteed" loans. The student must apply for these at local banks, savings associations and credit unions. Insurance companies also are eligible to make these loans. But a state agency has to approve the loan, since the state guarantees repayment.

If "adjusted family income" (taking into account size of family) is under $15,000 a year, the federal government pays the 7 percent interest on these "guaranteed" loans while the student is still in school. Families with adjusted income over $15,000 also can get these loans but must pay the full interest from the time the loan was taken out.

IN ADDITION to the 7 percent interest paid by the student, the federal government currently is paying the banks and other lenders an additional 2 percent to encourage them to make these loans. But despite the 9 percent interest they get, the willingness of banks and other lenders to make these loans is spotty. Some banks, for example, will give these loans only to present depositors and some even just long-time customers.

Still, the "guaranteed" loans may be the only solution for many students who have tuition bills to pay for the spring or coming fall semester, says Rodney Harrison, director of Student Financial Aids at Ohio State University. Harrison, who also is chairman of the College Scholarship Service, reports that his own university this year got only 53 percent of the Defense Act loan funds it needed. It asked for $1.6 million, but got only $818,000 to cover 43,000 students.

The irony is that the Defense Act program costs the government about the same amount it pays to subsidize the "guaranteed" loans made through the banks. But the Defense Act loans not only cost the students less in interest but direct more of the available funds to youngsters most in need. Many of the "guaranteed" loans go to middle-income families.

50 Years of Suffrage:

Women Voters Mark Double Anniversary

THE LEAGUE OF WOMEN VOTERS and the 19th Amendment to the Constitution are both celebrating their 50th birthday this year.

It's a birthday that recalls the active coalition for social justice between organized labor and the suffragettes.

From its first 1920 convention, the year that the voting rights amendment was ratified, the league showed it was a natural ally of labor.

Many of the 69 resolutions passed at that first convention were for legislative goals advocated by unionists too: support of collective bargaining; wage-hour legislation and a joint federal-state employment service; equal opportunity and pay for women in government and industry; child labor laws, compulsory education, pure food laws and the establishment of a bureau of "housing and living conditions."

A delegation from the National Women's Trade Union League at that convention included Mary McDowell, "the Angel of the Stockyards," who had helped organize packing house workers in Chicago during the 1902 strike.

BEFORE 1920, the suffragettes and American workers were banding together to win passage of protective laws in state legislatures. In 1919 the Georgia Suffragettes held their convention in the halls of the Georgia Federation of Labor—"our true friend."

During the early Twenties, the governor of North Carolina decided to placate the new women voters in his state by appointing a "pretty" activist as welfare commissioner.

He was aghast when the "pretty lady" invited the Women's Bureau of the U.S. Labor Dept. to survey conditions of women workers in the state's textile mills.

A self-appointed jury of mill owners called the welfare commissioner on the carpet and warned that her husband's mill machinery business was threatened by her radicalism.

Later when the Gastonia textile strike erupted, the league published the strikers' side of the story and reminded state officials that if they had heeded the women's earlier warnings about injustice in the mills, the strike might have been avoided.

One of the most active members of the League was Frances Perkins, Secretary of Labor under Pres. Roosevelt from 1933 to 1945.

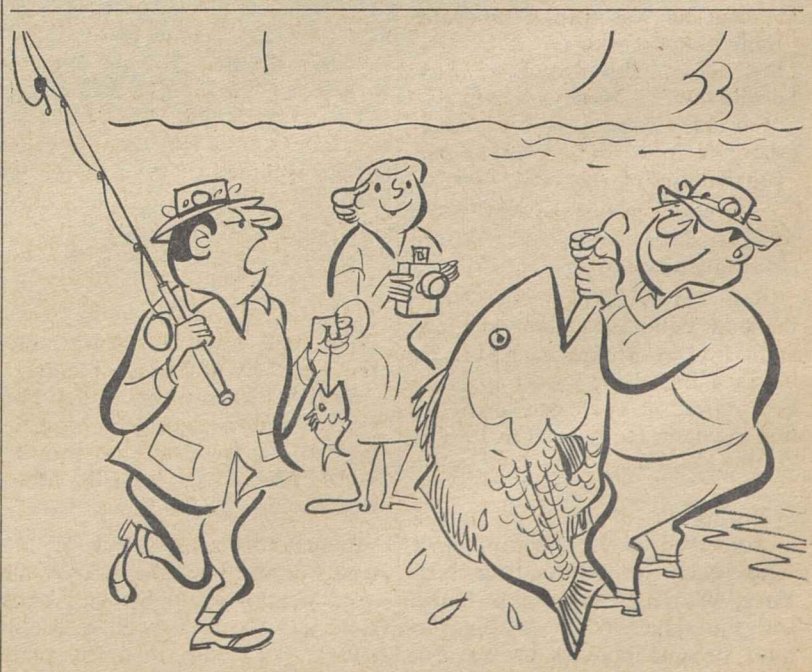
Having Fun Depends on You, No Matter How Much It Hurts

By Jane Goodsell

IT'S A FUNNY THING about fun. It's sometimes hard to know whether you're having it while you're having it. Often you have to wait until it's over to figure it out. At the time, you're too busy keeping your elbows in, or your smile in place, or your attention focused, or your knees bent, to consider whether or not you're having a good time.



Some things that sound like fun aren't necessarily so. Like parties. Some are gay and lively, and then again . . . Some people don't really enjoy gay, lively parties. They feel more at ease at dull, sedate ones.

There are people who have the most fun when they're miserable. When they're plodding up vertical glaciers with packs on their backs. Or screaming with fright on roller coasters. Or shivering in wet duck blinds. Other people would sooner spend the morning in the dentist's chair, where they'd at least get novocain to dull the pain. Both kinds of people think the other type don't know the first thing about how to enjoy themselves.

What makes fun fun (or, conversely, a drag or an ordeal) is mostly a matter of attitude. It all depends on how you look at it. Robert Kennedy said, "I don't like to climb mountains, but I like people who like to climb mountains." I think that makes a lot of sense.

But not everyone needs challenges. Some people feel more comfortable when they're comfortable. Some people get their biggest kicks from anticipation. I know a lady who loves to get ready for trips. She has a deliriously good time planning her itinerary, shopping for drip-dries, reading guidebooks and making lists of things to do and see. For her, the trip itself is secondary. In fact, she finds travel quite chancy and very wearing, and she's always relieved to find herself safely back home.

Fun can also depend on what you might have been doing instead. Even boring experiences can qualify as pleasure if they're an alternative to something worse. Compared to cleaning the basement, listening to a dull lecture can be very pleasant. So can staying home with a cold instead of keeping an appointment to have a barium x-ray. Or attending a PTA meeting rather than working on your income tax. But here again, it's your inner psyche that's the deciding factor. If playing hookey makes you feel more guilty than giddy, it's no fun at all.

First Session Evaluated:

Congress Tabbed With 'Limited' Gains

Divided government, lack of presidential initiative and the failure of House and Senate leaders "to move into this vacuum" resulted in "extremely limited progress" in the first session of the 91st Congress.

That's the evaluation of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation in the foreword to the latest edition of its annual congressional report.

The 80-page booklet, "Labor Looks at Congress 1969," outlines the action or lack of action taken on a broad range of issues of importance to the nation and to the trade union movement.

Many of the bills discussed are still awaiting action in the current second session. The booklet describes the unfinished agenda of the 91st Congress as "long and shocking."

It lists 20 subject areas of "unfinished business," and warns that this year "the voice of the people must be stronger than ever and must be heard if the unfinished, unstarted and under-funded programs . . . are to become reality."

Copies of the 1969 Labor Looks at Congress booklet, publication No. 77K, are 15 cents each or $13.50 for 100. They may be ordered from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 16th Street, NW, Washington, D.C. 20006.

Despite its shortcomings, the first session of Congress did make progress in some important areas, the booklet notes.

"It moved toward a reordering of national priorities, away from space and defense cost overrun spending, toward the health, welfare, educational, social and environmental needs that concern the people of the nation most."

On pollution, for example, Congress voted four times the amount that Pres. Nixon had requested to clean up waterways.

And it passed a tax reform law "which made some, but not enough, progress toward achievement of tax justice."

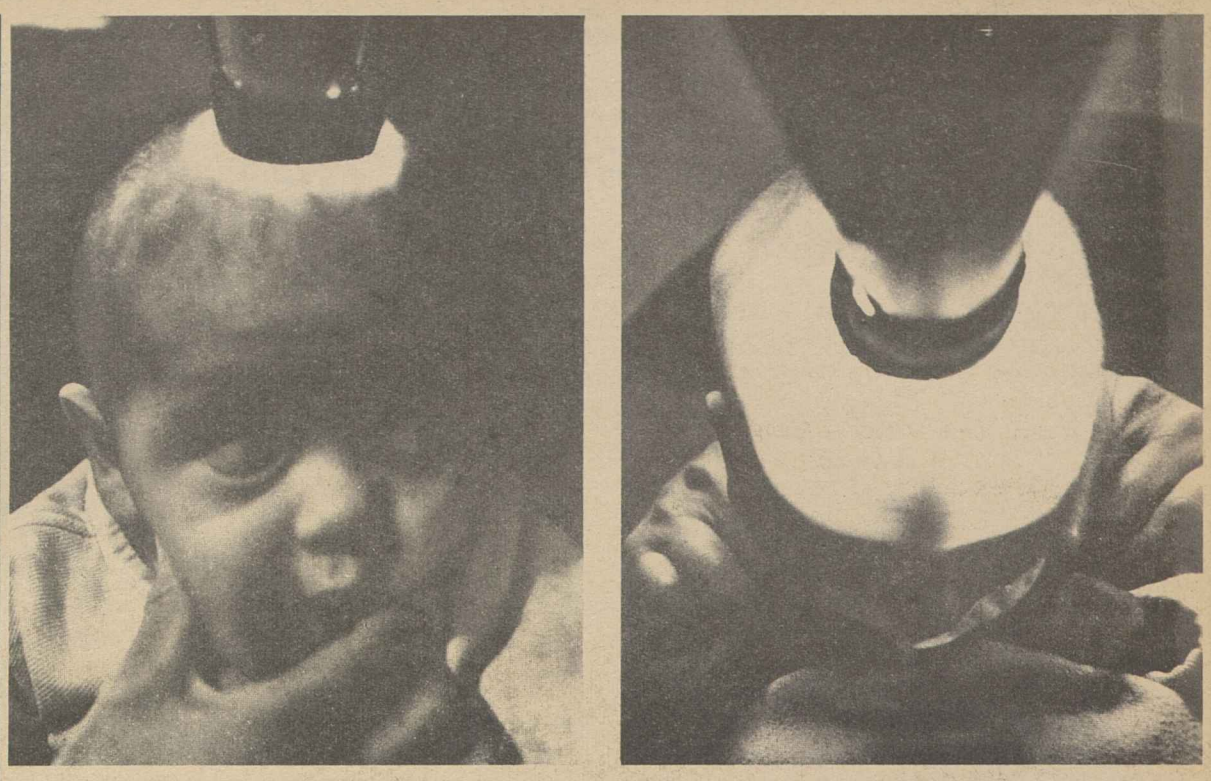
In another area, the AFL-CIO booklet describes the major victory in the Supreme Court confirmation battle:

"The Administration's 'southern strategy' produced the session's most dramatic conflict—the nomination of Judge Clement Haynsworth to the Supreme Court. His judicial record was clearly anti-labor and anti-civil rights, and he showed a glaring insensitivity to judicial ethics. The quality of this nomination was such that the Republican leadership in the Senate, along with liberal Democrats, voted against confirmation. The AFL-CIO was the earliest and leading opponent of Judge Haynsworth, together with the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, and succeeded in blocking confirmation."

In addition to giving labor's position on the key legislative issues of the 91st Congress, the booklet is intended as a handy reference work.

It describes the major bills and important amendments, both those accepted and those rejected.



It gives the dates the bills were acted on and the results of major votes at each step of the way—not merely the sometimes meaningless final passage vote.

Labor's position, as expressed in testimony and statements, is given in the major subject areas.

In expressing its dissatisfaction with the record of the first session, the legislative report assigns blame both to the White House and Congress.

"Pres. Nixon offered virtually no program," the booklet notes. "He sent Congress no broad policy guidelines. . . . His legislative recommendations came to Capitol Hill in piecemeal fashion and were often delayed beyond any reasonable period."

As for Congress, "the leadership of both houses failed to move into this vacuum and develop its own programs. Instead it waited for White House proposals, sometimes in vain, and then debated them endlessly before deciding on a course of action."

BRAIN DAMAGE caused to a child by malnutrition is detected on an electronic device set up by Dr. Fernando Monckeberg. A fully-developed brain, left, resists a flash of light. But the entire skull, right, is illuminated to indicate the decrease in brain volume and the area filled only by spinal fluid.

World Hunger Crisis Continues To Claim 10,000 Lives Each Day

World population is continuing to grow faster than the food supply, a U.S. government official writes in the current issue of the American Federationist, and the problem has particularly dire consequences for children.

"Every day 10,000 people, mostly children, die of malnutrition or undernutrition," says J. B. Cordaro, a program officer in the Agency for International Development. And he adds that another 300 million children are affected to a lesser degree, many with brain damage from a lack of protein in the critical first years of life.

World food production did increase in 1968 and 1969, Cordaro notes, and a "brighter side of the picture is that man's mastery of his environment— his tremendous accomplishments in technology, science and tools—offers hope that he can develop the means to overcome hunger."

But the technicians will not be able to alleviate the problem without an international commitment and cooperation among nations, Cordaro says, and such cooperation is often lacking at present.

The scope of the problem is told in the story of world population: In 1900, there were 1.5 billion people in the world. In another 30 years, by the year 2000, there will be over 1 billion in India alone. And the world will have 7 billion people, or double the present population.

To feed those 7 billion people adequately, Cordaro says, the world food supply will have to be tripled. "Recent breakthroughs in fertilizer and irrigation techniques, seed improvement and new crop varieties bring increased yields and offer some reason for optimism," he notes.

"Currently, 'new foods'—high-protein supplements—are being touted as helpers to reduce hunger and malnutrition. They do not solve the problem, but they do buy more time to work on the problem," Cordaro says.

High-protein supplements carry a special significance in the tragic instances of irreversible brain damage among infants, Cordaro says. Only recently has attention been focused on this aspect of world hunger, it is noted, and the problem is poignantly displayed in a study by Dr. Fernando Monckeberg, a professor of pediatrics at the University of Chile.

Dr. Monckeberg has invented a system of using a photo-flash of light on a child's skull to study brain damage. A normally developed brain resists the light, leaving only a halo of light. But if the brain is not developed, the entire skull is illuminated because there is only spinal fluid in the skull cavity.

Among the "new foods" that are being developed to combat protein deficiency are:

Non-fat dry milk, the most common protein supplement, which can be used in biscuits, candy bars, beverages and the like;

Incaparina, which combines corn, sorghum, cottonseed flour, yeast and vitamins and is used primarily in Central America;

Balahar, a mix of cereal, peanut flour, non-fat dry milk and vitamins which is used in India;

Corn-Soy milk, which contains corn, soy flour and dry milk and is the most widely used, with over 1 billion pounds distributed by AID's Food for Peace office since the program began in 1966;

Fish Protein Concentrate (FPC) which is potentially the cheapest source, but which needs further process refinements before large-scale production can take place.

"Unfortunately, other unconventional protein sources have also been hailed as panaceas," Cordaro says, but "few are beyond the idea stage. While some are more advanced than others, none can be said to have really made it in terms of world-wide acceptance and production."

Conrad Nagel Mourned As Actor, Union Leader

New York—Conrad Nagel, top-flight actor and union man for more than 50 years, was found dead here in his home at the Park Vendome apartments. He was 72.

Nagel was "probably best known as a fine actor who brought satisfaction and enjoyment to thousands," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in a message of sympathy to his son and daughter and the Associated Actors and Artistes of America, the union of which he was president.

"But he was also a first-rate trade unionist who served his fellow actors with dedication and distinction," Meany observed. "For many years he was an active delegate from the AAAA to the conventions of the AFL-CIO."

"He was a personal friend and I join all his friends and fans in mourning his death."

Born in Keokuk, Ia., Nagel made his debut as a stock company actor in Des Moines in 1914. He began a Broadway career in "Forever After" in 1918, and made his first movie in Hollywood in 1919—"Little Women," on the silent screen.

During his film-making career, he appeared in 150 feature films. After each he returned to New York, which he called his home, and the stage. When talking pictures became popular he was one of the small group of veteran actors who made the transition successfully.

Nagel was in "The Jazz Singer" with Al Jolson in 1927 when the first sound picture revolutionized movie-making. He starred in such films as "Midsummer Madness" (1920), "What Every Woman Knows" (1921), "Tess of the D'Urbervilles" (1921), and "Stage Struck," (1958). His stage appearances included roles in "The Petrified Forest," "The Male Animal," and the Pulitzer-prize winning plays "The Skin of Our Teeth" and "State of the Union."

He was a founder, with Fred Niblo and Louis B. Mayer, of the Academy of Motion Pictures Arts & Sciences, which makes the Oscar awards annually. Nagel himself received such an award in 1940 for his work on the Motion Picture Relief Fund.

Besides being president of the Academy and later the AAAA, he was a director of the Screen Actors Guild and the Television & Radio Artists. For more than 20 years Nagel was widely known for his programs on radio and television.

One Man, One Vote Rule Applied to Local Boards

The Supreme Court has extended its one-man, one-vote doctrine to apply to the election of virtually all local officials, including members of municipal boards.

In a 5-3 decision written by Justice Hugo L. Black, the court laid down this general rule:

"Whenever a state or local government decides to select persons by popular election to perform government functions, . . . the 14th Amendment requires that each qualified voter must be given an equal opportunity to participate in that election."

"When members of an elected body are chosen from separate districts," the decision added, "each district must be established on a basis which will insure, as far as is practicable, that equal numbers of voters can vote for proportionally equal numbers of officials."

The Supreme Court in 1968 decided that its one-man, one-vote doctrine applied to the election of some municipal officials but the implication then was that it pertained to officials with wide legislative powers, such as city councils and county governments.

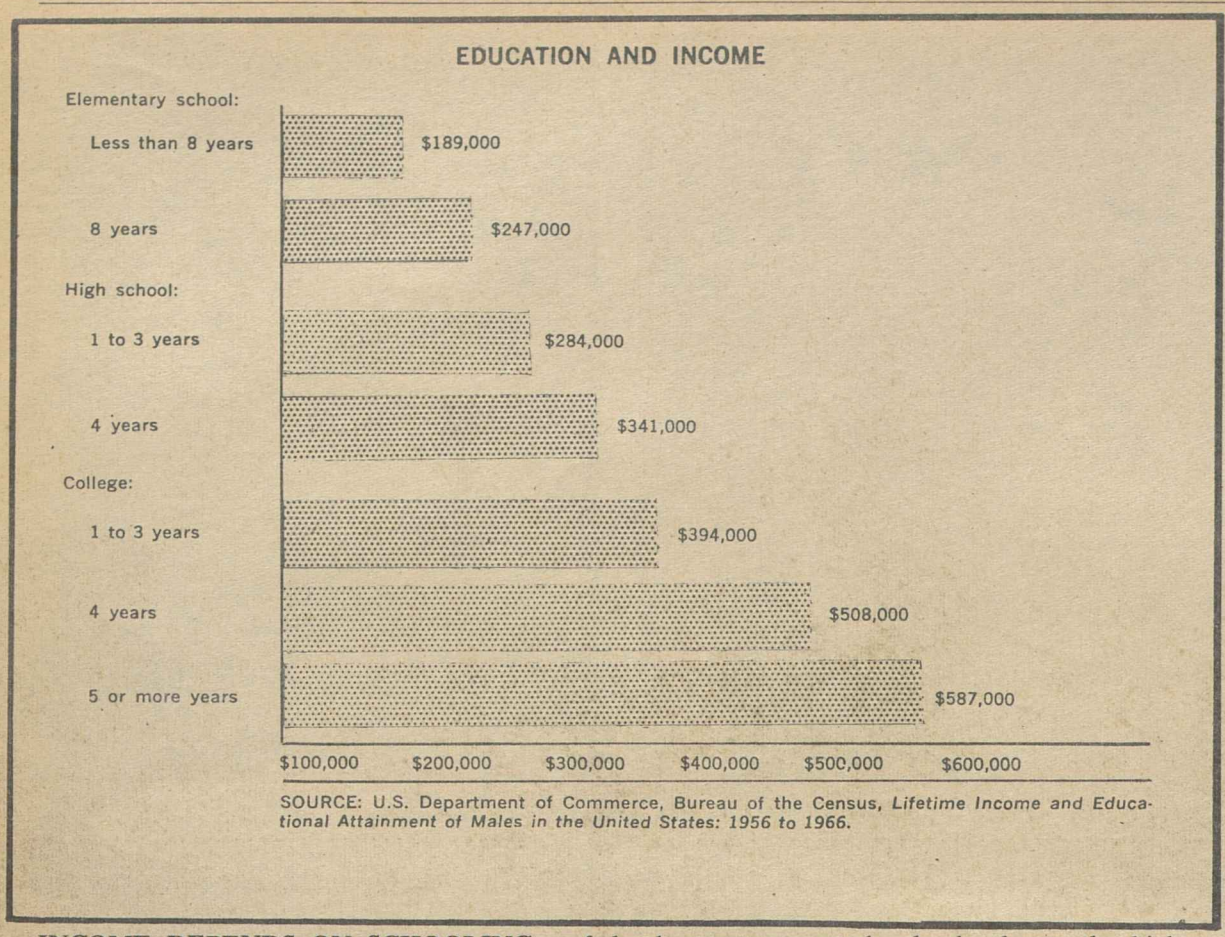
The current decision puts the emphasis not on the duties of local officials but whether or not they are elected from separate districts.

Its broad language indicates that the doctrine applies to members of boards representing geographical districts, such as those who decide on school, water and sewerage issues; other administrative and regulatory officials, and possibly even judges.

The court's ruling came in a case involving the election of six trustees to a junior college district operating three junior colleges in the Kansas City, Mo., area.



Although the district was made up of the city and seven outlying areas, only three of the six trustees —50 percent—were elected from the city even though it had about 60 percent of the school population.

The challenge to the election formula, prescribed by a Missouri law, was brought by four Kansas City taxpayers.

Without deciding whether school population was the proper basis for representation, Black said the election procedure failed the one-man, one-vote test even though precise "mathematical exactitude is not required."

The decision noted that "education has traditionally been a vital governmental function, and these trustees, whose election the state has opened to all qualified voters, are governmental officials in every relevant sense of that term."

Chief Justice Warren E. Burger and Justices John M. Harlan and Potter Stewart dissented. They contended that local governments could avoid one-man, one-vote requirements simply by appointing members of boards.

Independent Role Asked For Consumer Agency

The consumers' voice in government will best be heard through the establishment of a strong, independent consumers' agency, the AFL-CIO told a Senate subcommittee on government operations.

Testimony submitted by AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said such an agency would be free "to agree and disagree" with other government agencies in their handling of consumer matters.

The federation, as it had in earlier testimony before a House subcommittee, emphasized that the independent agency structure is "greatly preferable" to the Administration proposal.

That "split-level" plan calling for an Office of Consumer Affairs in tandem with a Consumer Protection Division in the Dept. of Justice "deserves an 'E' for effort but falls far short of a satisfactory solution," Biemiller stated.

A "serious drawback" to the Administration plan, he pointed out, is that it would give the Justice Dept. "the sole right to intervene as a party on behalf of the consumer in regulatory agency proceedings and in the federal courts."

"We believe that such an arrangement would be a great disappointment to consumers, who naturally expect the consumer spokesman also to be the consumer advocate," he added.

The AFL-CIO conceded that placing a consumer agency outside the White House might give it "less visibility and a less advantageous vantage point for coordinating the various government consumer programs."

"But," Biemiller said, "there are distinct and overbalancing gains in setting up the agency on a completely independent basis."

It would be subject to fewer White House pressures and would be less immediately dependent on any President, he explained. It would be freer to criticize other government agencies and it would be under less pressure.

Biemiller noted that the Senate subcommittee has before it in addition to the Administration measure proposals to establish an Office of Consumer Affairs in the White House and a bill to set up an independent Bureau of Consumer Protection.

All of these proposals, he said, "embody the principle of a unified agency operating in behalf of the consumer" but are "in a number of ways" inferior to the House proposal of Rep. Benjamin S. Rosenthal (D-N.Y.) to set up an independent consumer agency.

Urging the subcommittee to draft legislation containing its features, Biemiller added, "it represents in our opinion the most advanced and well-rounded set of provisions thus far evolved in the continuing effort . . . to produce a strong, workable consumer representation agency."

Annual Parley On Community Services Slated

The 15th annual AFL-CIO National Conference on Community Services will be held at the Shoreham Hotel, Washington, D. C., May 10-14, the federation announced.

More than 600 delegates and observers—union officers, leaders in the area of health and welfare and 170 full-time AFL-CIO Community Services representatives—will spend the four days learning "how to implement federal legislation in the local community."

Leo Perlis, director of the AFL-CIO Community Services Activities, said of the conference objectives:

"The AFL-CIO is known as the people's lobby. Many measures for the welfare of all the people have been enacted by Congress through labor's efforts.

"But laws on the books in Washington do not bring benefits to the people in the local community—automatically. It takes knowledge and effort to translate good intentions and appropriations into human care and cash on the barrel-head."

Conference speakers, workshops and discussion groups will address themselves to arming labor's community leaders with the know-how to make federal health, welfare and consumer legislation work locally, he said.

Brooke Joins Move to Block Judge Carswell

The nation's only Negro senator —Republican Edward W. Brooke of Massachusetts—told his colleagues that he could not "in good conscience" vote to confirm Judge G. Harrold Carswell for the Supreme Court.

Brooke, a former state attorney general, said he had carefully examined Carswell's record and opinions as a judge, "eager" to find evidence that Carswell had abandoned the bigoted, white supremacy views he expressed in a Georgia political campaign.

Not only was the record "barren" of any such evidence, Brooke said, but it revealed "a number of actions which either confirm or invite suspicion that his anti-constitutional inclinations hold sway."

Brooke told the Senate he had "earnestly hoped" the President would choose someone who would unite the Senate and the nation.

Brooke's 15-minute speech was the dramatic highlight of a week which saw steadily mounting opposition to the appointment, which earlier had been expected to slide through with only token protests. A number of Republicans who had voted against the earlier nomination of Judge Clement Haynsworth had indicated that they were unwilling to buck the President's choice twice in a row.

According to wire service tallies, 19 senators have now announced publicly that they will vote against the nomination, while 14 have said they will vote for confirmation.

IUD Sets Meeting On Trade Problems

The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. has called a special two-day conference to enable union officials to "exchange ideas" with experts in the field of international trade.

IUD Pres. I. W. Abel said the conference, to be held in Washington Mar. 19 and 20, was called "because of our growing concern over the number of jobs directly and seriously jeopardized by imports."

Experts from labor, government and universities will participate in seminars and panel discussions.

GE Parity Sought:

Talks Stepped Up At Westinghouse

Feb. 9, when bargaining was stepped up following the GE settlement.

Still unsettled also are contract clauses in a number of other areas, including application of the corporation's second and third-year wage increases to salaried employes; maternity leave benefits in the insurance plan, and the effective date of some insurance improvements.

The unions want the improvements to take effect at once; management wants to delay them to the start of the contract's second year.

Westinghouse has proposed a 43-month contract, three months longer than the GE pact.

The unions are unwilling to accept any contract terms that members rate as inferior to the GE settlement. A spokesman for one union said, "We came here with a micrometer and a slide rule and we will insist that Westinghouse hit the GE offer on the nose."

Other unions represented on the CBC have other points of disagreement with the Westinghouse offer. Besides IUE, the AFL-CIO unions on the committee include the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the Machinists, Carpenters, Flint Glass Workers, the Allied Industrial Workers and the Steelworkers. Also involved in the talks are the unaffiliated United Electric Workers (UE) and the Federation of Westinghouse Salaried Employes.

All Westinghouse workers stayed on the job at the direction of their unions during the 100-day GE strike to concentrate on that dispute, which involved nearly 150,000 members of 14 unions.

Committees from all the unions have been meeting with management since September. The meetings continued during the GE walkout but no real progress was made until the GE settlement was ratified by the major unions.

The IUE reported that its GE Conference Board, meeting in New York City, heard reports that all but a few local contract issues have been settled. It re-elected Chairman John Shambo for a two-year term with praise for his direction of the 1969-1970 negotiations.

The board voiced its thanks to the labor movement for its strong support of the GE strikers, and pledged financial and moral assistance to Westinghouse workers in their time of crisis.

Benefit Laws Improved In West Virginia

Charleston, W. Va.—Labor-backed measures to improve the state's workmen's compensation and unemployment insurance laws were enacted during a 30-day session of the West Virginia legislature.

Protection against "black lung" disease under workmen's compensation, obtained by labor in the 1968 session, was expanded to include coverage for ailments resulting from the inhalation of gas and fumes in occupations other than coal mining.

A worker disabled by the disease will be given additional credit for compensation received before his final claim is settled. While temporarily disabled he will receive credit for 15 weeks' payments, instead of only 10 weeks.

Weekly maximum compensation under the unemployment benefits law was increased by the legislature from 40 to 45 percent of the average annual wage. This means that a jobless worker could receive up to $56 a week instead of the current top of $49.

The state federation achieved two other objectives, however. The period in which an employer has to appeal an unemployment payment was cut from eight months to 60 days. The amount that a worker may earn while drawing compensation was raised from $10 to $15 a week.

Newark Teachers Hail Gains as Strike Ends

Newark, N. J.—Public school teachers returned to their classrooms after a three-and-a-half-week strike with a new one-year contract providing major advances in wages, teaching conditions and community participation in school affairs.

Some 3,000 members of the Newark Teachers Union voted almost unanimously to accept a school board offer meeting most of the goals the union set when its members walked out Feb. 2 in protest against the board's foot-dragging in bargaining.

The new pact raises wages an average of $2,200 a year starting next September. Also it provides binding arbitration of disputes, smaller classes, more effective schools, a "human relations" conference and a citizens' complaint procedure.

Pres. David Selden of the American Federation of Teachers, who spent a week in jail to protest his own arrest and that of nearly 200 union pickets, called the settlement an "outstanding package," won with the help of the national AFL-CIO and its local and state central bodies.

Selden said it is "regrettable that this excellent contract had to be wrested from recalcitrant public officials who preferred court injunctions to genuine collective bargaining." It will, he said, be a "disgrace to American jurisprudence if teachers must go to jail" for exercising their rights.

The AFT president urged the labor movement to "exert the utmost effort" to prevent the use of court back-to-work orders in contract disputes "unless the disputes pose a clear and present danger to public safety."

The Newark settlement provides increases of nearly 20 percent, resulting in a new salary range of $8,000 for beginning teachers to $13,100 for experienced teachers with bachelor's degrees.

Also agreed to are classes of no more than 30 pupils where space is available, hiring of 252 aides to relieve teachers of bookkeeping chores, setting up one "more effective" school for those with learning difficulties when federal funds are allotted, and a plan to make up time lost during the strike—17 class days.

Meanwhile, the Jersey City Education Association protested a move by the Jersey City School Board to cut off the salaries of striking teachers. Nearly 1,350 teachers are in the fourth week of a strike over wages, working conditions and better schools for pupils and teachers.

18-Union Agreement:

Railroad Pact Brings New Health Benefits

Nearly one million railroad employes, retirees and their dependents will receive major improvements in health and welfare benefits under an agreement reached in Florida.

The agreement, effective Mar. 1, was worked out in lengthy negotiations between 18 unions with membership on the railroads and the Carriers National Conference Committee, representing all major U.S. railroads.

Pres. C. L. Dennis of the Railway & Airline Clerks hailed the agreement as a "significant achievement for face-to-face collective bargaining" on America's railroads.

The improved health and welfare plan, which replaces an expiring one, was described by Dennis as "one of the most comprehensive health and welfare programs ever developed."

"It will both bring additional benefits to railroad workers' families and help protect them from the effects of a vicious and so-far unrestrained inflation," he added.

Dennis estimated that the new plan will require the railroads to pay insurance premiums of $540 million over the next two years—an increase of $130 million over the cost of the expiring agreement.

The cost of the new plan to the carriers, he said, will be about $40 a month per person covered compared to a cost of $29 a month under the old plan.

The cost of the new plan, as was the case in the old one, will be borne entirely by the carriers. Railroad managements had proposed that the employes and retirees pay a share of the cost, but gave up the demand during negotiations.

Under the new agreement, maximum surgical benefits for one operation rise from $420 to $550, and major medical coverage for an individual goes from $10,000 to $20,000. The new plan provides a one-third increase in the coverage costs for radiation therapy and laboratory and x-ray benefits.

Other improvements include more liberalized coverage for emergency treatment, increased benefits for furloughed employes who become disabled while on furlough, and guaranteed life insurance for retired employes, even if their past employer goes out of business.

George Leighty, a consultant to BRAC, headed the unions' negotiating team. Its members, in addition to Dennis, were Presidents Charles Luna, United Transportation Union; Harold C. Crotty, Maintenance of Way Employes; Charles J. Chamberlain, Railroad Signalmen; and James E. Yost, AFL-CIO Railroad Employes Dept.

Representing the railroads were J. P. Hiltz, chief negotiator for the carriers' conference; Maynard Parks for the western railroads; James Oram for the eastern carriers; and Scott McGill for the southeastern group.

Union Offers Internship in Labor Studies

A 10-week training program that includes an $800 scholarship and expenses is being offered by Worker Education Local 189, American Federation of Teachers, to a qualified man or woman interested in a labor education career.

Applications must be sent by Apr. 30 to 1970 Labor Education Internship, 535 Clemens Drive, Florissant, Mo. 63033.

The program, now entering its sixth year, is keyed to the member who has been active in the educational work of his union, the teacher who wants to work with adults and the graduate student interested in labor education.

During 1970 the chosen intern will spend 10 weeks, between June and November, working in a program under the guidance of an experienced labor educator. The intern will spend at least a week in Washington, D.C., with the AFL-CIO education program and the personnel of several unions.

LABOR'S CONCERN for protection of workers' pension rights when companies go out of business or are merged was expressed by a panel of union witnesses testifying before the Senate Special Committee on Aging. Sen. Harrison A. Williams (D-N.J.) presided at the hearings.

Panel of Union Pension Experts Cites Need to Guarantee Benefits

A panel of union pension experts told a Senate committee that workers should have a firm guarantee that they will receive pensions they earned during their service with an employer—even if the firm goes out of business or is merged.

They told the Senate's Special Committee on Aging that unions negotiate pension benefits as a form of deferred earnings—trading off a portion of current wages for the security of an added retirement income.

Taking part in the panel were two members of the AFL-CIO staff—Richard Shoemaker of the Dept. of Social Security and Kenneth Meiklejohn of the Dept. of Legislation—and three staff experts of affiliated unions.

John F. Tomayko, director of the Steelworkers' Insurance Pension & Unemployment Benefits Dept., said 900,000 of the union's members are now covered by pension agreements.

He traced the evolution of the basic steel pension agreement from its start in 1949 as a "supplement" to social security, with pension benefits reduced as social security payments went up.

Now, he stressed, the reduction provision has been eliminated and the average company pension exceeds the social security payment.

While most USWA members are covered by the major industry agreements—in steel, aluminum and can—there is a real problem of providing needed protection in many smaller firms, especially in steel fabricating.

To help meet this need, Tomayko said, the union has developed two pooled pension plans covering small firms and is "optimistic" about this approach.

He urged a federal pension insurance fund, with premiums based on the amount of reserves set aside to meet pension claims. A company whose pension program is fully funded, he suggested, should have to pay only a nominal premium for insurance, while a company with only partial funding should be required to pay a higher amount.

The administrator of the Ladies' Garment Workers National Retirement Fund, Louis Rolnick, told the committee how his union has tackled the task of providing pension protection in an industry composed of "thousands of small, scattered units."

The ILGWU pension program is industrywide, Rolnick said, covering 420,000 workers and administered by a 60-member board of trustees from union and management in all sections of the nation.

The day-to-day administration of the program is handled by the union, to avoid costly duplication of records, and there is "complete portability of retirement credits from plant to plant in the industry throughout the United States and Puerto Rico. The specter of plant failure before retirement and the consequent potential loss of benefits is avoided by the multi-employer nature of the fund, which embraces over 10,000 production units."

Still another approach was described by Reese Hammond, reporting on the Operating Engineers programs.

He listed 30 joint pension plans presently in operation, covering members of some 75 local unions.

To deal with the problem of members moving from one area of the country to another or working for employers in different jurisdictions, reciprocity agreements have been worked out among the various pension funds.

Pension payments earned in one area follow the member to a new location and a member who does not have sufficient service credit to qualify for a pension in any single locality can receive a pension payment prorated among the various funds for which he is eligible.

The effect, he said, is to enable "an individual working at our trade to be mobile and work anywhere in the country and maintain his eligibility for a pension benefit."

Shoemaker told the panel, headed by Sen. Harrison A. Williams (D-N.J.), that the AFL-CIO favors federal funding and vesting standards for single employers, where there is the greatest risk that a worker will not receive promised pension benefits on retirement.

He said social security and comparable public programs should provide the basic retirement income, with "the frosting on the cake" coming from pension plans in the private sector.

Religion 'No Insulation' From U.S. Labor Law

Federal labor law does not exempt employers who refuse to bargain collectively with a union on the ground of religious scruples, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia ruled.

The ruling upheld a National Labor Relations Board decision ordering Cap Santa Vue convalescent home in Anacortes, Wash., and the Valley Manor Convalescent Center in Mount Vernon, Wash., to bargain with Service Employes Local 120, winner of elections at both nursing homes.

Management of the two homes refused to agree to an election, then refused to bargain after the election on the ground that as believers in the Seventh Day Adventist faith they could have no dealings with a union.

The appeals court rejected the claim, and also struck down the employers' request that Cap Santa Vue, Inc., should be released from all legal liability because it has sold its interest in the nursing home.

The employers, the court said, are not required to abandon their religious beliefs in order to engage in good faith collective bargaining. They are not even required to believe in the law, and "may lawfully devote their time, influence and resources to a campaign for repeal of the act." The law requires only that they make a good-faith effort to reach agreement and, since they refused even to meet with union representatives, they have failed to do so, the judges said.

The court concluded that the employers' religious convictions "provided them with no insulation" from the provisions of the law.

New School Aid Bill Pared to Avoid Veto

The Senate Appropriations Committee sought to avoid a new head-on collision with the Administration by coming up with a compromise on funds for education and health programs.

It sent to the Senate floor a House-passed bill providing $19.4 billion to finance the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, the Labor Dept., Office of Economic Opportunity and other agencies.

The amount was $580 million more than Pres. Nixon's original budget request—primarily in added funds for education programs—but some $365 million less than the bill the President vetoed four weeks earlier.

Administration officials had warned that the second bill would also be vetoed—unless Congress gave the President authority not to spend all the money it appropriated.

The House defied the warning, rejecting by a 205-189 vote a Republican motion allowing the President to hold back 2.5 percent of the total appropriation.

But the Senate Appropriations Committee voted 15-7 for a motion by Sen. Norris Cotton (R-N.H.) to allow the President to cut the money by 2 percent—approximately $325 million—with a provision that no single category be cut more than 25 percent.

Cotton said he had worked with Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Robert H. Finch in devising the amendment and he felt confident that it would ward off a veto.

The next step is up to the full Senate, to decide whether to go along with the compromise, insist on the full amount as voted by the House, or raise or lower appropriations for specific programs. The AFL-CIO has urged the Senate to insist on the full amount of the House appropriation.

A sharp floor fight is certain over provisions of the House bill intended to prevent the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare from requiring desegregation of dual school systems and giving a congressional stamp of approval to "freedom of choice" plans.

The Senate Appropriations Committee voted 12-9 to keep the segregationist language in the bill.

Two of the anti-civil rights provisions were identical to riders the House had initially added to the vetoed appropriations bill last year. However, when the Senate added language which had the effect of nullifying the impact, the House backed down and voted to instruct its conferees to accept the Senate changes.

Now the issue is again before the Senate, and AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller has urged senators to delete the House riders or at least modify them "to protect federal authority to deal with racial discrimination and unconstitutional school segregation."

Meanwhile, with only four months left in the fiscal year, the agencies and programs involved have been financed at above the President's budget request through "continuing resolutions" to carry them through until a regular appropriations bill becomes law.

In another rebellion against Administration efforts to hold down the cost of domestic social programs, the Senate voted to nearly double the school lunch program by requiring schools to provide free lunches to all children from families with incomes of less than $4,000 a year for a family of four.

A House-passed bill leaves it up to local officials to determine who is eligible for free lunches. Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.), who sponsored the free lunch amendment, cited the case of a Georgia county which has a policy barring free lunches to children in homes with telephones or TV sets and sends a committee from the PTA to the homes of parents who apply for free lunches to investigate the extent of their poverty.

The free lunch amendment was passed, 41-40.

Morse Saluted For 22 Years' Service in ILO

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO has expressed its "warm appreciation" to David A. Morse for 22 years of dedicated service as director general of the International Labor Organization.

Of Morse's announced decision to resign his post in May, an Executive Council statement said, "It is a decision we understand and accept although it fills us with deep regret."

"David Morse," the statement declared, "has established an enviable record in the ILO in years of grave decision and substantial progress for the cause of workers in the world."

The statement praised Morse for "his devotion to the cause of freedom and democracy, his championing of human dignity for workers, and his contribution to international peace and understanding."

The council termed it "indeed fitting" that under Morse's directorship "the ILO received the Nobel Peace Prize" for its services to the cause of peace.

weekly take-home pay when expressed in 1957-59 dollars to reflect price changes.

For the worker with three dependents, this "real spendable earnings" figure was $77.78—down 13 cents from December and over the year, and 2.3 percent below the high mark reached in September 1968.

Dr. Joel Popkin, BLS assistant commissioner, said that the CPI rose by six-tenths of 1 percent in January when adjusted for seasonal trends, the same as in November and December.

Labor Dept. figures showed that over the year, the price of services has increased at a rate of 7.6 percent and commodities have climbed by 5.4 percent.

The December-to-January increase in the index was led by a jump nine-tenths of 1 percent in the cost of transportation services. Higher local transit fares in New York, plus widespread increases in costs of registering, insuring and repairing automobiles were largely responsible for the increase.

The cost of medical care moved up by nine-tenths of 1 percent and medical care services also were higher. Costs of home ownership and household services continued their steady rise of recent months.

Food prices rose more than usual in January, six-tenths of 1 percent, despite a decline in prices of fresh vegetables, BLS reported. Prices of eggs, poultry and milk, which usually decline in January, rose appreciably.

Apparel commodities registered a seasonal price drop of 1.3 percent. Prices of new cars, on the other hand, failed to drop as they usually do in January. Most consumer durable goods showed price increases.

Of nearly 100,000 workers who will receive cost-of-living pay hikes based on the January index, BLS said, about 52,000 are in automotive, farm equipment and office supply industries where the increases will range from 1 to 4 cents an hour.

Nearly 18,000 workers in automotive equipment will get raises ranging from seven to 9 cents an hour; another 18,000 transit workers in three cities will get similar increases; and more than 8,000 employes of the Greyhound Corp. will receive raises of varying amounts.

About 14,000 workers whose escalator reviews are tied to the January index will not receive any adjustment because they have received maximum cost-of-living adjustments stipulated by their contracts.

Federal Judge Extends Order Banning Rail Strike or Lockout

A federal court has once again postponed the threat of a national railroad shutdown by extending restraining orders in a dispute involving 48,000 shopcraft workers.

Judge Howard Corcoran of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia extended until Mar. 2 orders previously issued by Judge John J. Sirica of the same court.

He restrained railroad managements from shutting down all major railroads and locking out employes in retaliation for a strike by four unions on the Union Pacific, and he restrained the strike itself.

In another development, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany scheduled a meeting in Washington with the presidents of the unions, at their request, for Friday, Feb. 27, in an effort to help settle the dispute.

Meany's offer to help—only if the disputants wanted him to—was made in response to questions at a news conference during the AFL-CIO Executive Council's meeting in Bal Harbour, Fla.

Negotiations between the four unions—Machinists, Boilermakers, Sheet Metal Workers and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers—and the railroads have been going on for more than 15 months.

The dispute involves wages and work rules. A tentative settlement reached earlier with the help of the Labor Dept. was voided when members of the Sheet Metal Workers rejected it. The rejection was believed to be based on a rules change that would have allowed limited crossing of craft jurisdictional lines.

After Judge Sirica issued his restraining orders on Jan. 31, negotiations were resumed in Washington and later shifted to Florida since the presidents of the unions were there for meetings of the council and federation departments.

Both sides agreed voluntarily to continue the talks without a lockout or work stoppage until Feb. 21. But efforts to resolve the controversial work rule prior to that date were unsuccessful.

A possible break in the deadlock came in the Florida talks on Feb. 19 when the IAM, IBEW and Boilermakers offered to sign an agreement containing the proposed rule. However, the railroads rejected the offer.

Corcoran's extension of the restraining orders in Washington came at the conclusion of a three-hour hearing held only hours before the voluntary agreement by both sides was due to expire.

Attorneys for the unions said the initial strike was called on the Union Pacific because the organizations were legally free to strike and it was the only weapon they had left for trying to secure a settlement.

They emphasized that the unions struck only one railroad to avoid a national emergency. They contended that the railroads then imposed the lockout to create a national emergency and bring the government into the picture. They argued that only the lockout should be enjoined.

An attorney for the carriers argued that the Union Pacific strike should be enjoined because the unions had no right to abandon national bargaining.

He claimed that a lockout is the only way the railroads can fight an effort by the unions to "whipsaw" them into line, one-by-one.

Corcoran told both sides that he needed additional time to consider their arguments before deciding whether or not to issue one or more preliminary injunctions. "I am not going to rule on a case of this importance now," he said.

Faculty Votes Union At Campusless College

Detroit — Wayne County Community College doesn't have a campus. But its part-time faculty, teaching at 28 scattered locations, now has union representation.

In an election conducted by the Michigan Employment Relations Commission, the Michigan Federation of Teachers received 210 votes to 91 for the unaffiliated Michigan Education Association and 67 for no union.

Support Urged For Cabbies in Miami Strike

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Executive Council urged that all possible support be given taxi drivers on strike against the Yellow Cab Co. of Miami, and extended sympathy and condolences to the families of three drivers killed in attacks by terrorists.

In a statement the council asked all union members to refuse to patronize the company until the strike for recognition and an acceptable contract is settled in accordance with lawful procedures.

Yellow Cab of Miami has refused, the statement said, to bargain with the fully-accredited representative of the drivers, the Railway & Airline Clerks, even though the National Labor Relations Board certified that union last December after a year's delay over contested ballots.

The regional NLRB office has cited the company for failure to bargain in good faith, the council noted.

Meany Cites Compulsory Arbitration

By David L. Perlman

The AFL-CIO has asked Congress to reject Pres. Nixon's proposal for new permanent legislation to deal with major labor disputes in five industries affecting transportation.

Federation Pres. George Meany described a key provision of the Administration bill as "a novel form of compulsory arbitration" which labor considers incompatible with "principles of democracy."

The bill would allow the President to go beyond the Taft-Hartley Act and the Railway Labor Act to intervene in "national emergency" disputes in the airline, railroad, longshore, maritime and trucking industries.

It would virtually repeal the Railway Labor Act, which the President described as "a failure." A new section would be added to the Taft-Hartley Act, applying only to the five transportation-linked industries. It would give the President a choice of three "options" if a dispute allegedly affecting the national health or safety were not settled within the 80-day no-strike injunction period of Taft-Hartley.

The most controversial of these options would empower the President to refer the final proposals of both union and management to a neutral board.

The board would then choose what it considered "the most reasonable" of the rival contract proposals and impose it "as the final and binding settlement."

Before the neutral board handed down its decision, the parties would have five days to negotiate on the basis of the "final" proposals. Nixon and Labor Sec. George P. Shultz expressed the hope that a voluntary agreement could be negotiated in such cases since both sides presumably would have submitted a "realistic" final offer aimed at winning the board's acceptance. Unlike customary arbitration, the board could not split the difference or impose a compromise solution.

The other two options available to the President would be:

- To extend the no-strike "cooling off" period of Taft-Hartley for as long as 30 additional days.
- To require partial operation of the industry for up to six months, allowing the strike or lockout to continue in most segments but keeping essential services operating. A neutral board would have 30 days—during which there could be no strike or lockout—to determine what operations were to be continued.

High Court Slaps Down Boulwarism

The Supreme Court figuratively shoveled the last spadeful of earth on the remains of Boulwarism when it refused to disturb a lower court ruling that the General Electric Co.'s "one offer" system of collective bargaining is unfair and unlawful.

The high court's action lent official support to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's declaration that the successful 100-day strike against GE by 14 unions spelled "the end of Boulwarism." Settlement of the strike came only after the company departed from its "take-it-or-leave-it" bargaining approach, named after Lemuel Boulware, former GE vice president.

The Supreme Court denied GE's request for a review of the decision last Oct. 28 by the U.S. Court of Appeals in New York City, enforcing a National Labor Relations Board order.

The board had ruled in 1964 that GE violated federal labor law in 1960 when it smashed a strike of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers by refusing to budge from its "one offer" technique.

Under the system perfected by Boulware after an earlier strike, GE marketed its contract offer the same way it markets light bulbs or motors—surveying the market, setting a price, selling the public on the value of its product and rejecting all attempts to get it to change its price tag.

Specifically, the NLRB found that in 1960 negotiations with IUE, the company ridiculed the union's proposals, delayed making its own

9 Unions Win 'Victory for Bargaining'

By Eugene A. Kelly

Pittsburgh—Nine unions with 104,000 members stayed at the negotiating table for 48 hours to win a "best ever" contract from Westinghouse Electric Corp. just ahead of a scheduled walkout.

The contract, approved by members of all the unions that coordinated their bargaining at Westinghouse provides wage increases of 53 cents an hour over 41 months, cost-of-living bonuses to a top of 21 cents an hour and skilled labor adjustments adding 5-25 cents an hour to pay. Gains also were achieved in pensions, insurance, sick leave plus personal leave time, vacations, tuition payments, grievance procedure and in other areas.

The unions involved are the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the Machinists, the Carpenters, Flint Glass Workers, Allied Industrial Workers, Steelworkers, and the unaffiliated Federation of Westinghouse Salaried Workers and United Electrical Workers (UE).

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany expressed "warmest congratulations on the new contract settlement." He noted that while it does not meet every need of Westinghouse workers, it does "bring vast improvements, long overdue, in wages and working conditions."

Veto Threat Lifted:

School Aid Funds Voted by Congress

Pres. Nixon bowed to congressional demands for more federal funds for education and health programs, ending a seven-month "battle of the budget."

With the presidential veto threat lifted, Congress gave final approval to a multi-billion dollar appropriation for the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, the Labor Dept., Office of Economic Opportunity and other domestic agencies.

It was a compromise bill, less than Congress had originally voted but providing about $700 million more than the President had asked last year for key education programs.

Stripped from the legislation before it went to the President were three amendments which had been inserted in the House by a coalition of Republicans and southern Democrats in an effort to bar the government from enforcing desegregation of dual school systems.

The Senate deleted entirely one amendment sanctioning "freedom of choice" school assignments. And it nullified the effect of two other amendments dealing with racial balance by adding the key phrase, "except as required by the Constitution."

This means that the government can still use the threat of withdrawal of federal funds to prod reluctant school districts to desegregate.

The Senate, over liberal opposition, gave ground on the amount of the appropriation by directing that 2 percent of the total amount be left unspent.

And to achieve even that con-

Strong objections to the nomination of Judge George Harrold Carswell to the Supreme Court have been raised by the Ripon Society, a liberal Republican organization, and by a non-partisan group of law students from Columbia University.

The Ripon Society urged Republican senators to reject the nomination of Carswell on the ground that he "lacks even the minimal legal qualifications necessary for competent service on the United States Supreme Court."

The society characterized the Carswell nomination as "an insult to Southern jurisprudence" and decried the nomination for falling far short of "the remarkable standard that twentieth century Republican

37-Day Freeze Bars Rail Strike, New Solution to Impasse Sought

By Duane Emme

Four shopcraft unions and the nation's railroads searched for a way out of a bargaining impasse after Congress enacted a 37-day moratorium on strikes or lockouts in their 16-month-old dispute.

The "freeze" resolution was rushed through Congress after lawmakers called for further negotiations and rejected an Administration proposal to impose a settlement.

The President sent his plan to Congress after the unions announced that the "tortured logic" of a court injunction left them no alternative but to strike all major railroads. The walkout was set for 12:01 a.m., Mar. 5.

Nixon called for imposing an earlier tentative agreement that was accepted by the Machinists, Boilermakers and International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, but rejected by the Sheet Metal Workers.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in telegrams to the House and Senate, voiced the federation's opposition to the plan on grounds "it is a compulsory settlement which would force employes to work under conditions which are not acceptable to them."

Senators and House members, at quickly-called hearings by the Senate Labor and House Commerce committees, also expressed opposition to Nixon's proposal as compulsion and interference with free bargaining.

Instead of accepting it, the committees reported out the "freeze" resolution. Less than six hours before the strike deadline, the Senate approved it, 83-0. The House im-

8-Union Group Strikes Units Of General Tel

Chicago — A new eight-union coalition is applying the techniques of coordinated bargaining in a strike by 8,000 employes at three plants of Automatic Electric Co., manufacturing arm of General Telephone & Electronics Corp.

The unions coordinated their bargaining for the first time after years of finding their efforts splintered by a giant corporation which pinched them off one by one.

Management responded by refusing to offer acceptable contract terms. The unions then took to the picket lines and are in the fifth week of a strike at Automatic Electric plants in Northlake, Melrose Park and Des Plaines, Ill.

Morale remains high and picketing orderly, the unions report, as negotiations continue without any appreciable progress at meetings called by the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

Before negotiations started, the unions formed their own coordinated bargaining committee and named two co-chairmen—Business Manager Harry Weaver of Local 713, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, and Business Rep. John Schaefer of Machinists District 8.

Two IAM locals are among the eight on strike. Other unions in the group are the Technical Engineers, Office Employes, Carpenters, Metal Polishers and Painters.

A key objective in this year's negotiations is hospitalization fully paid for by the corporation, Weaver said.

General Telephone is a nationwide firm with at least three subsidiaries—Automatic Electric, Sylvania Electric Products Inc., and Lenkurt Electric Co. Inc. Only the first is being struck.

TWUA Shapes Wool Industry Contract Goals

Boston—A new two-year agreement to provide "substantial" improvements in wages and benefits was set here as the major goal of the Textile Workers Union of America in forthcoming negotiations with wool textile employers.

At the same time, some 200 delegates to a union conference adopted a resolution urging Pres. Nixon to seek agreements with textile and apparel exporting nations to safeguard American textile jobs against the impact of excessive imports.

The delegates to the conference represented 25,000 northern cotton-synthetics workers and 15,000 wool textile employes in more than 140 plants.

The new bargaining objective applies immediately for about 6,000 workers in 27 wool textile plants where most contracts expire this spring and summer. Other workers in the woolen plants and those in northern cotton-synthetic plants are under continuing contracts.

In a keynote address to the conference, TWUA Pres. William Pollock called on the union's negotiators to "make up lost ground in earnings and fringe benefits which have been eroded by the ravages of inflation."

He also emphasized that if textile exporting nations do not enter into agreements with the United States to keep the flow of their goods into this country at "reasonable levels," the union will press for action in Congress to achieve such limitations.

Construction Panel Adopts Policy Guide

A presidental commission created last fall to help improve labor-management relations in the construction trades has laid the foundation for procedures it will follow in union-industry disputes.

Labor Sec. George P. Shultz, chairman of the Construction Industry Collective Bargaining Commission, said the policy statement stressed established practices by builders and craft unions in the prevention and settlement of disputes. The commission will also rely on regular mediation agencies of the government.

The key points adopted by the commission at its Jan. 27 meeting are:

- Procedures are not regarded as a substitute for responsible effective bargaining.
- Private dispute-settling procedures developed by the parties are endorsed by the commission.
- Full use of Federal Mediation & Concilation Service assistance is expected.

Shultz expressed hope that publication of commission procedures, expected shortly in the Federal Register, would clarify its role before the construction industry enters a period of extensive bargaining on contracts that expire this year.

About 850 contracts covering an estimated 1 million members in the building and constructions trades are up for negotiations—most of them before July 1.

Pres. Nixon formed the tripartite panel last fall to help improve the relations, manpower affairs and other practices in the industry.

The commission is made up of members from labor, builders, and the public. Labor is represented by Pres. M. A. Hutcheson of the Carpenters, Pres. Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, Pres. Hunter P. Wharton of the Operating Engineers and Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

The commission gave this summary of its policy:

"In setting forth a disputes procedure, the commission emphasizes that it is not intended to provide a substitute for the collective bargaining process.

"Nor is it a means to bypass or neglect existing mediation facilities or industry branch dispute-settling procedures.

"The standard procedure for the commission to accept cognizance over collective bargaining disputes is through referral to the commission by the director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service. The commission will exercise its judgment in accepting or declining specific disputes.

"The staff of the commission is directed to maintain close contact with the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service on all aspects of bargaining in the construction industry and to see that critical disputes are brought to the attention of the appropriate international union and the national offices of an appropriate contractor association."

Woman Carpenter First For Local Since WW 2

Portland, Ore. — For the first time since World War II, Carpenters Local 1020 has a woman member.

She's Mrs. Anton Luhaorg, who does finish carpentry on construction projects for a local subcontractor. Her husband has been a carpenter for 25 years.

St. Louis Pre-Fab Pact Approved by 3 Unions

St. Louis—A three-year agreement has been signed for the production of factory-built modular homes bearing the union label in the St. Louis area.

The contract takes in union carpenters, electricians and plumbers in the St. Louis district. The first homes are expected to come off the assembly line of Concord Homes, Inc.'s Mobile & Modular Homes Division in July.

Signing the agreement which runs through May 1, 1973, were Carpenters District Council of Greater St. Louis, Plumbers & Pipe Fitters Local 35 and International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 1.

The pact provides for top prevailing pay scales for each union, reported Sec.-Treas. Ollie W. Langhorst, of the Carpenters District Council, who spoke for the three unions.

A "no-strike" clause is included in the contract to insure year-round production, Langhorst reported. The clause is backed up by a grievance procedure plan based on binding arbitration.

The ratio of union craftsmen on the factory production lines will be basically the same as on-the-site construction work: six carpenters to one electrician and one plumber.

Erection of the modular units on the home sites will be handled by appropriate unions as prescribed along jurisdictional lines, Langhorst said. Wage scales in the factory will not affect those negotiated by building trades unions for on-site work, he added.

One of the key factors that led the three unions to sign the agreements was regard for the nation's rising housing shortage, Langhorst said.

He predicted that factory production of the modular units would increase the demand for workers in on-site erection work.

The Concord Homes division is planning to break ground for a $1 million plant next month at Wentzville, Mo., for the assembly line housing production.

Several different models of the prefabricated homes will sell between $15,000 and $16,000 for two- and three-bedroom units, the firm said.

The company plans to market homes in a 300-mile radius of St. Louis through 60 Concord dealers.

Congress Urged to Reject It:

AFL-CIO Assails New Disputes Plan

Either house of Congress could cancel out the President's decision within 10 days and either a partial operation plan or a "final offer selection" could be voided in the courts if found to be "arbitrary and capricious."

The President also proposed establishment of a National Special Industries Commission to study labor relations in other industries and recommend whether additional legislation is necessary outside of the transportation field.

Nixon said the Taft-Hartley Act, "which I helped write in 1947," has not prevented recurrence of strikes after the 80-day injunction in eight of the 29 cases where it has been invoked since 1947. All the "failures," he said, have been in transportation industries.

Meany said the Administration labor bill "would be, on balance, even less satisfactory than existing legislation, since it involves a larger measure of government compulsion."

He stressed that the AFL-CIO has "always opposed and will continue to oppose any scheme of compulsory arbitration, no matter what administration proposes it and regardless of whether it is openly labeled as compulsory arbitration" or called by some other phrase.

"The AFL-CIO does not believe nor has it ever believed that the government should be permitted to set the terms of collective bargaining agreements in private industry," Meany said.

"We do not think it is compatible with the principles of democracy to compel employes to work on terms which are imposed on them by the government."

The circumstances that led Congress to devise special legislation to govern labor-management relations on the railroads and airlines still prevail, Meany suggested, "and we oppose for these industries, and all others, compulsory arbitration of contract terms."

Under the Administration plan, virtually the only remnant of the Railway Labor Act would be the determination of collective bargaining units and conducting elections.

The National Railroad Adjustment Board and its airline counterpart would be abolished, leaving it to the parties to work out a new method of resolving grievances. Railroad workers on strike would no longer be eligible for benefits under the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act. And "open-end" agreements would be eliminated, to be replaced by contract termination procedures common to other industries.

As to the other three industries covered by the proposed legislation —longshore, maritime and trucking —Meany said there is "no justification whatever for imposing special emergency procedures."

Dock strikes are most commonly cited as examples of the supposed inadequacy of the 80-day no-strike injunction.

But, Meany noted, "the Secretary of Labor himself recently released a study in which he concluded that there had been 'minimal' economic damage from past longshore strikes."

As for the trucking industry, Meany said, "no Administration has ever found it necessary even to seek an 80-day Taft-Hartley injunction. We are at a loss as to why it is proposed to subject this particular industry to special coercive procedures."

Nixon's message was sent to Congress before the issue of a rail shopcraft strike came to a head and before the President's request for legislation to deal specifically with that one dispute.

Still uncertain is whether the White House will press hard for congressional action on the permanent legislation in this Congress. The Administration bill, affecting both the Railway Labor Act and the Taft-Hartley Act, posed something of a jurisdictional problem in Congress.

The Senate leadership referred it to the Labor Committee, which has the broadest jurisdiction over matters affecting labor-management legislation.

In the House, however, it was sent to the Commerce Committee which deals with railroad matters.

More than a year ago, Nixon told Congress he would submit new "national emergency" strike legislation. Initially, according to news accounts, the Administration planned to cover all industries under a new disputes law. Before the plan was sent to Congress, it was trimmed back to apply only to the transportation field—at least for the present.

Westinghouse Pact Posts Major Gains

Meany said the "firmness, determination and patience of Westinghouse workers gave their negotiators what they needed to reach a just and peaceful settlement." He called the outcome of six months of effort "a victory for collective bargaining" which "sets an example for the entire industry of how labor-management agreements can and ought to be reached."

Westinghouse workers, Meany noted, "had the support of every AFL-CIO member, precisely as those at General Electric Co. did throughout their long ordeal" of 100 days on strike. Both struggles, Meany said, "set a standard of solidarity and unity rarely matched in labor history."

He added: "The entire labor movement is stronger because of it."

Meany is chairman of the AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee which set uniform contract goals last year and kept all affiliates informed of contract developments in negotiations with GE and Westinghouse.

When unions in the CBC voted to strike GE for better contracts, the committee rallied the entire labor movement to their support for the duration of the strike. Meany and other members of the AFL-CIO Executive Council attended rallies in numerous cities and helped raise more than $2 million for the 150,000 GE strikers.

The strike tapered off when a majority of the 14 unions with GE contracts accepted settlements far superior to the "take-it-or-leave-it" proposal made last August by the firm, the nation's largest electrical goods manufacturer. All unions have settled, the committee reported, except a Machinists local of 285 tool and die workers at Louisville, Ky.

In the process, the unions dealt a death blow to the one-offer bargaining system that former GE Vice Pres. Lemuel Boulware fashioned 20 years ago to avoid good-faith bargaining with unions. The National Labor Relations Board and the courts recently finished the job by finding the Boulware system a violation of federal labor law.

Westinghouse workers stayed on the job at the request of their unions during the GE strike. Most of them contributed two hours' pay a week to the GE strike relief fund. They refused to settle until Westinghouse matched the basic GE contract terms and agreed to wage increase retroactivity to Jan. 5.

New contract benefits were valued by the unions at 98 cents per hour, plus the "rollup" value of accompanying gains.

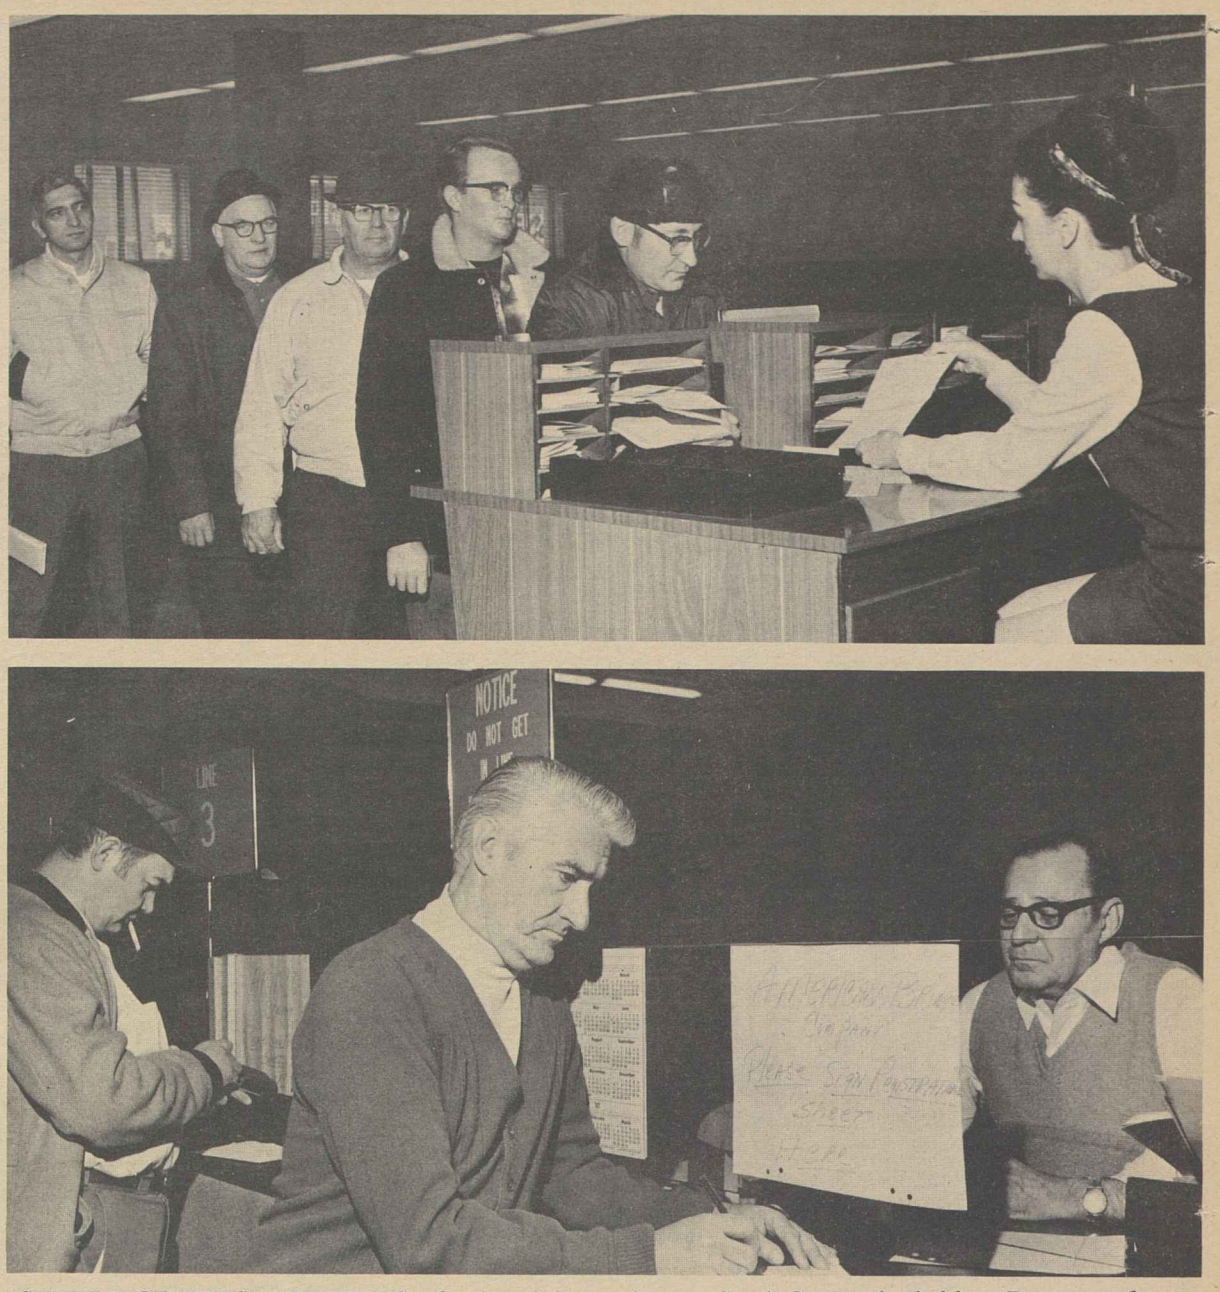
As of Jan. 5, Westinghouse workers get wage increases of 23 cents an hour, skilled trades adjustments of 5 to 25 cents an hour additional, hikes of $8 to $15 a week for salaried employes, and new wage brackets for higher pension and insurance benefits in the future.



As of next Nov. 9, employes will get cost-of-living increments up to 5 cents an hour based on the government's Consumer Price Index.

Wages will rise by another 15 cents an hour on Mar. 15, 1971, for production workers, and by 4 percent for salaried employes. Effective May 15, 1972, there will be an additional wage boost of 15 cents an hour or 4 percent.

Additional cost-of-living adjustments are due Nov. 8, 1971, and Nov. 13, 1972—up to 8 cents an hour or its percentage equivalent each time.

Insurance improvements provide full coverage of the cost of a semi-private hospital room for 365 days, with all extras covered, effective immediately. Pension changes raise the minimum monthly benefit to $4.50 times years of service, effective this year, rising to $5 next Jan. 1 and to $5.50 a year later.

The "best ever" rating came from IUE Pres. Paul Jennings, who called the new pact "history-making."

proposals for two months, conducted a drumfire of propaganda in plant and community publications against the IUE and "took a strike" to force acceptance of its offer.

The appeals judges got the case after long delays. They said "we hold that an employer may not so combine take-it-or-leave-it bargaining methods with a widely publicized stance of unbending firmness that he is . . . unable to alter a position once taken."

Judge Irving R. Kaufman, who wrote the decision, held that GE had ignored the "legitimacy and relevance" of the union's position as the legal bargaining agent for its members at GE.

He found fault with management's "patronizing" attitude and its "unbending patriarchal posture" which he called out of line with a willingness to discuss union proposals freely and fully, as the law requires employers to do.

The court turned thumbs down on GE's strategy but said "we do not hold that an employer may not communicate with his employes during negotiations; nor are we deciding that the best-offer-first bargaining technique is forbidden."

It said "we do not require an employer to engage in 'auction bargaining' or . . . compel him to make concessions." He must, however, accept the role of the union under U.S. laws and attempt to reach a genuine good-faith agreement.

IUE Pres. Paul Jennings reiterated his hope that a more fruitful negotiating policy will be adopted by GE in future bargaining with all its plant unions.

"We stand ready," Jennings said, "to work with GE for a better way of doing things, to make the satisfaction of human needs and the enhancement of human dignity GE's finest product."

The Supreme Court decision, he emphasized, "can be the occasion for GE to enter a new era of full recognition of the unions, and to work with them in resolving employe problems."

Air Line Employes Sign Eastern Pact

Miami—The Air Line Employes signed a new Eastern Airlines contract giving flight simulator operators at the ground training school top salaries of $13,920 a year in the final year of a three-year agreement. The new top will be reached in monthly increases of $80, $85 and $90 in successive years.

Conglomerates Scored as Threat To Workers' Rights, Bargaining

Conglomerate mergers are running roughshod over workers' rights and threatening the destruction of collective bargaining, a Steelworkers' official told Congress.

Joseph P. Molony, a Steelworkers' vice president, presented a Senate Antitrust & Monopoly subcommittee with a detailed picture of his union's experiences in dealing with conglomerates.

Workers must have some type of legislation that will protect them from the "unscrupulous practices" and unrestrained growth of these mergers of unlike industries, he emphasized.

The subcommittee, headed by Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.), is holding extensive hearings on conglomerates with a view toward deciding if new legislation is needed to control them. It has received numerous demands for legislative action.

Molony charged that conglomerates often ignore the pension funds of acquired companies, converting money marked for benefits into quick profits even though the pensions were previously agreed to through collective bargaining.

"When the union tries to obtain assurances of continued payment of pensions," Molony said, "it is often told by the conglomerate that it should not protest until it has been hurt."

"It is our fervent belief," he pointed out, "that no company has the right to repudiate or cause to be abandoned the collectively bargained, written promises made to retired, disabled or aged employes after a lifetime of work.

"No takeover of an enterprise should be permitted unless the ultimate fulfillment of the accrued and vested retirement benefit rights of employes are fully protected by law."

Another conglomerate practice that is of great concern to the Steelworkers, Molony said, is the closing of individual plants of an acquired firm. There is plenty of evidence, he declared, that closings are being made "heedlessly and needlessly."

He cited Textron, Inc., as a conglomerate with a reputation for ruthlessly shutting down plants, pointing out that it has closed two acquired plants where the Steelworkers have contracts.

He described the shutdown of a subsidiary of Dura Corp. in Richmond, Ind., where the union had a contract. The plant was closed when it was taken over by Walter Kidde & Co., a large conglomerate. Some of the plant's work was moved to Cambridge, Ohio. The union followed and organized there, only to have Kidde also close this plant.

Unions bargaining with a conglomerate are at an extreme disadvantage, Molony testified, because it lumps all of its operations, including statistics on individual firms' profits, into one set of bookkeeping figures.

"We are often told in negotiations," Molony continued, "that the particular plant at the bargaining table is operating at a loss or with minimum profits, even when the consolidated financial statement for the company shows some pretty impressive profit figures."

Molony noted that the Securities & Exchange Commission recently revised its financial reporting regulations to require conglomerates to shed more light on the finances of their individual companies.

If these regulations which now cover only the registration of securities are extended to cover annual reports and if they are strongly enforced, they will help to fill an "information gap" in bargaining, he testified.

Conglomerates "have completely changed the bargaining picture" for unions, Molony said, in that their enterprises cut across many industries and involve many different unions.

"If we are to bargain successfully," he stressed, "we must coordinate, we must bargain together and, if need be, strike together—whether the bargaining involves different unions or different locals of the same union."

Unions are beginning to do this, he noted, and their efforts have picked up the descriptive term "coordinated bargaining."

Conceding that this is action the unions can take by themselves to answer the conglomerates' challenges, Molony concluded: "We must adjust our bargaining with conglomerates if it is to survive in any meaningful sense."

Machinists Widen Dental Coverage

New dental insurance plans benefiting the families of nearly 40,000 airline employes have been won by the Machinists on United, Northwest, Trans World, Continental and North Central lines, the union announced. That brings to 250,000 the number of IAM members and their dependents covered by plans providing regular dental examinations and treatment.

The Machinists won their first dental care plan at Aerojet General in 1962. Since then similar coverage has been agreed to at McDonnell, Douglas, Boeing, and other firms, including 100 metal trades shops in San Francisco, the union said.

Middle East Alternatives

FOR MONTHS, the "Big Four"—the United States, Britain, France and the Soviet Union—have been conferring on the problem of securing peace in the Middle East. The deliberations were doomed to failure the very moment they began. Two of the participants were not qualified to play the role of peacemakers.

For 14 months, the Soviet government has been providing the most aggressive Arab regimes with huge supplies of modern weapons for the destruction of Israel. More recently, the USSR has become the chief provider and trainer of the Arab terrorist commandos which are seeking not only to bleed Israel but also to subvert and replace the more moderate Arab governments with Nasser-type dictatorships.

For years, Paris has refused to deliver to Israel planes she paid for, planes vital to the defense of her existence. More recently, the French government agreed to provide the Libyan military junta with more than a hundred of the most up-to-date warplanes. This armada is obviously destined for bolstering Nasser's faltering airpower.

So far, only the U.S. government has clearly declared that peace in the Middle East "can be based only on agreement between the parties and that agreement can be achieved only through negotiations between them" (Pres. Nixon) and that "an agreement among the powers cannot be a substitute for agreement among the parties themselves." (Sec. of State Rogers).

It actually hurts the cause of peace for our government to persist in its futile quest for joint efforts with the USSR to achieve an equitable and durable settlement in the Middle East, since Moscow seeks only to corrode our basic position by securing piecemeal concessions at the expense of Israel—thus strengthening Nasser and his associates in their determination to prevent all direct negotiations with Israel.

IN VIEW of its experience with the Big Four negotiations to date, our government would be well advised to seek alternative measures for promoting peace in the Middle East. Our country should now rally world opinion for having both Arabs and Israelis honor fully the cease-fire arrangements they accepted in June 1967.

Despite the courage and capacities of the Israeli fighting forces, they are at a tremendous disadvantage because of the heavy military imbalance in the Middle East. Israeli armaments lag far behind those of the Arabs. The latest count is a ratio of four to one. Only a correction of this imbalance could convince the aggressive Arab rulers that it is better to negotiate an honorable peace with Israel than risk another confrontation with her. Only the correction of this imbalance can prevent another war in the Middle East which might lead to a nuclear world conflagration.

Our country's vital national interests and the best hopes for world peace demand that our government should provide Israel with planes and the other military supplies she urgently needs for self-defense and survival—especially in view of the escalation of Soviet and French arms shipments to Egypt and other belligerent Arab regimes.

The Israeli people are now spending over $3 million a day in fighting for their self-preservation. Eighty percent of Israel's tax revenue is consumed by national defense needs. Our country should help Israel to shoulder this terrible burden imposed on her by the harsh military realities she faces.

Narrow Construction of Libel Better Than Stifling Dissent

By John P. Roche

SOME YEARS AGO a distinguished British lawyer picked up my copy of the "Black Book" of the John Birch Society. For the next hour there emerged from his chair the most peculiar series of grunts, growls, and assorted exclamations. (This volume, it may be recalled, indicated that the whole United States government, from Pres. Dwight Eisenhower down, was a creation of the "international Communist conspiracy.") "My God," he said, "it's libelous from start to finish! Don't you people have any laws in this country?" He went on to suggest that in Britain the egregious Robert Welch would at least have been on his knees at the bar of the House of Commons begging for clemency—at most have been in jail mediating on the evil of his ways.

It was difficult to get my friend to believe that as far as "public figures" are concerned there is virtually no law of libel in the United States. Sen. Barry Goldwater's recent victory in the suit against Fact magazine marks one of the rare occasions in the last decade when a politician has managed to make a libel action stick.

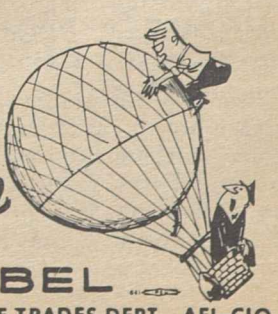
On the merits, any fair-minded individual would agree that Goldwater was outrageously smeared when Fact indicated, in the heat of the 1964 campaign, that there was overwhelming psychiatric evidence that he was a psychopath. But it was still something of a surprise when the U.S. Supreme Court refused to overrule a judgment in his favor by the New York State Court of Appeals.



The average citizen probably looks on this with no particular interest—Fact smeared Goldwater, so make Ralph Ginzberg, the publisher, pay. As one who has been called everything from a "Communist-dupe" to a "Murderer of Vietnamese Babies," I have some gut sympathy with this attitude. However, the problem of libel is far more complex than appears on the surface.

The Supreme Court did not virtually demolish the law of libel for public figures in a moment of whimsical idiocy. In essence what the justices did was make a historical judgment that the law of libel had been far more often employed to sandbag dissenters than to protect the legitimate rights of public figures. They could not state it this way in the crucial decision (New York Times v. Sullivan, 1964) because good judicial sense always has to be wrapped in intricate legal prose. In that case an Alabama jury had found the Times guilty of libeling a public official by running a paid political ad denouncing his behavior in a racial dispute.

EVEN THE SUPREME COURT knows a hatchet job when it sees one, but the problem was how to rescue the Times under the limited rules governing the court's appellate jurisdiction over state judicial action. The central proposition is that the court can review matters of law, but not of fact. Without my getting involved in the metaphysics of defining these elusive concepts, suffice it to say that the justices could not reverse the Alabama courts on the ground that the Times ad was not in fact libelous. The Alabama jury's verdict (under the law of the state) could not be overruled. So the Supreme Court had to find the Alabama law unconstitutional—or sign off and leave the Times, and everyone who had signed the ad, to the tender mercy of the segregationists.

The court so found. The First Amendment was held, in effect, to protect (in the absence of a showing of malice) just about any conceivable statement about a public person. And malice is sticky. How can one prove that a libeler knew his statement was false when he made it? (Sen. Goldwater managed to satisfy this requirement, but, generally, demonstrating states of mind is an extraordinary burden for a litigant to bear.) The Supreme Court has proceeded on the assumption that sensitive souls who want their privacy enforced should stay out of public life.

All in all, it makes sense to apply the narrowest possible construction to libel. The American people take exaggeration for granted and discount it. It is better to let a few extremists scream imprecations and spread dirty stories than crank up a machine with such a suppressive potential as the law of libel.

President, Southern Alliance Could Cripple All Integration

DURING ONE TRAGIC WEEK in February, the nation turned its back upon its black citizens. It is, of course, still too early to assess the full significance of the events of that week, but it is possible that historians may someday compare them to the Compromise of 1876 when the principle of equality was sacrificed to the economic advantage of the wealthy and the racial fears of the bigoted.

Sixteen years after the Supreme Court decision outlawing school segregation and only several months after the Supreme Court ordered the abolition of dual school systems "at once," Congress accommodated to racism and conservatism. In the House a coalition of northern Republicans and southern Democrats secured the passage of two anti-integration amendments to the appropriations bill. [These amendments were knocked out before final passage of the bill] And in the Senate these conservative forces, aided and abetted by some liberal Democrats, won their greatest victory —the passage of the Stennis amendment which may cripple all integration efforts in the South.

Why was this conservative field day in Congress permitted to take place? The northern Republican-southern Democratic coalition has always fought against progress in civil rights, yet it has never been as successful as during the third week in February. The reason: it was able to pick up two new allies—the President and a small yet decisive contingent of liberal Democrats.

Pres. Nixon may not have been involved in the Congressional maneuvers to close the door on integration, yet he has been an active ally of the southern conservatives ever since he entered office. Time and again he has tried to slow the pace of school desegregation, to reverse the progressive direction of the Supreme Court, and to water down the 1965 Voting Rights Act. This has all been part of his insidious strategy to win the Wallace vote in the South and to organize an electoral majority on the basis of hostility to Negroes.

Nixon's role in the recent debacle in Congress was dramatically emphasized on the day before the passage of the Stennis Amendment when Leon E. Panetta resigned from the civil rights office of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, claiming that the White House was undermining the school desegregation efforts of his office. The Administration's crowning insult to Negroes was the appointment of Robert C. Mardian as executive director of Vice Pres. Agnew's cabinet-level desegregation panel. Mardian is a former campaign worker for Barry Goldwater, a foot-dragger on desegregation, and one of Panetta's most bitter antagonists.

NIXON'S BEHAVIOR comes as no surprise, but this cannot be said for the liberal Democrats who supported the Stennis amendment. Does Sen. Ribicoff, who has been an ally of the Negro in the past, really think that he has done a service to the Negro cause by confusing de facto and de jure segregation, opposing the former in such a way that he makes it impossible for the government to attack the latter? Do not he and other senators who voted for the Stennis Amendment realize that de jure segregation is segregation sanctioned by government and subject, therefore, to legal redress, while de facto segregation is the result of economic factors and residential patterns which can be altered only with major social programs, and that to confuse the two is to play into the hands of southern segregationists? Do they not see that by requiring the government to do what it cannot do in the absence of an economic program, they are directing its attention away from what it can do now, namely, to abolish dual school systems in the South? The political intelligence of these men seems to have become the victim of their guilty consciences, all to the detriment of the southern black.

But perhaps guilt is not the only emotion which is motivating these and other liberals today. For the past four years, a major ideological shift has been taking place in the liberal community which can best be described as an accommodation to localism of every kind, particularly racial separatism.

Many liberals have come out against a stronger integration effort since they feel that it would be futile and counter-productive. Yet the week that Congress retrenched on integration, white students at Wade Hampton High School in Greenville, S.C., welcomed 300 Negro students who had been assigned to the school under a court order.

The potential for integration is there, but it can only be realized if moderates feel that they have the power of the federal government and the authority of the law on their side. But the President and Congress now threaten to put the moderates on the defensive. The same thing happened in 1876, and it was over three quarters of a century before the nation remembered what the Constitution is all about.

Industry Shows Disregard:

Stiff Health-Safety Law Pushed As Work Injury Toll Mounts

IF INDUSTRY would show the same concern for the health and safety of its workers as it does for its machines and computers, the mounting toll of job-related deaths, injuries and diseases would be rolled back, declared Mrs. Esther Peterson.

Renewing the call for a strong federal job-safety law, the former Assistant Secretary of Labor said that on-the-job injuries and deaths cost the economy $6 billion to $7 billion a year, "and that doesn't even begin to include" the cost of job-related diseases and their delayed effects.

Mrs. Peterson, who is now legislative representative for the Clothing Workers, said that if industry had to "pay the price in terms of a worker's life," it would be willing to "invest more" in preventing accidents than in compensating workers or their survivors after the accidents happen.

She agreed that it is inconsistent for the Administration to speak out strongly on the need to improve the "quality of life," while it backs a comparatively weak occupational health and safety bill in Congress. The President should be speaking out just as strongly about the "quality of (life in) the workplace," which is just as important, she asserted.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Mrs. Peterson said that growing awareness that the toll of work-related injuries, diseases and deaths is mounting, combined with the increasing demand of workers for the "right to a safe workplace . . . the right to a good working environment," is creating an improved "climate of opinion" for enactment of an effective occupational health and safety law.

"Wouldn't it be splendid if we would treat human beings as well as we do our machines?" she asked.

While machines and computers are given special attention in certain sections of a plant, Mrs. Peterson said that nearby "there may be people working in extreme temperatures, with gases, drafts and so forth, just as though we have no value for human life."

WITH THE CONCERN being placed on the nation's ecology, she noted that workers are beginning to ask more questions about the environment of their plants.

"When workers have found that the air within their plant is worse than outside . . . they begin to realize that it is safer to be outside with all the pollution than where they are working," Mrs. Peterson reported.

She noted that the subcommittee chaired by Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.) has completed hearings on both the labor-backed Perkins-O'Hara bill and the weaker Administration proposal, and is now drafting a measure to take to the full committee. Daniels, she added, "is doing a yeoman job trying to get that bill out."

Mrs. Peterson said that job health and safety is a world-wide problem, and that if we "show that we mean what we say about protecting the lives of our workers," the United States could be the model for other nations.

Washington Window

INTEREST RATES at the highest level in 100 years. . . . National economic growth declines. . . . Unemployment rising. . . . And with all this, the cost of living still rises.

These are some of the strange and frightening trends we are experiencing in our economic picture and many economists are openly expressing serious doubts about the way we are handling them.

Inflation, without question, is a subject of serious concern. The dollar just doesn't go as far as it did; it takes more dollars to buy the necessities of life.

The Nixon Administration says that one of its primary tools in fighting inflation is making the cost of borrowing money so high that people will be discouraged from making major purchases. They say it will help to "cool off" the economy and bring inflation under control.

This policy is known as "tight money" or "hard money." It is a very old economic theory largely identified with Republican administrations of the past.

In 1920, when the Harding Administration assumed power, interest rates were increased to dramatic peaks, leading to the 1921 depression. Again, in 1928, in the Hoover Administration, tight money was pressed and the catastrophic 1929 depression got under way.

During World War II, despite the increase in the national debt of more than $208 billion, the average interest rate on the public debt declined from 2.5 percent to 1.9 percent.

From 1946 to 1950 there was a gradual rise in interest rates. There was a mild recession in 1949.

Beginning in 1953, however, with the Eisenhower Administration, "hard money" policies flowered. The net result was three major recessions. This contrasts with the eight Kennedy-Johnson years in which there were no major recessions.

However, interest rates did start to climb in the latter Johnson years. This was largely through the actions of the Federal Reserve Board and it is important to understand the role of the "Fed."

THE FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM was set up in 1913 by Congress to supervise banking. It was given great power to influence credit conditions. An important way this is done is through setting the rediscount rate member banks are charged when they borrow from the Federal Reserve banks. It is used to signal the desired direction of all interest rates.

By increasing rediscount rates the Fed can effectively raise all interest rates and consequently restrict the supply of credit. This is a "tight money" move.

The charge is frequently made that the Fed is dominated by the bankers. Most of its seven-member board of governors have banking backgrounds and they are appointed by the President.

Only recently, Pres. Nixon appointed one of his closest economic advisors, Arthur Burns, as Fed chairman, replacing William McC. Martin, Jr. And though the Fed is theoretically independent, it is now expected to follow closely the lead of the Administration.

"Hard money" has been used to fight inflation in the past, but it has almost always had these results:

- A lower level of demand, bringing on a recession.
- Higher unemployment.
- A heavy impact on home building, which relies on long-term credit.
- Curbing of government programs using credit for essential social programs.
- An increase in profits of financial institutions.

Opponents of hard money say that in small doses it is not an effective answer to inflation and in large doses it often leads to major recessions or depressions.

IF INDUSTRY PROTECTED its workers as well as it does its machines and computers, the mounting toll of job-related deaths, injuries and diseases would be rolled back, declared Clothing Workers Legislative Rep. Esther Peterson on Labor News Conference. She called for a strong federal occupational health and safety law as she was questioned by Frank Swoboda, left, of Business Week magazine and William Eaton of the Chicago Daily News. The program is broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on Mutual radio.

Staff Internship Program Set in Labor Education

The AFL-CIO announced that it will award a labor education internship for one year beginning July 6 to a college graduate or to a student pursuing a degree in the social sciences.

The intern will become a regular staff member of the AFL-CIO Education Dept. in Washington, D.C., for the year working with senior staff members in the fields of public education, staff training and workers' education programs.

A major objective is to make qualified labor education specialists available to the labor movement. The intern's salary will be $150 a week for the first six months, then $175 a week for the next six months.

Applicants, who must be U.S. citizens, should submit this information no later than May 15: a filled-in application form available from the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, 815 16th St., N.W., Washington D.C. 20006; a transcript of college records through January 1970; a statement of not more than 500 words detailing the applicant's interest in organized labor and some indication of plans for a career.

'Discredit' to Court Seen If Carswell Is Confirmed

Confirmation of Judge George Harrold Carswell to the Supreme Court "would discredit the Senate and the court," four Democratic members of the Senate Judiciary Committee warned.

Dissenting from the majority report filed by Committee Chairman James O. Eastland, they found Carswell's credentials as a jurist "too meager to justify confirmation."

The four senators—Joseph D. Tydings (Md.), Philip A. Hart (Mich.), Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.) and Birch Bayh (Ind.)—charged also that Carswell's record "indicates that he is insensitive to human rights and has allowed his personal views and biases to invade the judicial process."

They cited testimony and expert evidence that "his decisions and his courtroom demeanor have been openly hostile to the blacks, the poor, and the unpopular. This record raises serious questions about his judicial temperament and his ability to provide a fair hearing on many of the great issues that will come before the Supreme Court."

In a detailed 24-page memorandum, the four senators summarized the case against confirmation.

'Slender Credentials'

They quoted the opinion of prominent lawyers who have examined Carswell's legal record. The dean of the Yale Law School said the nominee "presents more slender credentials than any nominee for the Supreme Court put forth this century." The dean of the Harvard Law School found Carswell's level of competence "well below the high standards that one would presumably consider appropriate and necessary for service on the court." And 20 members of the University of Pennsylvania Law School, after examining Carswell's opinions on the bench, dismissed the nominee as "an undistinguished member of his profession, lacking claim to intellectual stature."

The memorandum cited testimony by civil rights attorneys who had argued cases before Carswell that they were treated with discourtesy, harassed, and lectured about "meddling down here and arousing the local people."

Reversals Cited

Case by case, the memorandum cited decisions by Carswell upholding segregation which were reversed by higher courts.

And while welcoming Carswell's current repudiation of the white supremacy speech he made in 1948 as a candidate for the Georgia legislature, the four senators cited a pattern of actions and statements since then demonstrating "a continuing insensitivity to human rights."

The memorandum also dismisses the suggestion that since the Senate rejected the nomination of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., it should now go along with the President's second choice, even if is a worse one.

"Reason presses in precisely the opposite direction," the senators concluded. "If this nominee, as is universally conceded, is inferior to the prior nominee, whom the Senate rejected 55-45, then he certainly ought to be rejected by at least as great a margin."

Revenue 'Sharing' Plan:

'No Strings' Grants to States Draw AFL-CIO Opposition

Federal tax revenues should be used to meet national goals, the AFL-CIO said, regardless of whether the money is spent directly by the federal government or passed on to states and cities.

The federation told a Senate subcommittee that labor opposes legislation to turn over federal tax revenue on a "no strings" basis, without federal standards as to how the money will be spent by states and cities.

"The question of whether or not federal funds should be shared with the states is not at issue," the AFL-CIO said. "The fact of the matter is that huge—though not enough—amounts of federally collected revenues are shared with the 50 states and 81,000 local government units."

Existing grant-in-aid programs, the AFL-CIO statement stressed, will provide more than $27 billion to states and localities in the coming year. "This will amount to about one-fourth of the total federal domestic spending and will be equivalent to almost one-fifth of the revenue that states and localities raise through their own taxation."

Indirect financial aid, such as tax-exempt status of municipal bonds and tax deductibility of state and local taxes, is the equivalent of another $8 billion in federal revenue aid. And this portion, the AFL-CIO statement noted, is in effect financial assistance without "strings."

Labor's position on the controversial issue of "tax sharing" was spelled out in a statement submitted to the Senate's Subcommittee on Intergovernmental Relations, a unit of the Government Operations Committee.

The subcommittee hearings appeared designed merely to provide a forum for discussion of the issues, since tax legislation must originate in the House and would then customarily be assigned to the Senate Finance Committee.

The revenue-sharing bill before the Government Operations subcommittee was drafted by the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations, made up of federal, state, city and county officials plus three public members.

Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.), a member of the commission, introduced the bill last June "for purposes of discussion and further study." It is co-sponsored by Sen. Charles E. Goodell (R-N.Y.).

The legislation would earmark a portion of federal tax revenue for distribution to the states under a formula guaranteeing that a fair share of the money would be passed on to the larger cities.

Another section of the bill is designed to encourage states to turn to more progressive forms of taxation by allowing federal taxpayers to credit 40 percent of their state or local income taxes against their federal income tax. For nearly all taxpayers, this would be more advantageous than the present system which allows state taxes to be deducted from taxable income for persons who itemize deductions.

The AFL-CIO endorsed this section of the bill in principle, suggesting that it be tightened to apply to "progressive" forms of income taxes but not to a flat tax on wages. But the tax credit, it said, is clearly preferable to the present tax deduction system.

And if "no strings federal money to the states and localities were in order," the AFL-CIO said, the "imaginative, well-devised distribution formula" in the Muskie bill would be preferable to revenue-sharing proposals put forth by the Nixon Administration.

But "no matter how well devised," turning over federal funds without earmarking the purposes for which the money is to be used cannot be justified "in an era of extreme budgetary restraint which requires an assurance that every penny of federal funds is used wisely, in the nation's interest and without waste."

Under present economic conditions, the AFL-CIO said, "every effort must be made to get the most out of every federal dollar that can be set aside for education, training, health, pollution control, public assistance, urban transportation" and other high-priority goals.

The AFL-CIO statement also raised the question of whether general purpose grants to the states, without federal standards, would nullify enforcement of a key provision of the Civil Rights Act. This bars discrimination or segregation in any program receiving federal financial assistance.

"Even if all our other apprehensions about the pending legislation were satisfied," the AFL-CIO statement stressed, "we still would have to oppose this measure if an effective method of assuring equal opportunity and nondiscrimination in activities supported through a revenue-sharing program could not be devised."

There is a need to improve the present grant-in-aid system, the AFL-CIO said, both to eliminate overlapping and to provide greater assurance that funds promised in legislation setting up programs will actually be forthcoming.

And, the federation commented, "if the federal government took over the costs of public welfare and saw to it that funds were spent in line with federal performance standards, there would be no need for complex arithmetical formulas to ensure a distribution of federal funds where the payoff in terms of national needs would be greatest."

Railroads in 2 States Told to Rehire Crews

Railroads operating in Washington and Oregon have been ordered by a federal district judge to employ firemen on diesels to the same extent they did before a compulsory arbitration award went into effect in 1964.

Under the award, which expired in 1966, the nation's railroads were allowed to eliminate most firemen from diesels in freight and yard service.

However, the Supreme Court decided that the award did not preempt state full crew laws that specify the size of train and engine crews in various types of service.

In states where such laws were repealed while the award was in effect, full advantage could be taken of it. However, the repeals in Washington and Oregon did not take place until after the award expired.

U.S. District Judge Howard F. Corcoran for the District of Columbia agreed with a charge brought by the former Firemen & Enginemen, since merged into the United Transportation Union, that railroads in both states illegally dismissed firemen.

The railroads, he ruled, "erroneously and in violation of" other court orders "blanked and abolished firemen's positions on runs previously covered by the full crew laws."

What the railroads must do, he declared, is restore the positions and continue to use firemen as required by the union's national diesel agreement in effect prior to the award. That agreement required firemen on most diesels in freight and yard service.

Since the full crew laws of the two states did not require the use of firemen in yards, the railroads' elimination of firemen in this type of service was sustained.

The ruling, unless it is overturned through appeal, requires the railroads in the two states to rehire firemen who were wrongly dismissed and compensate them for lost wages. Handling of individual claims for damages is left to special adjustment boards provided for under the Railway Labor Act.

The only railroad in the two states excepted from the ruling is the Spokane, Portland & Seattle Railway Co., which had a separate agreement with the union not specifying all the crews that had been required under the full crew laws.

presidents have maintained in choosing judicial statesmen for the court."

The group also reviewed Carswell's record on civil rights and concluded that "he has not progressed appreciably beyond the views expressed in his 1948 campaign speech." In the speech referred to, Carswell said, "I yield to no man . . . in the firm, vigorous belief in the principles of white supremacy and I shall always be so governed." In Senate confirmation hearings last month, he said he has since repudiated this racist stand.

On civil rights cases, the Ripon Society stressed, Carswell was repeatedly reversed by higher courts. While serving as a district judge, he was unanimously reversed 15 times on civil rights cases by the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals, on which he now serves.

At a Capitol Hill press conference, Ripon Society spokesmen criticized Carswell's record as a federal district judge. They said their study "showed that Carswell had been reversed more than twice as often as the average for federal district judges, had been cited far less than the average for federal district judges in court opinions, and had written much shorter and less heavily documented opinions than the average for federal district judges."

The cumulative effect, they said, adds up to "a most impressive indictment of Judge Carswell's judicial competence."

At the same time the liberal Republican Ripon Society was blasting Carswell, a non-partisan Columbia University Law School organization was also criticizing his judicial record as marked by "either unusual laziness and sloppiness or simply lack of judicial ability."

The student organization, called "Law Students Concerned for the Court," released a documented fact sheet and statistical study covering the Carswell record on the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals.

The law students made the following indictment:

- Carswell was reversed on 58.8% of his printed opinions which were appealed, nearly three times the national average of 20.2% and the 24.0% average of district judges in his circuit.
- Carswell's opinions have been cited by all other federal and state judges only half as often on the average as federal district judges from the nation as a whole and from his district.
- Carswell documented his printed decisions with case law authority less than half as frequently as the average of all federal district judges, and used legal treatise, book and law review article documentation less than one-third as often.
- Carswell's opinions averaged less than half the length taken by all other federal district judges to explain their decisions.

"Every index applied by the study to the judicial performances of Judge Carswell and of other judges during the same time period found Carswell's rating far below the average of his peers," student spokesmen said.

The statistics bear out the views of legal scholars that "Carswell is badly lacking in professional qualifications," they concluded.

Mills Predicts Passage:

House Panel Clears Welfare Reform Bill

A modified version of the Administration's welfare reform proposals has been approved by the Ways & Means Committee, clearing the way for House action later this month.

Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) predicted that it will pass with strong bipartisan support.

The legislation would replace the present federal-state Aid to Families with Dependent Children program with a new family assistance program aimed at guaranteeing a minimum income for all families with children.

Federal payments alone, however, would still leave families substantially below the poverty cutoff level. It would be up to the states to supplement the federal payment.

A family of four on welfare would receive a basic federal payment of $1,600 a year, under a formula of $500 each for the first two family members and $300 for each additional member. The family would also be eligible for federal food stamps.

States could, if they wished, cut back on the welfare payments they now make. But they could not reduce the combined federal-state benefits below the level in effect in January 1970.

As an incentive for states to supplement the federal payment, the bill offers a federal subsidy of 30 percent of the additional state payment, up to a combined ceiling of $3,553 for a family of four—the current poverty level.

And if a state agreed to have the federal government administer both the basic benefit and the state supplementary program, the federal government would pay all of the administrative costs.

Federal payments would be gradually reduced if a family had other income. There would be no cut in benefits for earnings up to $720 a year, and thereafter benefits would be reduced 50 cents for each dollar earned. For "unearned income," however, such as a pension, benefits would be reduced by the full dollar-for-dollar amount.

Mothers of school-age children would be required to register for jobs or training, a provision criticized by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its meeting last month. The House committee did act to meet the critical shortage of child-care facilities for working mothers by approving 100 percent federal funding of the cost.

The committee bill will be sent to the House floor as separate legislation, with other amendments to the basic Social Security Act put off for later consideration.

If past practice is followed, it will be considered under a "no amendment" rule. This would shift the effort to provide a more adequate level of family assistance benefits to the Senate.

The AFL-CIO and other groups have urged a fully federal public welfare system, with uniform standards of eligibility and payments no lower than the poverty level, increasing automatically as living costs rise.

The AFL-CIO has also urged safeguards against employer exploitation of welfare recipients. The federation said employers should be required to pay persons on welfare at least the minimum wage so that the federal government wouldn't, in effect, be subsidizing low-wage employers.

The House bill would also raise the minimum payment under the separate federal-state program covering persons who are aged, blind or disabled from $90 to $110 a month.

Overall cost of the pending legislation is estimated at $4.4 billion a year as compared with slightly more than $3 billion in federal payments under present welfare programs.

STANDING ROOM ONLY remains as more than 750 delegates jam this auditorium for an area COPE conference in Jacksonville, Fla. The delegates represented unions from Alabama, Florida, Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina and Tennessee. Addressing the crowd is AFL-CIO COPE Dir. Al Barkan, bottom photo. Nine of the 13 area COPE conferences are still to be held. They are slated for Hartford, Conn., Mar. 11; Chicago, Mar. 15; New York City, Mar. 19; Philadelphia, Apr. 3; Minneapolis, Apr. 7; Kansas City, Apr. 11; Portland, Ore., Apr. 24; Denver, Apr. 28, and San Francisco, May 2.

High Interest Pricing Millions Out of Home Ownership Market

Millions of Americans in desperate need of homes are being priced out of the housing market by high interest rates, the AFL-CIO told the House Banking & Currency Committee.

"The same high interest rates are eroding the home buyer's dollar in the supermarket, the clothing store and everywhere he seeks his daily needs—thus further diminishing the amount of funds available for shelter," Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said in a statement to the committee.

Biemiller told the congressmen that the AFL-CIO supports the concepts embodied in three bills before the committee which are designed to pump additional funds into the crippled national home construction program.

One bill sponsored by Rep. Wright Patman (D-Tex.) would instruct the Federal Reserve to purchase obligations of federal agencies to assist in meeting the housing goals.

Biemiller suggested that the bill incorporate the use of pension programs which would invest a portion of their assets in mortgages, much like the practice employed by the AFL-CIO Mortgage Investment Trust.

He noted that the federation has long endorsed the concept of two other House bills calling for direct government loans for the creation of low- and moderate-income housing. One of the bills is co-sponsored by Rep. Leonor K. Sullivan (D-Mo.) and William A. Barrett (D-Pa.); the other is by Patman.

"In addition, we have in the past urged that a portion of the GI Life Insurance Fund be earmarked for veterans' mortgages at reasonable interest rates," Biemiller said.

He stressed that any steps that can bring the cost of money to a more reasonable level will be met with deep gratitude by millions of middle-income Americans who desperately need housing.

And lower interest rates would also be appreciated, he noted, "by tens of thousands of workers who cut the timber, finish the lumber, make the materials and the appliances and the thousands of items used in home building."

Even with the help of the 1968 National Housing Act, home construction continues to decline, he pointed out, and housing starts will likely fall below an annual rate of 1 million before the end of 1970.

While much more federal participation is needed, he suggested, "the failure today is not that of legislation but one of the marketplace where the so-called free forces of commerce have worked their will and the government's tight money policy has emptied that marketplace of potential home buyers."

The culprit is high interest rates, Biemiller stressed.

Interest payments are the major portion of monthly occupancy cost for both the home owner and the renter, he said, noting also that "interest payments are a significant part of the price of the property itself—the interest costs of the developer and building contractor, which are passed on to the ultimate consumer."

Quoting statistics of the National Association of Home Builders, Biemiller pointed out that on-site labor costs dropped from 33 percent to 18 percent of the price of a home between 1949 and 1969. And the cost of materials increased only from 36 percent to 38 percent of the home price.

This means that the cost of the structure itself fell from 70 percent to 56 percent, Biemiller noted.

But during that same 20-year span, the price of land and financing jumped from 16 percent to 31 percent, he said.

"Financing itself rose 100 percent, from 5 percent to 10 percent of the cost of a dwelling," Biemiller emphasized.

He observed that while interest rates skyrocketed between 1965 and 1969—to put the pinch on millions of middle-income Americans—bank profits marked up significant gains. He cited an estimate that in 1969 the 25 major commercial banks posted increases in earnings of about 12.5 percent.

The most recent rise in the interest rate ceiling on FHA and VA mortgages from 7.5 percent to 8.5 percent is frosting on the cake for the banks, Biemiller stated.

"On a 30-year, $20,000 mortgage, the workingman who buys such a house will pay an additional $5,000 for the 1 percentage point boost in interest," he added.

"The interest boost of 1 percentage point (which is a 13.3 percent increase in money) costs him more than the entire on-site labor cost—the total wages and fringe benefits of all workers who built the house."

President Downgrades Spending for Education

The Administration will continue to oppose increased federal spending for education, Pres. Nixon said in a message to Congress.

While bending this year to congressional insistence on appropriating more funds for school children than the Administration sought, Nixon said it was wishful thinking to consider modern schools, smaller classes, better-paid and better-trained teachers and "expensive equipment" as the key to successful education.

He said large-scale federal aid to education in recent years hasn't paid off in a higher level of school achievement for children from disadvantaged homes.

Before putting more money into existing programs, the President contended, long-range research is necessary to understand the "mystery of the learning process."

He proposed a National Institute of Education "as a focus for educational research and experimentation" and asked for $200 million in grants to help states and communities conduct special programs to improve reading ability.

The President also announced that he will establish by executive order a Commission on School Finance to study and report on the money problems of both public and private schools.

The President also hinted at a possible abandonment of large-scale direct federal aid to education.

The "best method" of providing federal aid, he told Congress, "and the one most consistent with local control of education is through the system of revenue sharing."

If this were adopted, he suggested, much of the federal tax money turned over to the states without strings could be used for schools.

In effect, what the President seemed to be proposing was to limit the federal role to research and experimentation, leaving it up to the states, cities and counties to carry the full cost of the educational system. General purpose federal grants would be available, but the states would determine where the money would be used.

CLC, Arts Center Map Joint Projects

Ottawa, Ont. — The Canadian Labor Congress and the National Arts Center have agreed to join in finding ways to extend the "understanding and enjoyment" of the performing arts among union families.

CLC Pres. Donald MacDonald and Trustee Chairman Francois Mercier of the center said an advisory committee is being formed to develop a labor-arts project aimed at involving union members in cultural programs.

2 Areas Added To Substantial Jobless List

The Labor Dept. has added two major manpower centers to the "substantial" unemployment list, increasing the number to seven. It was the first time since June 1968 that additions have been made to the substantial unemployment list.

The two areas are Seattle, Wash., and New Bedford, Mass., which had been classified in the "moderate" unemployment category previously. The five other areas with substantial unemployment are Fresno and Stockton, Calif.; Muskegon-Muskegon Heights, Mich.; Ponce and Mayaguez, Puerto Rico.

The department classifies an area as having "substantial" unemployment when the jobless rate averages 6 percent or more of the workforce and it is not expected to change for two months or more. There are 150 major areas rated by the Labor Dept.

Veto Threat Lifted:

Congress Approves School Aid Increase

cession, the White House had to promise in advance that there would be no cut in two popular programs — "impact" funds for school districts attended by children of servicemen and federal employes, and Hill-Burton hospital construction grants.

An amendment by Sen. Thomas F. Eagleton (D-Mo.) prohibits the President from cutting any specific program more than 15 percent.

The impact aid money, which goes to nearly every school district in the nation, is $300 million above the President's original budget request. Ironically, it was this program that the President singled out in his televised veto message as "inequitable" and "inflationary."

Shifting coalitions in the House and Senate brought the bill to final passage.

When the bill was first before the House, most Republicans joined with southern Democrats to approve the anti-civil rights amendments. But a number of southerners balked at a Republican attempt to cut the amount of money by 2.5 percent, and the motion was defeated.

In the Senate, southern Democrats generally supported the Republicans on the smaller 2 percent fund cut. But, unlike their House counterparts, most Republican senators voted to nullify the segregationist amendments.

Then, when the bill came back to the House, Democratic liberals joined with Republicans in voting to instruct House conferees to accept the Senate changes intact, in a 228-152 vote. The Republicans were anxious to preserve the spending cutback; liberal Democrats wanted to keep the Senate changes in the school segregation language.

Hardly had Congress completed its long battle over the current appropriations than a House Appropriations subcommittee began hearings on the budget for the fiscal year starting July 1. The subcommittee hopes to bring out a separate education funding bill this year, apart from unrelated appropriations and early enough so that schools will have advance notice of how much federal money they can count on next year.

The Senate meanwhile began what promised to be a long, party-splitting debate over extension of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which is due to expire in August.

On the Senate floor is the Administration's bill, passed by the House last year on a narrow 208-203 vote in a victory for the Republican-southern Democratic coalition.

It would replace the clearcut voting rights guarantees now applied to states with past records of discrimination against Negroes with a considerably weaker bill with nationwide coverage, coupled with a general ban on all literacy tests and easing of residency requirements for voting in presidential elections.

The AFL-CIO and civil rights groups are supporting a bipartisan substitute bill sponsored by Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) and Sen. Hugh Scott (R-Pa.), the GOP floor leader.

The Hart-Scott bill would extend the present Voting Rights Act for an additional five years and would add on to it the relatively non-controversial Administration proposals on literacy tests and residence requirements.

There have been hints of a southern filibuster to block adoption of the Hart-Scott substitute. But the longer action is delayed, the longer it will be before the Senate can act on the nomination of Judge G. Harrold Carswell to the Supreme Court—a nomination the conservative southern bloc strongly wants to see confirmed.

Senator's Scare Tactics Aimed At Filling 'Right-to-Work' Coffers

The AFL-CIO's associate general counsel has charged a Republican senator from Florida with promoting "a semi-fraudulent money-raising scheme" on behalf of "right-to-work" forces.

A former GOP state legislator in Maine has accused the same senator of "scaring business management" with phony fright tactics and has asked him "not to insult my intelligence with any more of your propaganda."

The reactions came from Thomas E. Harris, the federation's associate general counsel, and Robert P. Ewer of Bangor, Me., as a result of the latest letter-writing efforts of Sen. Edward J. Gurney (R-Fla.).

Gurney is championing the cause of the National Right to Work Committee in trying to raise a tax-exempt war chest for the avowed purpose of making a legal attack on the union shop, aimed at crippling labor's political activities.

The vehicle for the attack is a legal challenge to an agency shop negotiated by Teachers Local 231 in Detroit, Gurney began telling employers in letters written on his Senate stationery in December.

As recently as Feb. 18, he was still writing employers asking them to kick in sums of up to $500 to the National Right to Work Legal Defense & Education Foundation. He seeks a "bare minimum" of $115,000 to finance the case.

Reed Larson, a vice president of the foundation and the committee which set it up, lowered the goal somewhat—to $65,000—in letters being written as recently as Jan. 29 to those who had ignored Gurney's pitch.

Harris pointed out, however, that the suit against the Teachers was thrown out of court on Jan. 19, well before these letters were written, although neither Gurney nor Larson disclosed that in their soliciting.

Judge Charles Kaufman of the Wayne County (Mich.) Circuit Court dismissed the suit without trial, on a motion for summary judgment. He held that no issue as to political use of union funds was even presented in the case.

The suit is at an end unless Judge Kaufman is reversed on appeal, Harris said, and he noted that "a suit dismissed without a trial could not cost more than a nominal amount."

"In any event," he added, "to appeal for more than a hundred thousand dollars on the pretext of financing this case indicates that it is just a semi-fraudulent money-raising scheme."

The complaining teachers in the case, mostly members of the Detroit Education Association which was previously expelled from the Michigan Education Association, mainly challenged the constitutionality of the agency shop.

Judge Kaufman found no basis for the charge that the agency shop was unconstitutional or other charges that it violated Michigan statutes.

"Nothing encompassed in the agency shop clause encourages anyone to do any more than contribute to the organization selected by a majority of the group to represent it," he said. "This contribution merely spreads among all the beneficiaries the cost of the representation."

Gurney's appeal for money to knock unions out of politics "with a single stroke" accompanied by an appeal from the "right-to-work" group struck a sore point with Ewer.

He wrote back that he took "deep pride" in having twice cast a vote against attempts to outlaw the union shop in Maine when he was a member of the legislature.

"I question very strongly the right of your outfit to call itself 'charitable,' that is, except for its charity in providing an excellent living for such as Reed Larson and his ilk," Ewer declared.

That part of the reply was evidently aimed at the point—a part of every Gurney letter—that "contributions" to the attack on the union shop are "fully tax-deductible."

"If you really want to help the 'victims' of union discipline," Ewer continued, "disband your organization, stop scaring business management and get behind decent union labor."

37-Day Freeze Bars Rail Strike, New Solution to Impasse Sought

mediately followed suit, 343-15. Then Nixon quickly signed the resolution.

The unions announced their strike on Tuesday, Mar. 3, shortly after U.S. District Judge Howard F. Corcoran granted a preliminary injunction against a Union Pacific strike the unions called on Jan. 31.

Previously, Corcoran had extended restraining orders against both the strike and the carriers' threatened lockout of employes on all railroads. In his final hearing, the judge refused to enjoin the lockout.

His reasoning in enjoining the Union Pacific strike was that a strike against a single carrier would constitute "bad faith bargaining" since the dispute had moved to a national level. He conceded the Railway Labor Act was not clear on this point.

Vice Pres. William Winpisinger of the Machinists charged that the ruling "denied the unions the right to strike on any basis other than industry-wide"—a position that the carriers have advocated and "the unions have sought to avoid."

He told newsmen that it would be useless to appeal the injunction because "the last appeal my union was involved in, even on a preferential basis, took three months to get a hearing."

In sending his proposal to Congress, Nixon said "a nationwide stoppage of rail service would cause hardship to human beings and harm to our economy, and must not be permitted to take place."

He noted that a "memorandum of understanding" reached by negotiators in December was ratified by an overall majority of those voting among the 48,000 shopcraft employes, and by a majority in three out of the four unions.

He described his proposal as one that is "as free as possible from government interference."

In his message to the two committees, Meany disagreed with Nixon's description. "This is an anti-democratic proposal which no amount of rationalization can disguise," he said.

"Let me reiterate the AFL-CIO belief," he said. "The government must not ever be permitted to set the terms of collective bargaining agreements in private industry. To do so would be to deny workers their fundamental right as free men."

After the President signed the moratorium resolution, leaders of the four unions immediately notified their locals throughout the country that the strike was off. Although there were some scattered, unauthorized walkouts, they were being terminated.

Meanwhile, the dispute marked time, with the sticking point being the inability of the two sides to resolve a change in a work rule that caused the Sheet Metal Workers to reject the "memorandum of understanding."

The rule would have allowed limited crossing of craft jurisdiction lines in performing "incidental" work.

Winpisinger, in noting that the dispute goes back to Nov. 8, 1968, stressed that after 16 months of "trying every strategy we could devise" the dispute remains unsettled and the unions' skilled journeymen still have a basic wage of only $3.60 an hour.

"They lag far behind those doing comparable work in other industries," he said.

Nearly 3,000 Join March at Iowa Beef Firm

Sioux City, Ia. — Almost 3,000 union marchers from the surrounding four-state area circled the huge Iowa Beef Packers plant near here in a demonstration of support for 1,000 Meat Cutter strikers who have been out since last August.

The early-morning demonstration brought together union members from Iowa, Nebraska, Minnesota, and South Dakota on the eve of a stockholders' meeting of the company.

Demonstrators walked around the three-mile route circling the IBP property. Clearly visible was the cinder-block complex to house imported strikebreakers. Unionists have dubbed the place "Scabtown."

The march began at 4:30 a.m. with a 375-car caravan from union headquarters in Sioux City to the plant site at Dakota City, Neb., where demonstrators began their trek in 25-degree temperature.

Economic Policy Changes Pressed to Stem Downturn

On 5-Year Extension:

Voting Rights Act Clears Senate Test

The Senate firmly rejected the Administration's "southern strategy" and moved towards passage of a labor-supported five-year extension of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which otherwise would expire this summer.

This is the law that broke through the subterfuges many southern states and counties had used for generations to keep Negroes from registering and voting.

With federal registrars on hand to oversee the process, it led to the registration of some 800,000 previously disenfranchised black voters in the Deep South.

The Senate added to the legislation an amendment lowering the voting age to 18 in all elections.

The House last year approved the Administration's bill to dilute the voting rights law and lift the close federal supervision of voter registration in areas guilty of past discrimination. The familiar Republican-southern Democratic coalition succeeded by a narrow 208-203 vote in substituting it for a straight extension of the Voting Rights Act which had been recommended by the House Judiciary Committee.

The House bill lacked meaningful enforcement powers, eliminated a key provision for a goverment veto of changes in voting laws aimed at reducing Negro voting strength, and applied the watered-down law nationwide. It also contained relatively noncontroversial provisions barring all literacy tests for voting and reducing residence requirements for voting in presidential elections.

A bipartisan Senate civil rights coalition got behind a substitute bill sponsored by Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) and Sen. Hugh Scott (R-Pa.).

Jobless Rate Hits 4-Year High of 4.2%

By Duane Emme

The national unemployment rate rose sharply for the second consecutive month to 4.2 percent in February—reaching its highest peak in more than four years. The January rate was 3.9 percent, and December unemployment was 3.5 percent.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics' monthly figures showed that the rate increased by nine-tenths of 1 percent in Pres. Nixon's first full year in office, rising from 3.3 percent.

This February-to-February rise was the greatest increase on a year-to-year basis in more than nine years, according to Harold Goldstein, BLS assistant commissioner.

The unemployment rise, which was spread through all sectors of the work force, underscored the recent warning of the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

The nation, the council said, "is now confronted by both an economic slump and rapidly rising prices, after more than a year of

Lawyers, Scholars Join Carswell Foes

More than 400 prominent attorneys, including the deans of 23 university law schools, have called on the Senate to reject the nomination of Judge G. Harrold Carswell to the Supreme Court.

They charged that Carswell "does not have the legal or mental qualifications essential for service on the Supreme Court."

The statement was signed by presidents and past presidents of major state and city bar associations.

It was signed by 334 law professors from 45 universities—in some cases by the entire law faculty.

Former judges joined in describing Carswell as unqualified to serve "on the Supreme Court or on any high court in the land, including the one where he now sits," the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. So did Ramsay Clark, former U.S. attorney-general.

Yale Law School Dean Louis H. Pollak announced the list of signers at a news conference in Washington. The declaration had been initiated by the president of the New York City Bar Association, Francis T. P. Plimpton; two past presidents, Samuel I. Rosenman and Bethuel M. Webster, and Bruce Bromley, former New York State appellate court judge. Three of the four are Republicans.

Also at the press conference was the dean of the Harvard Law School, Derek C. Bok.

The attorneys said testimony at the Senate Judiciary hearings "indicates quite clearly" that Carswell's attitude "would deny to the black citizens of the United States—and to their lawyers, black or white—the privileges and immunities which the Constitution guarantees."

They found, despite Carswell's

Labor Asks 'Pinpointed' Measures

By David L. Perlman

Labor called for "an immediate change in national economic policy" to halt a downturn that has already thrown hundreds of thousands of Americans out of work and is hitting hardest those who have just gotten a foothold on the job ladder.

In congressional testimony and in major speeches, AFL-CIO spokesmen stressed the human suffering resulting from the Administration's blunderbuss effort to combat inflation through "severe economic restraint."

They hammered away at the urgent need to change economic direction before the downturn becomes a tailspin.

As unemployment climbed sharply for the second month in a row (story, this page), these were some of the points labor was emphasizing:

- AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland told the National Alliance of Businessmen that "the entire concept of providing job opportunities" in private industry is keyed to a full employment economy.

To take up the slack, the government must "become the employer of last resort and provide jobs in public service" because America "cannot provide these workers with hope and encouragement . . . and then callously abandon them in a period of mass unemployment." (Story, this page.)

- Inflation can be curbed by "pinpointed measures that get at specific trouble spots," AFL-CIO

Burger Questions Role Of NLRB on Picketing

The Supreme Court issued rulings in two picketing cases in which Chief Justice Warren E. Burger expressed views that would narrow the authority of the National Labor Relations Board.

Burger joined two other justices in calling for review of the court's 1959 Garmon decision restricting the authority of state courts in labor disputes.

In one case, the court dismissed a writ to review an Alabama court ruling that the Retail Clerks had no right to picket a Mobile grocery because the pickets were trespassing on a private sidewalk. The court said it should not have agreed to review the case in the first place.

The justices also unanimously reversed a Florida court finding that the Longshoremen violated the law when they picketed to protest substandard wages paid to Miami and Fort Lauderdale dockworkers in 1966 by two foreign-flag cruise ships.

In both cases, Burger concurred with the majority but expressed the opinion that state courts should have wider power in trespass cases. He and two other justices said present law gives an employer "no adequate

Kirkland Renews Call For Full Employment

The government must step in as unemployment mounts to provide jobs for the victims of the slackening economy, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland told the National Alliance of Businessmen.

Slack in the economy means unemployment, Kirkland observed, and unemployment threatens the progress and success of the NAB's JOBS program.

Pledging full cooperation of the federation, Kirkland said that future programs of the NAB must be geared to full employment. He noted that "after all, full employment is what the work of the National Alliance of Businessmen is all about."

But this work may be severely impeded in coming months by the rising rate of joblessness, Kirkland warned. He noted that the first victims of increased unemployment are the very people the JOBS programs of business and labor are trying to help.

"If the problem persists," he said, "and the ranks of the unemployed deepen, the entire concept of providing job opportunities for the disadvantaged jobless workers will be put to an extreme test."

Speaking at the third annual conference of the NAB in Washington, Kirkland said that extended unemployment is more than any private group can contend with on its own resources.

"But what we can do—and what the AFL-CIO will do—is insist that the government become the em-

$10,000 Gift To CARE Aids Needy Nations

Subsisting on little more than a hunger diet, nearly 7,000 children in Bombay, India, will receive a bottle of milk each day this year thanks to a gift to CARE from the AFL-CIO.

In Colombia, Sierra Leone, Korea and Hong Kong, CARE operations will also aid in the survival of thousands of other persons because of contributions from union members and the recent $10,000 gift from the federation.

The report comes from regional CARE representatives who acknowledged the distribution of the funds—$2,000 to each of five depressed locations—from the federation's $10,000 gift.

In Hong Kong, the funds are being used with other CARE donations to help supplement the diets of 25,000 school children. CARE is also supplying basic school items to help in their education.

In Sierra Leone, the AFL-CIO gift is helping to pay for hot lunches for more than 90,000 school children. The money is also being used in a general CARE fund for construction materials to help villagers build schools or health centers.

The federation's CARE funds allocated to Colombia are going toward the construction of sorely needed water and sewer systems. About 30 aqueducts have already been constructed with materials imported from the United States by CARE.

CARE officials in Korea said the federation's gift is being used to help provide food packages for tuberculosis patients in Seoul. More than 5 percent of the nation is afflicted with TB, the highest rate in Asia.

The food packages are improving diets of patients to help increase their resistance to the disease, the Korean CARE report said.

HOT SCHOOL LUNCHES are served students in a village school in Sierra Leone on funds coming from a $10,000 gift to CARE from the AFL-CIO. The federation's contribution to CARE was shared by four other countries.

House Urged to Adopt Mass Transit Program

Early House enactment of a Senate-passed bill to provide $10 billion in grants and loans over 12 years to develop and improve mass-transit programs has been urged by the AFL-CIO.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said the legislation is "soundly devised" to finance badly-needed expansion of mass transportation. His testimony was presented to a House Banking subcommittee by Legislative Rep. Kenneth Meiklejohn.

The legislation passed by the Senate in February would provide a new program of loans to states and local public bodies for the acquisition of property required in developing transit systems.

The program would help replace and expand facilities for both train and bus travel.

Although similar legislation was proposed by the Administration last August, the bill that passed the Senate was worked out with interested transit groups, representatives of mayors, private transit companies and labor.

Biemiller said that the legislation would "for the first time" begin to meet the demonstrated transportation needs of the nation.

He pointed out that while some progress has been made under the Urban Mass Transportation Act of 1964 in meeting transit needs, the amount of federal funds appropriated under the law "has not been sufficient to make the really major impact in dealing with our urban transportation problems that is urgently required."

Biemiller urged the House to retain provisions of the Senate bill, added by an amendment on the floor, that would direct the Secretary of Transportation to require that federally-aided projects provide for protection of natural resources and the environment.

"In the light of the growing national concern with environmental problems," Biemiller said, "it seems essential that provisions such as these should be included in any legislation to provide financing for urban transportation."

He also submitted a copy of the resolution on mass transit adopted by the 1969 AFL-CIO convention which emphasized the importance of retaining prevailing wage and labor protection provisions under the Mass Transportation Act.

Soundly-based legislation to provide for financing of mass transit projects "is of great interest and concern to millions of union members and their families who depend upon public transportation," Biemiller testified.

They need it, he continued, "to get to and from the places where they work, where they shop and go for entertainment, and the schools, libraries and cultural institutions to which they send their children."

"It also is of immediate and direct importance," he pointed out, "to the several hundreds of thousands of members of AFL-CIO unions in the construction and transportation fields who build and operate our urban mass transportation systems."

For the poor, Biemiller testified, the need for the development of public transportation is of crucial importance.

He noted that "fewer than half" of the families with poverty-level incomes own automobiles "and often there are not adequate transit facilities at all available to places where they can find work, let alone get their kids to school."

Risks of Fire Fighters Mount as Wages Lag

The job of the professional fire fighter becomes more dangerous every year but his salary does not keep pace with the risk, a research firm reported after a survey of U.S. fire departments.

The report spurred the AFL-CIO Fire Fighters to renewed efforts to get Pres. Nixon to name the members of a National Commission on Fire Prevention and Control, authorized by the Fire Research and Safety Act of 1968, and to get Congress to appropriate an estimated $500,000 in funds for research into the prevention and suppression of fires.

A survey made for the IAFF by Stanley H. Ruttenberg & Associates, Inc., concludes that there are more deaths and injuries among firemen than among police, and that the fire fighter's job is much more dangerous than that of the average industrial worker.

The professional fireman must learn how to deal with fires, floods, accidents, explosions, building collapses, and more than 2,000 potentially dangerous reactions to the use of an ever-increasing number of industrial chemicals.

The result, Ruttenberg reported, has been a "virtual explosion" in the number of formal advanced courses for men in fire service.

At the same time firemen are giving more of their "alert" time to safety inspections and other civic duties while some cities seek to downgrade their salaries because they seem to "sit around" more than those in police service, the report showed.

With fire injuries and dollar losses at record high points, municipal spending for the fire service dropped from 7.3 percent in 1957 to 6.8 percent in 1967 while employment in the fire service declined from 3.7 percent to 3.2 percent, Ruttenberg said.

Almost every municipality was spending less for fire protection at the end of the 10-year span. The maximum was put at 11.2 percent of general city expenditures in Oregon against a low of 3.3 percent in the District of Columbia—a reduction in both cases.

Salary levels in nearly every city were generally several hundred dollars below the income needed for moderate family living as estimated by the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics. They were several thousand dollars below the amount needed for BLS's higher family budget, Ruttenberg said.

Fire Fighters' salaries as of 1967 ranged from a maximum of $10,974 in Los Angeles—$211 a week—to a maximum after long service of $6,420 in Nashville, Tenn.—$123 a week.

IAFF Pres. William H. McClennan said more than 12,000 persons lose their lives in fires every year while damage last year was at the highest level in history. His union represents 143,000 of an estimated 200,000 U.S. and Canadian fire fighters.

Jobless Rate Hits Four-Year Peak

the Administration's policy of severe economic restraint, imposed in the name of combatting inflation."

The council urged a "decisive change" in economic policy—including steps to control "profit inflation" and a congressional review of monetary policies—to achieve price reductions without creating "a growing army of unemployed."

The February increase in the unemployment rate of three-tenths of 1 percent followed a January surge of four-tenths of 1 percent, the largest monthly rise in nine years.

The seven-tenths of 1 percent increase since December was the sharpest for any two-month period since October to December 1957, when the country was in a recession.

The overall February rate, the highest since October 1965, reflected an increase in unemployment that occurred almost entirely among adult, full-time workers.

A slowdown in the demand for labor "has become particularly evident in the manufacturing industries," BLS said, where employment has declined steadily since last August, and the jobless rate has risen sharply.

The government noted that the unemployment rate in durable goods manufacturing rose to 4.7 percent in February, nearly double the 2.5 percent post-Korean War low in February 1969.

The jobless rate for adult men increased from 2.5 to 2.8 percent in February, also the highest level since October 1965. The rate for adult women climbed from 3.6 to 4.1 percent. Among both sexes, the biggest rises were in the rates of those 20 to 24 years old.

Unemployment rates for white and Negro workers increased. The white rate moved from 3.6 to 3.8 percent, while the Negro rate rose from 6.3 to 7 percent.

The government said the unemployment rate for blue-collar workers went up to 5 percent last month, from 4.6 percent. The white-collar rate increased from 2.1 to 2.3 percent.

The "job-loss pattern" of recent months—with most unemployment occurring among workers who lost their jobs instead of new entrants to the labor force—shows up clearly among the blue-collar workers, BLS said.

The only decrease in jobless rates among the categories surveyed by the government occurred for teenagers, where the rate dropped from 13.8 to 13.4 percent between January and February.

Total unemployment was 3.8 million in February, up from 3.4 million in January. After seasonal adjustment, the increase was about 250,000. About one-third of the rise was attributed to production cutbacks in the auto industry.

On the jobs side, non-farm payroll employment was 69.7 million in February, seasonally unchanged over the month. Payroll employment would have shown a decline except for a large number of workers who returned to jobs after ending strikes, BLS said.

Employment gains of 80,000 in contract construction and 65,000 in trade were countered by a decline of 160,000 jobs in manufacturing.

In manufacturing, the government pointed out, the decline occurred despite "the net return of more than 100,000 workers who had been on strike" in January. Such workers are not counted as employed in the Labor Dept.'s analysis.

As for the pickup in construction, it was noted that this, in part, reflected a return to work from "unusually bad" weather in January. Goldstein said that construction jobs were down about 50,000 in February when compared with December.

A special BLS analysis found that job increases have averaged only 29,000 a month between October 1969 and last month, in contrast to an average monthly gain of 185,000 for the year preceding October 1969.

The most marked change has been in manufacturing, where jobs have been decreasing at a rate of 88,000 a month since October 1969, while they increased at 26,000 a month in the the prior 12-month period.

In another area, the Labor Dept. announced that the average workweek for rank-and-file workers edged up one tenth of an hour in February to 37.5 hours, seasonally adjusted. A sharp drop in the workweek in manufacturing was more than offset by increases in other industries.

Average weekly earnings before taxes increased $1.06 in February to $117.18. For the year ending in January 1970, it was pointed out, "weekly earnings rose 5.3 percent but, after adjustment for price changes, declined by eight-tenths of 1 percent."

Joseph Moreschi Dies, Ex-Leader of Laborers

Joseph V. Moreschi, who helped make the Laborers one of the nation's largest unions, died in Hot Springs, Ark., at 85.

Moreschi retired in November 1968 after 42 years as president of the Laborers. He had been living in Hot Springs since his retirement with the title of president emeritus.

His successor, Pres. Peter Fosco, said Moreschi "always believed deeply in his fellow man and his right to a better life."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland expressed "deep regret" on learning of Moreschi's death. In a message of condolence to his family and his union, they said "his devotion to the trade union movement and his genuine concern for his fellow man will long stand as a monument to his memory."

Funeral services were to be held in Chicago. The Moreschi family includes two sons, John of Chicago and Faust of Alexandria, Va.

When Moreschi was first elected president in 1926, the union was known as the Hod Carriers, Building & Common Laborers. Its membership stood at 20,000. When Moreschi retired because of illness, it had 500,000 members and since has grown to 550,000.

Born in Italy, Moreschi came to this country at the age of eight and his family settled in Chicago. He joined Chicago Local 1 in 1912, and soon displayed leadership qualities that helped bring his election as president of Local 1, president of the Laborers District Council, and in 1921, vice president of the international union.

To Rebuild Merchant Fleet:

Maritime Program Endorsed by Unions

The Administration's new 10-year program to rejuvenate the nation's merchant marine was supported by the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. in testimony before Congress.

Paul Hall, department president, urged enactment of the President's maritime bill with some amendments and clarifications.

Hall, who also is president of the Seafarers, testified in detail on key aspects of the proposal before House and Senate Commerce subcommittees, as did a number of representatives of individual maritime unions.

The Administration program, sent to Congress late last year, seeks to make it possible for the U.S. industry to build 30 ships annually over the next 10 years—three times as many as in fiscal 1969.

The government would pay some $300 million each year in subsidies to builders, compared to about $232 million last year.

The program also calls for "differential subsidies" for U.S. ship operators to compensate them for the wage and insurance costs they have which are higher than the low-wage operations under foreign flags.

The House subsequently approved a $429 million authorization for the Maritime Administration with $199.5 million earmarked for shipbuilding subsidies. Sponsors said this would be enough to build the first 19 ships in the Administration's program.

On the ship construction phase of the program, Hall said the emphasis on subsidies should go to bulk cargo carriers as opposed to break-bulk carriers, since the bulk type now carry 85 percent of the nation's trade.

He expressed satisfaction at Maritime Administrator Andrew E. Gibson's pledge that present bulk operators would be given a preference in receiving construction differential subsidies.

In discussing the bill's provisions for operating subsidies, Hall emphasized that maritime labor has long sought "expansion of all sections of the U.S. fleet that will be fair and equitable to all classes of operators."

Labor, Hall added, would have preferred that the bill's operating subsidies apply not just to deep-sea vessels but also to operators on the Great Lakes and fishing fleets. He urged the committees to give separate attention to their needs.

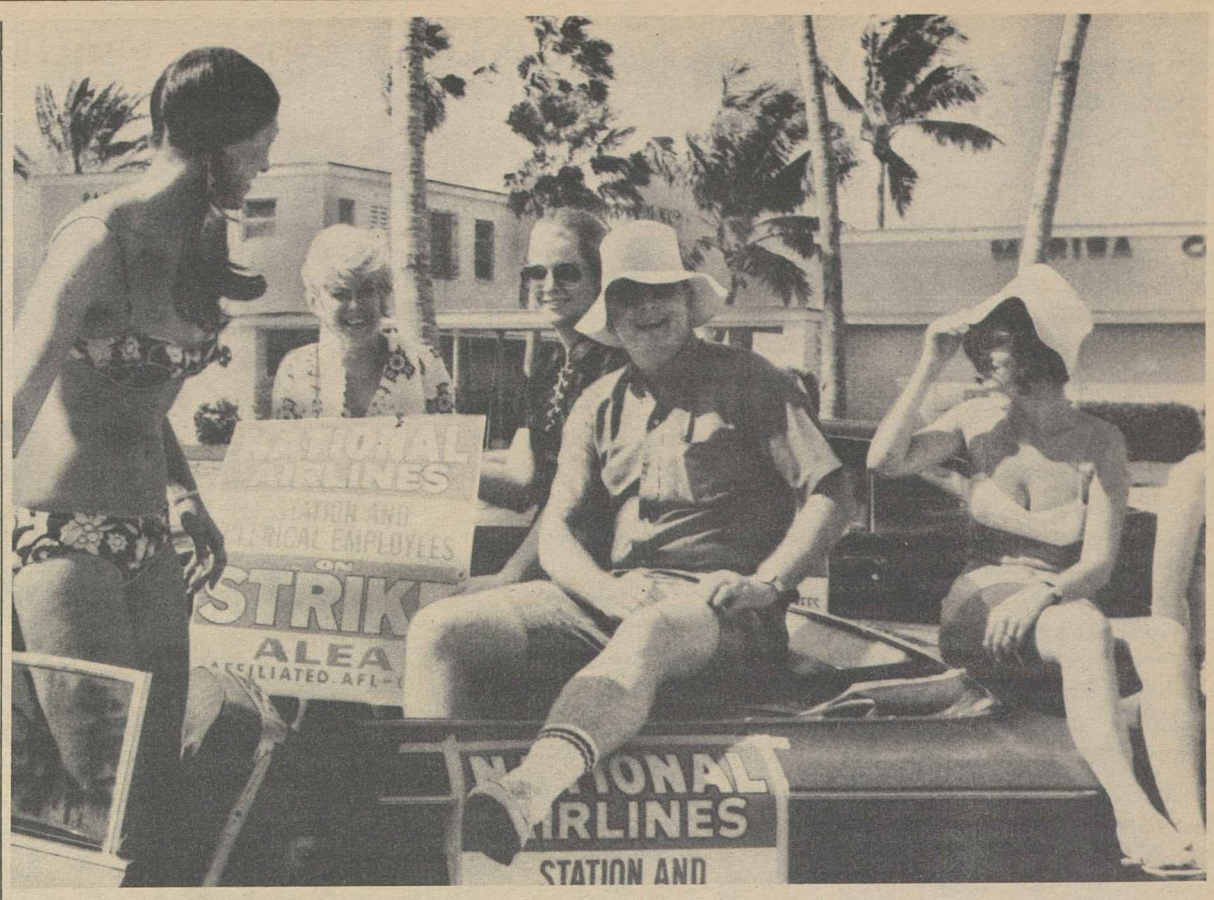
He voiced support for a provision of the legislation that expands a tax-deferment program to induce shipbuilding from its present coverage of berth-line operators to the entire merchant fleet engaged in foreign trade.

In another area, Hall urged that the government continue to promote government-generated cargoes through a system of preferential rates to unsubsidized carriers until the legislation's new operating subsidies are fully developed.



Hall said the conduct of hearings and the legislation have made it "obvious that both committees and the Administration are committed to the development of a program that will deal with the needs of all segments of the American maritime industry."

"Certainly the bill cannot be all things for all men," he concluded, "and understandably there will be areas where experience will call for re-evaluation. But the matter of primary importance is to get on with the program."

Joseph Curran, chairman of the AFL-CIO Maritime Committee and president of the National Maritime Union, also testified before both subcommittees on the proposed legislation.

Curran expressed the view that the program was not broad enough and not positive enough regarding passenger liners. He presented details as to what this service means in terms of jobs and their contributions to the nation's economy.

He told the hearings that the unions comprising his committee "have always fought for a strong effective U.S. shipbuilding industry as part of a strong U.S. merchant marine."

Conservatives on Senate Panel Accuse NLRB of Helping Labor

The conservative majority of a Senate Judiciary subcommittee has issued a report based on hearings held on the National Labor Relations Board in 1968, and—as expected—has accused the agency and the courts of being pro-labor.

The majority—Senators Sam J. Ervin (D-N.C.), subcommittee chairman, John L. McClellan (D-Ark.) and Roman L. Hruska (R-Neb.)—also charged the NLRB and the courts, particularly the Supreme Court, with violating the intent of Congress.

They recommended that the board adopt broad rules, cut down on deciding individual cases and hold a conference biennially to review its work. The changes would require legislation.

A fourth member of the subcommittee — Sen. Quentin N. Burdick (D-N.D.) — vigorously dissented from the majority's findings, charging that they were "grossly unfair."

During the subcommittee's three months of hearings in the spring of 1968, there were frequent challenges to its jurisdiction over NLRB affairs. A number of witnesses stressed that this area ought to be the province of the Senate Labor Committee.

At the hearings, conservative lawmakers and businessmen chastised the board, charging it with hampering employers and exceeding authority given to it by Congress.

By contrast, labor attorneys, including Thomas E. Harris, AFL-CIO associate general counsel, and Bernard Kleiman, counsel for the Steelworkers, countered that the board actually has been cautious in exercising power.

Harris emphasized that employers "most vituperative" in criticizing the board are the same ones who most often deny workers' rights. Kleiman said the NLRB, in fact, "has never fully implemented much of the authority" given to it by Congress.

The majority, in the subcommittee's 30-page report, echoed the views of the employer witnesses and attacked the board for having "unreasonably emphasized" the need for collective bargaining and strong unions.

As for the courts and "especially the Supreme Court," the majority charged that they have "written their own notion of labor policy" into the National Labor Relations Act and also have overemphasized the need for strong unions.

The majority didn't accept the idea of a "labor court" being substituted for the NLRB, as other conservatives have proposed. Such a court, it was held, "would accentuate the undesirable reliance on adjudication."

Yet, the majority favored abolishing the board and transferring its function to U.S. District Courts if it cannot be "improved" by legislation to require it to adopt broad rules and hold conferences.

In another area, the majority called for "some check on the power" of the agency's general counsel to issue or refuse to issue complaints under the law. He, too, was charged with favoring unions over managements.

Burdick suggested that the majority's charge that the board and the courts have been pro-labor and have usurped congressional power is based on an erroneous view of the law.

He cited numerous decisions to demonstrate "that the majority has wholly failed to show that the board . . . has engaged in the clear frustration of congressional will."

Burdick emphasized that the courts' consistent upholding of recent NLRB positions—in more than 80 percent of cases appealed in 1967—"is powerful evidence that those decisions did not represent departure from legislative intent."

The majority's condemnation of the board in areas where it has no understanding and jurisdiction "is the clearest demonstration of Congress's wisdom in making the board independent," Burdick said.

The North Dakota senator opposed the majority's recommendation that the board issue far-reaching policy rules. He also opposed any substitution of the courts for the board. He supported the plan for conferences if they do not involve board members in debate.

The majority's attack on the NLRB general counsel was described by Burdick "as failing to present a balanced picture on actions criticized and as being outside the committee's jurisdiction."

ILO to Pick Successor To David Morse in May

Geneva, Switzerland—The Governing Body of the International Labor Organization has scheduled a special session May 18-21 to elect a new director general.

The 48 worker, government and employer members of the executive council did not name a successor to David A. Morse at their regular March session here.

Morse's resignation, after nearly 22 years at the ILO's helm, is effective May 31.

The Governing Body reviewed the ILO's work in the field of on-job safety and the health of workers. Rudolph Faupl, U.S. worker delegate, called for "greater generosity" in the allocating of funds for this work instead of "pious statements" of concern for the safety and health of workers.

He stressed the need to recognize that the guarding against accidents was the joint responsibility of governments, employers and workers.

Faupl, Machinists international representative, was assured by the ILO officials reporting to the committee that an ILO guide on the mounting of accident-prevention devices on machinery was under preparation.

Portugal's denial of the right to strike was strongly denounced in a report by the ILO committee on Freedom of Association.

By adopting the report the Governing Body decided to call on the Portuguese government to recognize that the "right of workers and their organizations to strike is a legitimate means of defending their occupational interests."

Portugal was summoned by the Governing Body to repeal the country's present legislation which, it noted, "prohibits strikes altogether."

The employers group seconded Jean Moeri, veteran Swiss leader of the worker delegates, when he sharply attacked the Libyan government over the imprisonment of Salah Shita, a trade union official.

By preventing Shita, a worker member of the Governing Body, from attending the ILO sessions, the Libyan government was flouting its ILO obligations, Moeri said.

The embarrassed explanations of the government that Shita was being held for political reasons rather than because of his trade union activities caused "even more concern," Moeri said.

Wage Agreement Ends Strike by Gravediggers

New York—Gravediggers and greenskeepers at 44 area cemeteries ended an eight-week strike and returned to work after winning new contract terms in a settlement secured with the aid of the State Mediation Board and Pres. David Sullivan of the Service Employes.

The 21-year-old union of 1,700 workers struck Jan. 12 in protest of low wages and difficult working conditions. While the strikers were out, a backlog of 15,000 burials accumulated and the state legislature passed a law proposed by Gov. Nelson Rockefeller (R) to force a voluntary settlement or compulsory arbitration.

Members of SEIU Local 365 voted by a 2-1 margin to approve an employers' proposal providing wage increases of $13 a week retroactive to Jan. 1, and $10.50 additional on July 1 to bring their weekly wage to $150.

Other issues, including length of contract, improved pensions, better working conditions and future wage increases will be submitted to Arbitrator Hugh E. Sheridan for a final and binding decision.

The long dispute was mediated by Chairman Vincent D. McDonnell of the State Mediation Board. The union case was presented by SEIU Executive Sec. Thomas R. Donahue, representing Sullivan, and a membership committee headed by Pres. Stanley Matuszewski.

During the strike the union's 10-member executive board voted unanimously to reject compulsory arbitration and to hold out for a negotiated settlement of the wage issue.

'Good' and 'Bad' Economics

THE ADMINISTRATION is turning up the heat to cool off the economy and this contradiction is producing a new set of value judgments that strain to the outer limits the normal usage of the English language.

For example, higher interest rates are "good" because they hike the price of money and prevent or delay all sorts of socially and economically important projects—especially homebuilding—in the name of slowing up the economy and combatting inflation. It's "good" also for the bankers and lenders of money who are accumulating record profits as interest rates hit a 100-year high.

Wage increases, on the other hand, are "bad" because they put more money in the pockets of workers who will spend these dollars to maintain a decent standard of living.

Price increases fall into an inconclusive, neutral area. They are "good" if they prevent people from buying things, thus helping to cool off the economy; they are "bad" in the sense that they increase profits and stimulate new capital investment, already at boom levels.

There is no doubt, however, that a rise in unemployment is "good" because it proves that the Administration's cooling off policies are working. The jump to 3.8 million unemployed workers in February, including an increasingly larger proportion of adult, full-time workers, is a direct result of the Administration doing battle with inflation.

THE QUESTION of whether the "good" of tight money and credit policies—the heat that really cools—has been allowed to go too far is being argued around the Administration and there may be some steps to ease the situation by turning down the flame a bit.

But the overall effect of severe, across-the-board restraint to stop economic growth has brought on a slump and the danger of a continuing slack, recession, or whathaveyou.

Part of the problem stems from economic policy theory applied by this Administration that the AFL-CIO told the Joint Economic Committee of Congress is "too simplistic for a huge, complex and rapidly changing economy in a nation of continental size."

Structural changes and problems are bypassed and essential social needs—decent housing and rebuilding the cities—are sacrificed; social equity and income distribution are ignored.

Instead of the economic semantics of an Administration willing to take a rise in unemployment with a sort of a "shrug," there is a need for a deep and thorough reassessment of the nation's current situation. The AFL-CIO put it this way to the commitee:

"America can no longer rely, solely, on aggregate fiscal and monetary analysis that was originally developed in the 1930s and 1940s —before the onset of rapid and radical changes in technology, economic structures, urban growth and race relations.

"The social and economic consequences of national economic policies—job opportunities of blue collar workers, for example, or meeting such high-priority social needs as housing and the rebuilding of urban areas and on the distribution of income—can no longer be ignored in a simplistic focus on aggregate national averages that conceal and distort almost as much as they reveal about the well-being of the people.

"An emphasis in national economic policy on selective approaches pinpointed to get at specific problems and to achieve specific social and economic priorities is needed."

"Bad" news is not "good" news no matter what the Administration calls it.

Urban Decay

A Word Edgewise:

Moynihan's Views Challenged But His Integrity Is Defended

By John P. Roche

DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN, counselor to the President of the United States, hit what Pres. Johnson used to call the "funny papers": a private memorandum he wrote to Pres. Nixon in January was featured in the New York Times.

The memo dealt with the position of the Negro in American society, a touchy topic, and Moynihan's views were quite distinctive. To summarize, he suggested that: (1) In objective terms, Negroes are progressing at a remarkable rate. (2) In subjective terms, one could expect this progress to create serious problems because of the increasing psychological gap created by rising Negro expectations. (3) It would be a mistake to believe that federal crash programs can alleviate this tension.

The publication of this controversial document touched off a wave of denunciation. Moynihan was accused of "selling out," of being a "phony liberal," a "racist," etc. There was also a lot of speculation in Washington on who threw the knife. That is, who leaked the memo? And why? The ubiquitous Xerox makes this a futile entertainment.

I was once infuriated to have a journalist quote to me a confidential memo I had written to the Under Secretary of State, but then I discovered that 30 copies had been routinely distributed. Thenceforth I sent no memos to Foggy Bottom that I was not prepared to see in the papers.

But what about the attack on Moynihan's integrity? Since readers have a right to know the background in this sort of matter, let me state that Pat Moynihan and I have been vigorous opponents on a number of issues over the last few years.

Moynihan, for example, has long believed that the key to social pathology among Negroes is the female-headed family. This was the core of the "Moynihan Report" and found its way into Pres. Johnson's commencement address at Howard University June 4, 1965.

The response was little short of ferocious. Negro and civil rights groups went after Moynihan (and Johnson) with absolutely irrational frenzy, and predictably the President took a dive.

His objective was civil rights, not reforming the Negro family, and he coldly and correctly saw all this whooping about one paragraph in a speech as hindering his progress. Figuratively speaking, Moynihan was thrown off the back of the sled, and the wolves had quite a feast.

Moynihan was sore at Johnson—to understate it considerably—but the fact is that his accepting Nixon's offer was anything but a "sellout."

MOYNIHAN IS A MAN with strong principled views that fit no particular ideological pattern. To approximate, he is a policy liberal and a structural conservative; he holds firmly to liberal goals, but he is a historical pessimist who is profoundly skeptical of "instant reform." Conflict with Johnson was thus in the cards; Moynihan is the epitome of the anti-populist.

The leaked memo to Pres. Nixon is cut from precisely the same cloth. Moynihan has betrayed nobody, and only a black Yahoo could call him a "racist."

My objection is on a completely different level and it is political, not personal. I know of no better way to avoid innovation than to start a historical discussion—talking about the burdens of history, in other words, becomes a substitute for making history. Moynihan's detached, ironic intelligence thus provides an ideal theoretical base for those who cling to the status quo.

. . . What Can Be Done What Will Be Done . . .

Extended unemployment obviously is more than any private group can contend with on its own resources.

But what we can do—and what the AFL-CIO will do—is insist that the government become the employer of last resort and provide jobs in public service employment programs.

For America cannot provide these workers with the hope and encouragement that is implicit in the NAB program and then callously abandon them in a period of mass unemployment.

While Children Suffer:

Nixon's School 'Reform' Plan Branded as Stalling Maneuver

The following is excerpted from an editorial "The Never-Never Land of Education" which appeared in the March 7, 1970, edition of the Washington Post.

THERE IS HARDLY a platitude ever uttered about education that is not contained in the President's special message to Congress on educational reform. It is as though someone snipped sentences from all the annual school reports ever written—on a basis of the frequency of their recurrence.

"We now have reason to believe that young people may be learning much more outside school than they learn in school." What a discovery!

"We must stop pretending that we understand the mystery of the learning process." Who's pretending?

"Our schools have served us nobly for centuries." Uh huh.

"When educators, school boards and government officials alike admit that we have a great deal to learn about the way we teach, we will begin to climb the up staircase toward genuine reform." Well, really!

And, finally, under the heading "The Future of Learning in America," we are informed that "the tone of this message, and the approach of this Administration, is intended to be challenging." It isn't challenging. It's bromidic, soporific, deadening. It drones on and on like a sermon designed to induce slumber.

Indeed, that appears to be its purpose—to postpone doing anything whatever about the country's faltering public school system until we have learned with perfect certainty and indisputable unanimity the one irreproachably wise and right thing to do. In the meantime, children of school age whose time for education moves on inexorably, never to become available to them again, will kindly wait with docility and decorum in their overcrowded, understaffed classrooms while their elders ponder the inscrutable future.

It is true, of course, that there is much that we do not now know about how to teach children—or even what to teach them. But it is not true that we know nothing. It is true that some of the teaching patterns of the past have proved imperfect. But it is not true that all of them are worthless—or that it is necessary to write on a completely clean slate in American education. We have not conducted the oldest, broadest, most successful public school system in the world for more than a hundred years without having learned a thing or two about teaching.

Here are some things the President can encourage the country's school authorities to do—encourage by federal financial aid—while they are waiting for the President's projected National Institute of Education and his Commission on School Finance to propose new and perfect programs:

1. A large part of the physical plant in which children go to school in America is antiquated, desperately overcrowded and hazardous to health and safety. It takes a long time to plan and build schools; and there is no need whatever to wait for the institutes and the commissions to tell us so.

2. It is indisputable that a high ratio of pupils to teachers impedes learning. The ratio is unconscionable in many classrooms all over the country. We desperately need to train teachers, to recruit gifted and dedicated young people into the teaching profession. While the institutes and commissions are figuring out new ways to do this, it would be well worth while to enlarge and invigorate the Teacher Corps, an admirable and effective program for bringing young teachers to inner city schools.

3. Title I of the Elementary & Secondary Education Act, designed to aid disadvantaged children in disadvantaged areas of the big cities, has abundantly proved itself in practice. It works. It has produced a real breakthrough in education. It ought to be dramatically expanded while the institutes and commissions are wagging their heads and stroking their chin whiskers.

4. School libraries are an invaluable aid to education. They stimulate children to read, a practice vastly preferable to occupying the principal's office or setting fire to city hall. It has now been proven beyond any peradventure and beyond any possibility of contradiction by an institute or a commission that books are good for you. While waiting for the institutes and the commissions, let's put some books where school children can use them. There are 40,000 elementary and secondary schools in the United States which have no school libraries at all. The lesson of this is plain to pupils: it teaches them a contempt for reading.

5. The schools are desperately in need of psychiatrists and consultants to help children find themselves and learn what is keeping them from learning. Pending any institute or commission finding to the contrary, let's give the schools these vital assistances.

6. The President himself said in his message that "in the development of the mind, child's play is serious business. One of my first initiatives upon taking office was to commit this Administration to an expansion of opportunities during the first five years of life. That commitment was based on new scientific knowledge about the development of intelligence—that as much of that development takes place in the first five years as in the next 13." Well, fine. We're not sure the President invented it. But, anyway, that's the idea behind the Head Start program. Until the institutes and commissions come up with a new name for it, there is every good reason to push on with existing programs to give children in the first five years of life a good head start on learning.

The President's message is a political ploy, a stall, an evasion. It is not a program for educational reform so much as a scheme for sweeping the kiddies under the living room rug while grown-ups enjoy their cocktails. Children, it is true, are sometimes a nuisance and an expense. But the cost and trouble of pretending that they aren't there can be catastrophic.

Redistribution Top Priority:

Labor Ranked at Forefront In Meeting Challenges of '70s

THE LABOR MOVEMENT will provide the "initiative and political dynamics" needed to meet the "basic challenges" of income and population redistribution the nation will face throughout the Seventies, a union leader and author has predicted.

Rising taxes and continuing inflation take an ever-bigger bite out of the pay envelope of the average worker, who once thought he was doing fairly well, but is now beginning to realize he's not doing so well after all, said Gus Tyler, assistant president of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

Tyler also pointed out that most union members live in the "urban centers and the fringe suburban areas," where they are daily confronted by the problems of population density and the resulting environmental pollution, as well as comparatively high living costs, and will be "motivated" to ease those problems.

Questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, an AFL-CIO produced public affairs radio interview, Tyler declared, "American trade unions have the cohesiveness, the organizational muscle and the political know-how to institute the kind of movement" it will take to bring about solutions to the problems resulting from long-postponed redistribution of income and population.

He predicted a "very conscious effort" by organized labor during the Seventies to assure that the vast group of workers in this country earning $3,000 to $15,000 a year "gets a fairer share" of the national income than they get now.

THE FASTEST-GROWING sector of union organization today is among employes of state, county and city governments, Tyler said, noting that some of those governmental units are prepared to bargain with the unions, "but those that aren't are getting prepared."

"The assumption at almost all levels of government in the United States is, if you have employes, you had better get ready to bargain with them," he added.

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE VALUE of new construction for non-farm residential buildings during January was down 18 percent over the level for January 1969, according to figures just published by the Commerce Dept. Much of today's residential construction is centered in expensive housing rather than housing that the average worker can afford.

In speeches and testimony before congressional committees Administration officials are raising a cry of alarm that has long been sounded by organized labor.

"I appreciate this opportunity to discuss the very serious situation in housing and, more particularly, the problem of housing finance," George Romney, secretary of Housing & Urban Development, told the Senate Banking & Currency Committee.

"All of us present here are concerned and distressed about the severe impact that tight money has had and is having on housing," Chairman Preston Martin of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board told the same committee.

A housewife in Ohio didn't get before the Senate committee, but she stated it well when she said: "I wish there were some houses that normal people could afford."

The fact is that largely due to the "tight money" policies of the Federal Reserve Board and the fiscal policies of the Administration, housing starts in the United States have dropped so low that the housing industry has become the major symbol of the "cooling off" period.

House Majority Leader Carl Albert recently charged that since Pres. Nixon took office, housing starts have gone down 40 percent, the level of housing production has gone down to that of 1946 when there were 60 million fewer Americans than there are today, and that there is now "a housing shortage the like of which we have not seen since the crisis experienced in the immediate post-World War II period."

The statistics support this dismal summary. Some 2.6 million new homes and apartments must be built annually between now and 1978 just to keep pace with the growing needs of the nation. The mortgage rate on new family housing was 5.75 percent five years ago; it is now more than 8 percent.

FIVE YEARS AGO the median price of a new house was $18,900. Last year it was $26,500 and is far above that in many suburban areas where new housing is virtually unobtainable except for the very rich. Young people just starting out in life and the low income groups are being steadily driven to either apartment living or mobile homes.

When Romney appeared before the Senate Banking committee he outlined a long list of steps the Administration is considering to meet today's housing crisis. He spoke of making more mortgage money available, of setting up "flexible" interest rates; of cost-reduction programs in housing; of "encouraging orderly urban growth."

Yet, he made it clear that the Administration does not intend to change its fiscal policies, that it intends "to maintain a sound fiscal situation with a surplus in the budget," and that the process of slowing down the economy will continue.

It is becoming increasingly clear that the housing crisis has passed the point where only major action, equal to the crisis, will solve it.

DYNAMIC LEADERSHIP of the labor movement is needed to meet the challenges of income and population redistribution in the Seventies, Gus Tyler tells reporters on Labor News Conference. Tyler, assistant president of the Ladies' Garment Workers, was interviewed by Stanley Levey, left, of Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Tom Joyce of Newsweek magazine. The public affairs radio program is aired Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

SELECTIVE MEASURES must be substituted for the Administration's "blunderbuss policy of severe economic restraint" if the nation is to control prices and avoid a recession, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller told a Senate Banking subcommittee. Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger is at left.

'Even-Handed' Controls Urged:

Wage-Price Guidelines Held Ineffective to Curb Inflation

Labor opposes wage-price guidelines as a means of trying to control inflation because they have proved "inequitable and unworkable" wherever and whenever applied, the AFL-CIO told Congress.

At the same time, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller warned that the Administration's "blunderbuss policy of a tight squeeze on the economy" must be eased now before it brings on a recession.

Before a Senate Banking subcommittee, he proposed a number of "selective approaches and selective measures" to curb "profit inflation" and bolster the economy. Biemiller was accompanied by AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger.

The subcommittee, headed by Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.), focused on policies affecting inflation, interest rates and unemployment, particularly as the issues are contained in a resolution Mondale has introduced.

The resolution calls on the Administration to "seek a more balanced set of anti-inflationary policies" that would spread "the burden of restraint more equitably throughout the economy."

In opening the hearings, Mondale termed the nation's economic ills "serious and worsening." Unless the Administration changes it anti-inflationary tools, he said, it may cause "social and economic dislocations and hardships . . . as serious as the inflation itself."

The objectives of the resolution deserve widespread support, Biemiller said. However, he pointed to ways for strengthening and improving it, and he called for elimination of its recommendation for wage-price guidelines.

Past imposition of such guidelines, both in the United States and other nations, have shown "that such an approach is inequitable and unworkable," Biemiller declared.

Guidelines, he emphasized, always place curbs on workers and their unions but are never effective in controlling prices and profits.

The guideline approach in the resolution, he continued, should be replaced "by a recommendation for equitable and even-handed, mandatory controls, if the President determines that the situation warrants overall stabilization measures."

Such controls on all costs, prices, profits, interest rates, dividends and executive compensation, as well as wages and salaries, "would be much more equitable and workable than guidelines," Biemiller added.

He praised the resolution for its emphasis on selective measures to curb specific price pressures—adding "the rifle-shot to the nation's arsenal of economic-policy weapons and putting an end to sole dependence on a shotgun approach."

The AFL-CIO testimony also urged:

● Government curbs on "the sharply accelerated pace of business mergers," which are concentrating economic power in a few giant banks and companies, and leading to administered prices in key parts of the economy.

● A comprehensive congressional review of the nation's monetary machinery and policies to achieve their "much-needed reform."

● A large-scale, federally financed program to create public-service jobs in government and private, non-profit institutions to reduce unemployment and underemployment.

● Government loans for low- and moderate-income housing to help meet the "dire and immediate" need of more homebuilding, and investments of public and private funds in home mortgages.

"A reduction of price pressures can—and must—be achieved without an economic recession and rising unemployment," Biemiller concluded. "America must get back on the road to full employment."

Burger Questions Role Of NLRB on Picketing

means" of finding out whether picketing is protected or unprotected activity.

Court action in picketing cases now is subject to three major legal benchmarks:

● The National Labor Relations Act of 1935, which gave workers the right to organize and picket peacefully except for illegal secondary boycott picketing.

● The Garmon decision of 1959 holding that states may not limit picketing in any disputes which may be potentially covered by federal laws.

● A 1968 high court decision that a shopping center open to the public cannot bar picketing on its sidewalks even though they are on private property.

The Alabama case involved a 1965 ruling by state courts that an RCIA local union was trespassing on a private sidewalk when it picketed a grocery owned by Weinacker's, Inc. The union appealed, citing its free-speech rights under the First Amendment.

The Supreme Court dismissed the appeal on the ground that the record is "obscure" and "only a remnant of the original case remains." Weinacker's closed its store in 1966, a fact the justices did not know when they agreed to review the case.

Burger said in a written opinion that the facts in the Alabama case have little or no impact on the issue of whether the state's jurisdiction in picketing is "preempted" by the National Labor Relations Board's right to primary jurisdiction over labor disputes.

He wrote: "In my view, any contention that the states are preempted in these circumstances is without merit."

"The protection of private property, whether a home, factory or store, through trespass laws is historically a concern of state law. Congress has never undertaken to alter this allocation of power, and has provided no remedy to an employer within the Labor Act to prevent an illegal trespass on his premises."

Few concepts, he said, are more deeply rooted than the power of a state to protect the rights of its citizens.

Justice John M. Harlan disagreed, saying "I would reverse the decision" of the Alabama courts "since the picketing in this case falls well within the range of what could be considered to be protected" under the labor act.

Justice Hugo Black joined Harlan in holding that NLRB jurisdiction in labor disputes takes precedence over state jurisdiction.

In the Longshoremen's case, the Florida courts held the picketing interfered with the maritime rights of foreign owners.

The high court reversed the lower courts, saying the dispute had nothing to do with maritime rights. In a unanimous opinion written by Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., the court made two points:

The ILA's peaceful primary picketing to protect wage rates that were below established area standards was "arguably" protected activity under the labor law; the NLRB's jurisdiction is exclusive and preemptive as to activities "arguably subject" to coverage under the labor law.

Justice Byron White wrote a concurring opinion for himself, Burger and Justice Potter Stewart. He agreed in reversing the Florida courts but cited another reason.

"I would hold," he said, "that only labor activity determined to be actually, rather than arguably protected under federal law should be immune" from state jurisdiction.

If the labor act "provided an effective mechanism" under which an employer could get the NLRB to decide whether picketing is protected or unprotected activity, he said, he would agree that state courts should refrain from interfering with the NLRB. That is not the case, he maintained.

White argued that the key case which laid down guidelines in picketing disputes—the 1959 Garmon case involving the San Diego Building Trades Council—should be reconsidered in the light of the point he made.

Steps Urged to Halt Airline Terrorism

Chicago—Pres. C. L. Dennis of the Railway & Airline Clerks has called for "immediate and stern" action to end terrorist attacks on aircraft.

Dennis issued a statement condemning the outbreak of "murder in the sky" and endorsing the International Transport Workers' Federation's call for a world conference to find ways of ending the terrorism.

Support for ITF's request for the meeting of representatives of airline unions, the airline industry and government was included in a cable sent by Dennis to U Thant, United Nations' secretary general.

Dennis also urged federal officials and industry leaders to work for the proposed conference "to tackle this growing menace to the safe and free operation of commercial aircraft."

Voting Rights Extension Clears Senate Hurdle

The Scott-Hart measure would extend the 1965 law unchanged for an additional five years and add to it the Administration proposals on literacy tests and presidential elections.

In a letter to all senators, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller urged passage of the Scott-Hart substitute, declaring:

"Only in this way can we be sure that the most basic right of American citizenship—the right to vote—will be assured for all Americans regardless of the color of their skin."

On a key test vote, the Senate indicated its support of the Scott-Hart measure by defeating, 47-32, a motion to table it.

The only change in the voting rights section of the bill was narrow approval of an amendment to bring under its coverage other areas where less than 50 percent of voting-age population was registered to vote in the 1968 presidential election. This would bring in sections of New York City and some other northern areas.

18-Year Vote

Considerably more controversy came over a successful amendment to add to the law a lowering of the voting age to 18 in all states which now have a higher voting age, commonly 21.

A series of votes found overwhelming support for the 18-year-old vote—a position supported by the AFL-CIO and the Administration.

The debate focused chiefly on the question of whether this can be achieved by a law passed by Congress—as its sponsors, Senators Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.) and Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) insisted—or whether a constitutional amendment is necessary, as the Administration contends.

Also an issue was whether inclusion of the 18-year-old vote would diminish the likelihood of House acceptance of the stronger voting rights law in preference to the bill it had passed.

But on all test rollcalls, attempts to knock out or amend the 18-year-old vote provision were defeated by big margins. The final vote on the amendment was 64-17.

The 18-year-old vote may have more difficulty in a House-Senate conference, however, since House Judiciary Committee Chairman Emanuel Celler has indicated his opposition.

There had been hints of a southern filibuster to block extension of the 1965 Voting Rights Act and some observers credited the pending nomination of Judge G. Harrold Carswell to the Supreme Court as the reason the filibuster threat was abandoned. With opposition mounting to the Carswell nomination, the reasoning went, southern senators are anxious to take up the nomination while they still think they have the votes to put it over.

repudiation at the hearings of his earlier white supremacy speech, "a continuing pattern of reassertion of his early prejudices."

The statement quoted, with incredulity, Carswell's claim that he was not aware of any racial issue when he signed incorporation papers for a Florida golf club transferred from public to private ownership in 1956 to avoid desegregation.

"The matter was never discussed," Carswell said at the Senate hearings, even though charges that the transfer was racially motivated were reported on the front page of the local newspaper.

If Carswell told the truth about his unawareness of the issue of desegregation of public facilities in connection with the transfer of the golf course, he would have had to be "rather dull," the statement suggested.

The lawyers' statement noted the 15 cases on civil rights and individual liberties decided by Carswell which were unanimously reversed by the Court of Appeals—eight of them in 1968. It commented:

"These 15 cases indicate to us a closed mind on the subject—a mind impervious to repeated appellate rebuke. In some of the 15 he was reversed more than once. In many of them he was reversed because he decided the cases without even granting a hearing, although judicial precedents clearly required a hearing."

The statement was made public as the Senate prepared to open debate on the Carswell nomination—scheduled as the first major item on the agenda after completion of the voting rights bill.

It was part of a growing public and professional outrage at the nomination, expressed in newspaper editorials, columns and in statements issued by organizations and prominent Americans in various fields.

Nearly 400 representatives of Negro, labor, church and civic groups across the nation came to Washington at the call of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights to press for rejection of the Carswell nomination as well as extension of the Voting Rights Act.

Among their key targets were Republican senators who voted against confirmation of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., but have been unwilling so far to buck the President's choice twice in a row even though they privately term the choice of Carswell deplorable.

Conference Asks Action:

Housing Goal Unmet As Economy Slumps

By John R. Oravec

Sandwiched between high interest rates and the decline of housing starts, the chances of home ownership for millions of Americans are being eaten away.

This was the key message reiterated by a parade of speakers and a number of resolutions adopted at the 39th annual convention of the National Housing Conference.

The country is not meeting the objectives set in the National Housing Act of 1968 to build 2.6 million housing units a year through 1978, the conference noted.

Because of fiscal restraint and tight money policies, housing suffers more than any other segment of the economy, it said.

"With the current inadequate supply of mortgage funds for housing, the volume of housing construction has been declining further," the NHC declared in a resolution, "so that we are now at an annual production rate of about 1.2 million dwellings." This is less than half of the goals established in the 1968 housing act.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan, chairman of the federation's Committee on Housing, traced the plunge in home building during 1969 and laid the decline in the lap of Housing & Urban Development Sec. George Romney.

"Under his guidance, housing starts have declined for the 12th consecutive month," Keenan said. "The new construction rate is down nearly 40 percent from the January 1969 rate of 1.8 million when Mr. Romney took over as secretary."

"We are told by the usually optimistic secretary of HUD that housing starts will slip below the 1 million mark," he added.

Keenan, who is a vice president of NHC and secretary of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, cited reports by other Administration officials that reflect a gloomy outlook for the housing industry because of tight money and inflation.

"The truth is," he declared, "the Administration's policies to end inflation have been a tragic failure and violate all standards of equity."

Keenan warned that the Administration's policy has the national economy following the pattern of the housing industry.

"The housing industry is not in a recession, but in the depth of a depression and experiencing soaring prices," he observed.

"Let us hope," he told the 400 NHC delegates at the two-day convention, that the Administration "does not achieve the success with the national economy that it has achieved with the housing industry."

"The primary cause of most of our housing problems," Keenan said, "can be traced to one single source—the lack of an adequate and stable source of credit."

High interest rates have priced 80 percent of the nation's families out of the housing market, he declared.

Rep. Thomas L. Ashley (D-Ohio) told the delegates that this mal-distribution of credit is the result of reliance on market forces which "respond not to need but solely to ability to pay through the nose."

"This malallocation of credit," Ashley continued, "which relegates the poor of America to a few thousand units of public housing or to the trailer camp, is the most serious and certainly the most scandalous evidence of a general breakdown in our housing delivery system."

Rep. Lenor K. Sullivan (D-Mo.) said that the President "can now, this minute" ask the Federal Reserve Board to redirect credit to the vital area of housing needs."

"The longer the President delays in using this vast power to solve the housing famine, the more urgent it becomes for the Congress to devise additional means to help solve the problem," she pointed out.

Yet almost every day, she noted, new bills go into House and Senate hoppers proposing one sort of improvement or other in housing laws. Meanwhile existing housing programs die for lack of sustenance.

The NHC called again for full funding of existing housing programs in order to reach the goals established by law. The conference urged further increases in authorizations to make up for the deficiencies in recent home production.

Delegates commended the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades unions for the Outreach program to enlist thousands of disadvantaged and minority workers in skill training in 53 cities. The conference called on the Labor Dept. to expand the programs under the Manpower & Training Administration.

Representatives of the labor movement serving on the NHC board of directors include Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.; Boris Shishkin of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee; Pres. Edward J. Leonard of the Plasterers, and Pres. Thomas F. Murphy of the Bricklayers.

PINCHED BY TIGHT MONEY, the housing industry is not in a recession, "but in the depth of a depression," AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan tells 400 delegates at the National Housing Conference convention in Washington.

Court Urged to Bar Appeal by Employer

The Supreme Court was urged by the AFL-CIO to dismiss a Sears, Roebuck & Co. appeal in a picketing case or uphold a lower court's finding that the firm had no right to appeal.

The case, in which the federation has submitted a friend-of-the-court brief, centers on whether a disputant can appeal a court decision when the National Labor Relations Board refuses to do so.

The legal argument started in 1968 after Carpet Layers Local 419 of the Painters in Denver began picketing Sears stores there doing business with carpet installers with whom the union had a dispute.

Sears accused the local of conducting an illegal secondary boycott, but the U.S. District Court in Denver refused to issue an anti-picketing injunction, and the NLRB regional director decided not to appeal the decision.

Sears filed its own appeal, but the 10th U.S. Court of Appeals ruled that the company didn't have legal standing to appeal the denial of an injunction sought by NLRB.

Meanwhile, the board continued its proceedings on legality of the picketing. In June 1969, it held that the union had engaged in illegal picketing. The picketing then ceased, although the union has that part of the case under appeal.

Although picketing was discontinued, Sears took the appeals court decision to the Supreme Court, arguing that its decision was important to employers. In November, the Supreme Court granted the store's petition for a hearing.

The AFL-CIO brief supported the board's contention that the case shouldn't be reviewed because the issue of an injunction is no longer present.

If the court does go ahead with review, the AFL-CIO emphasized, it should affirm the appeals court on grounds the board has "exclusive control" to appeal in injunction case and that is what Congress intended in adopting the Taft-Hartley Act.

The brief pointed to congressional debate during consideration of the law that led to rejection of an amendment "that would have allowed private parties to secure injunctions against secondary activity."

Instead, the brief noted, the law as adopted specifically restricts the charging party in an unfair labor practice to be represented by counsel and present any relevant testimony.

The AFL-CIO stressed that the law already gives employers other "effective remedies" for alleged unfair labor practices by unions, including the right to sue a union for damages.

Key Features Of 3 Consumer Bills Endorsed

The "best features" of three consumer protection bills being considered by a Senate Commerce subcommittee should be combined to deal with deceptive sales practices, the AFL-CIO urged.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller spelled out labor's proposals in a letter to Subcommittee Chairman Frank E. Moss (D-Utah).

He said the final version should include a bill by Moss to enable the Federal Trade Commission "to enjoin all types of consumer fraud, using the same powers it already has to act against false advertisements of food, drugs, cosmetics and devices." A similar proposal is part of an Administration bill.

Biemiller also backed a provision in the Administration bill to expand jurisdiction of the FTC to matters "affecting commerce" instead of just "in commerce."

And he urged that the legislation incorporate a bill by Sen. Joseph D. Tydings (D-Md.) authorizing consumer "class action" suits against fraudulent or deceptive businessmen and manufacturers.

Biemiller said the Tydings bill is "strongly" preferable to a section of the Administration bill which would have the effect of limiting the types of consumer class action suits which could be brought in federal courts.

Railway Clerks Name Fletcher Vice President

Chicago—John C. Fletcher has been named by the executive board of the Railway & Airline Clerks as a union vice president, to fill the unexpired term of Ray Clark, who has retired.

Fletcher has been serving on the staff of BRAC Pres. C. L. Dennis as the union's industrial relations director since 1962. Prior to that he was the union's general chairman on the Soo Line Railroad.

Abel Seeks Copper Mine Safety Rules

Pittsburgh — Steelworkers' Pres. I. W. Abel has urged Interior Sec. Walter J. Hickel to end any further delays in establishing health and safety standards for nearly 200,000 workers in copper, lead, zinc and other non-coal mines.

Abel reminded Hickel that 1,800 safety standards were recommended for adoption by the Interior Dept. more than a year ago, but to this date about 750 still have not been established despite the lack of any protests against adoption.

"The health and safety of miners should not be further jeopardized" by continued lack of safety standards, Abel said. He added "the tragic red-tape delay becomes even more critical" in view of the fact that even when promulgated, no standard takes effect for a full year.

Under the terms of the Federal Metal & Nonmetallic Mine Safety Act of 1966, advisory committees were set up to propose safety standards for underground mines, open pit operations and sand, gravel and crushed stone diggings. Representatives of industry, labor, and state inspection agencies were named by Hickel's predecessor, Stewart L. Udall.

About 1,000 of the recommended standards were promulgated by Hickel but hearing dates have not yet been set on 35 contested standards nor has any action been taken on the 750 other uncontested standards, Abel reminded Hickel in a letter urging him to act now.

9 Central Bodies Form Association

Nine Pennsylvania county central labor bodies have formed a working association to expand labor education activities. The group is operating in cooperation with the Penn State University labor studies department.

The association is made up of AFL-CIO affiliated bodies from the central Pennsylvania counties of Blair, Clearfield, Mifflin, Lycoming, Huntingdon, Elk, Cameron, Jefferson and Bedford.

A. L. Rhodes of Altoona was elected president of the new association.

Assisting with the development of the association was Stanton Smith, AFL-CIO coordinator of state and central bodies.

Supplemental Pensions Voted for Railroaders

Legislation to make permanent a four-year-old supplemental pension program for retired railroad workers and provide for funding has passed the House and Senate.

The measure is a compromise worked out by a conference committee after the House passed a bill, supported by some railroad unions, and the Senate passed a modified version, backed by others.

The House would have extended the program, with railroad managements paying the full cost, with a provision for compulsory retirement of all railroad workers at 70, scaling down to 65 after six years.

The Senate bill substituted for compulsory retirement an incentive plan to induce early retirement. It would have cut supplemental annuities by 25 percent for each year in which a man worked beyond 65. The Senate-passed bill also differed in other respects.

The bill sent to the White House extends indefinitely the program which is now paying annuities ranging from $45 to $70 a month to some 60,000 retired workers with more than 25 years service.

The funding section of the bill provides for the railroads to continue through this month their two-cents-an-hour contribution for each man-hour worked to finance the program. The Railroad Retirement Board will decide what rate of contribution will be needed for each calendar quarter thereafter.

The decision on the rate is to be made not later than 15 days before each quarter begins and the board must publish the determined rate in the Federal Register and immediately notify employers and the Secretary of the Treasury what it is.

The board is authorized to request the Treasury Dept. to lend enough funds from the Railroad Retirement Account to the Railroad Retirement Supplement Account to meet requirements for annuities and expenses for six months after the bill becomes law. Annuities have been delayed for the past three months because of lack of funds in the supplement account.

Railroad employes who are 68 years old before the end of 1970 must retire on or before Jan. 31, 1971, or forfeit their right to a supplemental annuity. This age is scaled down yearly until after Dec. 31, 1973, when all employes must retire within the month after reaching 65, or forfeit the supplemental annuity.

If a worker has 23, but less than 25, years of service when he attains the age at which he must otherwise retire, the bill permits him to continue work until he qualifies for the supplemental annuity, unless the worker also is entitled to social security benefits.

Urges 'Pinpointed' Measures:

Labor Asks Action To Stem Downturn

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller told a Senate Banking subcommittee.

But it would be "a mistake" to try to revive so-called wage-price guidelines that have repeatedly been proven "inequitable and unworkable." It would be far preferable, if overall controls are needed, to impose mandatory restraints on prices, profits, interest rates, dividends and executive salaries as well as wages. (Story, Page 6.)

• Tight-money, high-interest policies have plunged the housing industry into "the depth of a depression" and priced 80 percent of the nation's families out of the home market, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan said.

He told the National Housing Conference that a similar fate awaits other industries if the Administration's policies continue on their present course. (Story, Page 7.)

AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger summed up labor's concern over the direction of the economy in a statement to the House-Senate Joint Economic Committee.

He blistered the Administration's "simplistic" theory that the way to restrain inflation is to cut back on government spending and discourage private spending by high interest rates so as to reduce overall demand.

Treating the entire economy as a single economic unit and ignoring its complexities and problem areas sacrifices essential social needs as well as being outdated economic theory, Goldfinger said.

In today's world, he warned, we are asking for disaster by ignoring the impact of economic policies "on the job opportunities of blue collar workers, on meeting such high-priority social needs as housing and the rebuilding of urban areas and on the distribution of income."

As examples of the type of pinpointed approaches needed for today's economic problems, Goldfinger offered these suggestions:

• Direct curbs by the Federal Reserve System on bank loans to business for new plants and equipment "to restrain the only inflationary demand-pressure in the economy."

• Selective government measures to dampen the sharp rise in physicians' fees, hospital charges, auto and property insurance rates and housing costs.

• "As defense expenditures are reduced, the government should use every possible means to assist returning veterans, affected defense workers and their communities, to adjust to civilian employment."

• Direct federal loans for low- and moderate-income housing, along with purchase of government-guaranteed mortgages by the Federal Reserve System and by private trust funds and pension funds which qualify for tax-exempt status.

Full employment, with a back-up system of public service jobs, is necessary to preserve the job gains of the Sixties and accommodate a labor force that is increasing by about 1.5 million persons a year, Goldfinger stressed.

Aided by equal employment policies, improved educational opportunities, expanded training programs and a growing economy, Negro family income rose from 55 percent of the white level in 1960 to 62 percent in 1968, and unemployment of adult Negro men dropped during the same period from 9.6 to 3.9 percent.

A substantial gap remained but, Goldfinger noted, "it was narrowing."

Under the hammer-blows of the Administration's economic restraint policy, Goldfinger charged, this is what has been happening since then:

"The job gains of the 1960s vere undermined during the course of 1969. By early 1970, these gains were being reversed, with increasing layoffs and cutbacks in working hours in many industries and occupations."

He accused government spokesmen of trying to camouflage the impact of the Administration's policy "by speaking in terms of percentages rather than of people."

He reminded the Joint Economic Committee of what it means when the unemployment rate rises even 1 percent.

It means 800,000 additional unemployed, with the burden falling disproportionately on blue collar workers.

And it means that "government and private programs to encourage employment of the hard-core jobless, especially minority-group workers, are being undermined and threatened with destruction."

ployer of last resort and provide jobs in public service employment programs," he stressed.

"America cannot provide these workers with the hope and encouragement that is implicit in the NAB program and then callously abandon them in a period of mass unemployment."

Kirkland promised labor's continued cooperation with the NAB and pledged the full resources of AFL-CIO to continue efforts in job training programs.

He commended the record of the Buddy Program that is operated by the NAB and the federation's Human Resources Development Institute in 35 cities through 50 separate programs. The operations take in 164 local unions cooperating with 189 employers, he noted.

The retention rate for the more than 650 new workers in this program appears better than that for an ordinary group of incoming employes, Kirkland observed.

"But it ought to do better," he suggested.

Proposals Advanced

Kirkland laid down these proposals:

"We would like to see the JOBS '70 program put more emphasis on upgrading employes. We want hard-core trainees to have a crack at better jobs through upgrading. We do not believe it is enough to just bring a worker in off the street, give him an entry-level job and keep him there.

"We have to demonstrate to him that he can move up the job and income ladder."

The success of any JOBS program will be determined by the way workers move up from entry-level jobs into more secure positions within a company, Kirkland declared.

"It is in this area of training that I believe union-management cooperation of critical importance," he stressed.

But cooperation is a two-way street, he reminded the businessmen, noting that for the programs "to work, the unions in your shops must be fully informed, regularly consulted and considered as a necessary part of the enterprise."

The NAB has set an ambitious goal to have 614,000 disadvantaged persons on the job by June 1971. It said that reports from employers show cumulative hiring at the end of January was at 380,000, an increase of 240,000 in the past 10 months.

Despite layoffs in some industries, the NAB said that new hiring under the JOBS program continued at a rate of 25,000 workers a month.

Many of the layoffs came in the auto industry where production had dropped off in recent months. This decline in output affected Chrysler Corp., which announced last week it was pulling out of a $13.8 million contract to train hard-core unemployed workers.

This was the single largest contract the NAB Jobs Program negotiated with the Labor Dept. It provided for the hiring and training of 4,500 auto production workers, upgrading 4,000 existing workers and hiring and training 1,000 mechanics for Chrysler dealerships.

The untimely announcement came shortly before Pres. Nixon named Lynn Townsend, chairman and chief executive officer of Chrysler, as chairman of NAB. Townsend succeeds Donald Kendall, president of Pepsico, Inc.

Woman Wins Promotion in Sex Bias Case

A union of Pennsylvania mushroom pickers won $1,000 in backpay and promotion to a higher-paying job for a woman employe who filed charges of sex discrimination with the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

EEOC Chairman William H. Brown III said that successful conciliation led the commission to drop charges filed for a woman member by a directly affiliated AFL-CIO union, Mushroom Growers Local 21954, against the Butler County Mushroom Farms in Cabot, Pa., between Butler and Pittsburgh.

The company agreed to promote the complainant, make whole her salary losses, and discontinue a job classification and seniority system that had segregated men and women workers.

Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which is administered by the commission, prohibits job discrimination based on race, color, religion, sex or national origin.

The farms, where mushrooms are grown in limestone caves, employ more than 800 workers of whom two-thirds are women. One of the women, who had been refused a transfer to a higher-paying job previously open only to men, filed charges jointly with Local 21954 claiming sex discrimination.

Brown said a settlement was worked out by the use of new procedures to speed up compliance with the law. The procedures, if both parties are willing, allow the commission to negotiate an agreement without a formal decision.

Previous procedures required the EEOC to defer conciliation until a written decision was issued.

Meany Hails Pact Gains As Boycott of GE Ends

Recent contract agreements at General Electric Co. and the Westinghouse Electric Corp. were hailed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as "vindication of the principle of coordinated bargaining which we can expect to see reflected" in many future contracts.

In letters to all AFL-CIO affiliates, Meany officially ended the nationwide boycott of GE and Hotpoint products which began last Nov. 28. Union officers were advised to destroy remaining stocks of leaflets, buttons, bumper stickers and other materials carrying the "Don't Buy GE" message.

At the same time Meany announced the end of solicitations for the GE Strike Relief Fund.

Meany was chairman of the AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee of GE-Westinghouse unions. He emphasized that the two historic settlements were won "largely because of the courage and solidarity of the union members involved—especially of those who manned the picket lines at GE for 100 days."

The federation president also praised "the trade union movement's wholehearted response to the GE crisis" which "helped persuade management to abandon its take-it-or-leave-it position."

He reported that the fund-raising drive "was the most successful in labor history." The "overwhelming labor support of the boycott left no doubt that workers would use their purchasing power to assist other union members" forced to strike for contract betterment, he said.

State and Local Tax Bite Stings Low Incomes Most

A study by two economists shows that the regressive nature of state and local taxes puts the heaviest share of their burden on families with the lowest incomes.

The study, undertaken by Professors Stephen E. Lile of the University of Richmond and Don M. Soule of the University of Kentucky, was reported on in a recent issue of the National Tax Journal.

Based on 1968 tax rates, the study found that on the average (for all states) the state-local tax bite came to 12.8 percent for a family of four with an adjusted gross income of $3,500 a year; 8.7 percent for the family with $10,000 income; and only 5.4 percent for a $50,000-income family.

The study, which took into account all major state and local taxes, also found a wide range of variation among the states in the extent to which various income levels are taxed.

Arnold Cantor, an AFL-CIO economist who examined the study, noted that "the modest tax burdens on wealthy families are really overstated because the study does not fully consider the entire income of the wealthy, such as capital gains."

Also, he pointed out, "The wealthy can wash out a portion of state and local taxes against federal taxes, while lower income groups taking the standard deduction receive no federal tax break."

Creation of Jobs Termed Vital to Manpower Goals

Senate Foes Call Carswell Unqualified

Mediocrity and integrity emerged as key issues in the first days of Senate debate over confirmation of Judge G. Harrold Carswell to the Supreme Court.

Senators Birch Bayh (D-Ind.) and Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.), opening the case against confirmation, stressed the conclusion of hundreds of the nation's most prominent lawyers, law school deans and law professors that Carswell is totally unqualified and should be rejected.

His credentials as a lawyer and a judge are "incredibly undistinguished," Bayh told the Senate, "too threadbare to justify appointment to the highest court in the land."

But mediocrity found a defender in Sen. Roman L. Hruska (R-Neb.), who is leading the drive for confirmation as he did in the unsuccessful effort to confirm Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr.

Hruska was apparently stung by repeated references to Pres. Nixon's campaign promise to appoint men of the caliber of the late Justices Oliver Wendell Holmes and Louis D. Brandeis. Not even Carswell's most ardent defenders have sought to put him on that pedestal.

Hruska told the Senate that the Senate shouldn't examine the "qualities" of an appointee because "that's for the President to decide."

Later he told newsmen that even if Carswell were mediocre, "there are a lot of mediocre judges and people and lawyers, and they are entitled to a little representation, aren't they? We can't have all Brandeises, Frankfurters and Cardozos."

Hruska said the Senate should consider a nominee's "personal integrity" and Sen. Joseph D. Tydings (D-Md.) the next day took up that issue in a Senate speech.

Shortly before Tydings took the floor, Judiciary Committee Chairman James O. Eastland had quoted as a supporter of Carswell's nomination the highly respected retired chief judge of the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, Elbert B. Tuttle.

Tuttle's letter, offering to testify on Carswell's behalf, had also been quoted in the Judiciary Committee report endorsing the nomination and referred to repeatedly by Carswell's supporters.

Yet, Tydings revealed, on the morning of Jan. 28, just six days after he wrote the letter, Judge Tuttle had phoned Carswell and informed him that he was withdrawing his offer to testify on his behalf.

An Atlanta newspaper account, confirmed by Tuttle as accurate, indicated that Tuttle changed his mind after the revelation of Cars-

Voting Right Bill Faces House Test

A strong voting rights bill, coupled with reduction of the voting age to 18 in all elections, has been sent to the House with an impressive 64-12 endorsement from the Senate.

The House earlier had narrowly passed the Administration's watered-down version of voting rights legislation, which civil rights groups opposed. They warned that it could lead to rigging of election laws in the Deep South so as to disenfranchise Negroes or dilute their voting strength.

Addition of the 18-year-old vote by the Senate — as a simple law rather than a constitutional amendment — demonstrated broad-based, bipartisan support for lowering of the voting age, which is now 21 in 46 of the 50 states. It is 18 in Georgia and Kentucky, 19 in Alaska and 20 in Hawaii.

Votes for 18-year-olds has been long supported by the AFL-CIO. The federation joined in the formation of the Youth Coalition for the 18-Year-Old Vote, and Pres. George Meany testified in favor of lowering the voting age at House hearings last year.

In the key Senate vote, 38 Democrats and 26 Republicans backed the 18-year-old vote, with only nine Democrats and eight Republicans opposed.

On extension of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which is due to expire this summer, the Senate adopted a labor-supported bill sponsored by Senators Hugh Scott (R-Pa.) and Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.).

It would extend the 1965 law virtually unchanged for an additional five years — retaining close federal supervision of registration and voting in states and counties which previously used a variety of subterfuges to keep Negroes from

Labor Asks Passage of O'Hara Bill

Manpower legislation that does not create jobs "is no manpower legislation at all. It serves no other purpose than to delude the public," the AFL-CIO told Congress.

"So we are here to urge you to enact manpower legislation that does create jobs, without further delay," AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller testified before a House Labor subcommittee. He was accompanied by AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger.

The bill that would create jobs in public service and is backed by the federation, he noted, has been introduced by Rep. James. G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) and 111 other House members.

The bill that is minus any job creation impact has been introduced by the Administration, Biemiller said. "It is merely a mechanism for coordinating varied programs."

Although such coordination is needed, he added, it is a mechanism, not a policy, and "an effective manpower policy is the top priority need."

A federal program to create public service jobs for the long-term unemployed and the "seriously underemployed" was needed in 1968 and 1969, and is "even more essential today," Biemiller said.

"The nation is now faced by both an economic slump and rapidly rising prices, after more than a year of the Administration's policy of severe economic restraint, imposed in the name of combatting inflation," he emphasized.

With unemployment continuing to rise, even beyond predictions, Biemiller noted, its greatest burden is falling on blue collar workers, particularly those with the least skills, the most recently hired and

Nixon Eases Construction Ban:

Crafts Refute Claim Of Skill Shortages

A lengthy statement by Pres. Nixon on "combatting construction inflation and meeting future construction needs" drew a mixed reaction from the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

There are some points "with which we heartily concur and others which we strongly believe are based on erroneous assumptions and ignore basic facts of the time," BCTD Pres. C. J. Haggerty declared.

One Nixon point with which Haggerty took sharp issue was a contention that there is a "shortage of skilled labor" in the construction industry.

"The fact is that the federal government's own figures for February show a 7.9 percent unemployment rate among construction workers, more than 486,000 of whom presently are jobless," Haggerty said.

He also strongly criticized Nixon's emphasis on "severe increases in the cost of labor" as being responsible for the high cost of housing.

Haggerty said that between 1949 and 1969 on-site labor decreased from 33 to 18 percent of the cost of building a home, while in the same period, the cost of land rose from 11 to 21 percent, financing of a home went from 5 to 10 percent and materials increased from 36 to 38 percent.

Nixon acknowledged that the nation is in a housing "crisis," with housing starts dwindling and new homes being priced beyond the reach of lower and middle income families.

He then outlined a series of long-range proposals to bring more money, skilled manpower and improved management techniques into construction, particularly to meet housing needs.

The President announced the

Meany Backs Welfare Reform, Urges Improvements in Senate

The public welfare bill approved by the House Ways & Means Committee should be passed by the House and improved by the Senate, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany urged.

While the committee "has made many improvements in the bill along the lines we had urged," Meany said, "there are other areas where we still think improvements could be made."

Because the bill will be considered under a no-amendment rule, the AFL-CIO will look to the Senate for needed changes.

The legislation is based on Nixon Administration proposals to establish a new federally-supported family assistance program which is designed to help the "working poor" as well as families without a wage-earner.

As originally proposed, it would have helped primarily states which have had the least adequate level of benefits, with only token help for states which have made the greatest financial effort. Changes in the aid formula made by the Ways & Means Committee remedied part of the disparity.

The 21-3 vote in the Ways & Means Committee for the legislation forecast strong bipartisan support in the House, with backing both from Republicans and liberal Democrats.

One of the few voices raised in opposition came from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce which complained that paying supplementary welfare benefits to the working poor is "a first step toward a guaranteed annual income" and would be "inflationary."

The legislation would replace

Michigan Hires 700 To Deal with Jobless

Chicago—A big spurt in claims by unemployed Michigan workers forced the hiring of 700 additional state employes to help process compensation claims, delegates to the COPE area conference here were told.

The report came from Walter A. Campbell of Lansing, Mich., regional director for the Allied Industrial Workers and a member of the Michigan Employment Security Commission.

The commission reported earlier that the number of jobless workers rose by 52,000 in February to a critical level of 6.6 percent unemployed.

Bill to Protect Wage-Hour Agents Urged

The Wage-Hour division of the Labor Dept. has asked Congress to pass a law protecting its inspectors from assaults by employers and others who resent their reporting violations of the minimum wage and overtime laws.

The department said 52 compliance officers have been attacked since 1949—one in 1970, nine in 1969, the highest on record.

A bill has been introduced to give wage-hour compliance officers the protection of a law covering other federal personnel. It would make it a federal crime to assault, impede, oppose, resist, intimidate or interfere with investigators.

Already protected are federal judges, U.S. attorneys, Federal Bureau of Investigation agents and federal marshals.

No inspectors have been murdered but some have been beaten and a few have collected damages after in suits against their assailants. These have usually been employers or their relatives aroused by charges of failing to pay minimum wages, overtime rates or prevailing rates under the Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act.

The wage-hour administration listed these incidents among others:

- A compliance officer was hit on the head, knocked to the basement, pummeled and choked with his own necktie.
- Shots were fired through the window at the home of an investigator, who reported seeing the auto of a plant owner drive past his home shortly before.
- An employer tried to run down an officer with a truck.

Other investigators were threatened with shotguns, pistols, rifles, a knife and a double-bladed ax dragged out of an office, and threatened with being stomped to death.

FOUR UNIONS of San Francisco city employes stayed on strike three days to gain a new contract agreement and head off plans for the first general strike since 1934. One member of Service Employes Local 400 demonstrated how to picket City Hall and read a newspaper at the same time.

Congress Sets Hearing On Shopcraft Dispute

Congress is slated to open hearings Mar. 23 on Pres. Nixon's plan to impose a settlement in the dispute involving four shopcraft unions and the nation's railroads.

In announcing that the House Commerce Committee will begin hearings on that date, Chairman Harley O. Staggers (D-W. Va.) said that the committee will also explore alternatives to the Nixon proposal.

Meanwhile, efforts were still being pressed through negotiations to settle the 16-month-old dispute involving 48,000 workers.

Talks sponsored by the Labor Dept. were held between representatives of three of the unions involved—Machinists, Boilermakers and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers—and the railroads.

A fourth union, the Sheet Metal Workers, was not represented. J. W. O'Brien, the union's vice president for railroad membership, said, "We take the view that the Labor Dept. cannot mediate because it sponsored that reprehensible bill to impose a contract on us."

Nixon's plan calls for imposing a tentative agreement that was accepted earlier by members of the IAM, Boilermakers and IBEW but rejected by the Sheet Metal Workers' members.

It includes a wage increase of 68 cents an hour over two-years for skilled mechanics along with a controversial provision for limited crossing of craft jurisdictional lines.

The latter provision was the basis of the Sheet Metal Workers' vote against ratification. The unions had agreed that rejection by one union would constitute rejection by all four.

Nixon sent his plan to Congress after the unions set a strike on all railroads for Mar. 5, contending that a court injunction against a strike on a single railroad left them no alternative.

At quickly-called hearings by the Senate Labor and House Committees, lawmakers voiced strong opposition to the Nixon proposal as compulsion and interference with free bargaining. The AFL-CIO also opposed the measure.

Instead of accepting it, both committees reported out a resolution that provided a 37-day moratorium on any strikes or lockouts in the dispute. The Senate and House both quickly approved it, and Nixon signed it. The moratorium expires Apr. 11.

Threat to Close Plant Overturns NLRB Vote

Ponce, P.R.—A company threat to move the Sprague Ponce Co. operations from Puerto Rico to Mexico tainted the atmosphere of a May 16 election to such an extent that a new election is necessary, the National Labor Relations Board ruled.

The NLRB regional director ordered a second election May 16 at the plant, a subsidiary of the Sprague Electric Co. of North Adams, Mass. Some 200 workers will vote in the election, sought by the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers.

The union lost the first election by an 80-82 vote. It appealed, and the labor board found that the employer's conduct prevented employes from expressing a free choice untainted by fear that the plant would close.

The director reported that the plant's general manager told employes that Sprague Ponce Co. and its parent corporation had already moved some of their equipment to Matamoros, Mexico, to take advantage of cheap, non-union labor. It might have to do the same thing at Ponce, the manager hinted.

The day before the speech, management distributed a reprint of a North Adams Transcript news story headed "Cheaper Labor Available—Sprague Will Transfer Product Line to Mexico."

The company first refused an NLRB request for a copy of the manager's remarks, but later relented. After a study, the NLRB said "we conclude that the statements constituted veiled threats to close the plant" should the union be chosen by the employes. The effect of these statements, and the news story, was to "lead the employes to fear that such action would be taken by the employer" if the union won bargaining rights, the NLRB found.

The manager said in his speech: "The competition is so great that many electronic firms have been forced to move their plants out of the U.S. to take advantage of the extremely low labor costs available in areas like Taiwan and Mexico.

"Just last week, Sprague Electric announced that it was moving one of its established product lines from North Adams, Mass., to Matamoros, Mexico, with the only purpose of taking advantage of this labor saving. I firmly believe that we at Sprague Ponce can still overcome this kind of competition—but only by working together."

Car Air Cushions Ordered by 1972

Auto manufacturers have been ordered to install air cushions to absorb the shock of collisions in all cars after Jan. 1, 1972.

The safety regulation was announced by Transportation Sec. John A. Volpe. He said, however, that manufacturers who need more time to overcome technical problems might be given a one-year extension.

City Strike Settled In San Francisco

San Francisco—City employes began returning to work Mar. 16 after a three-day strike that threatened for a time to overshadow any labor dispute this town has seen since the historic general strike of 1934.

The strike-ending formula was hammered out in almost continuous night-and-day negotiations that had started before the walkout began at midnight, Mar. 12.

The strike shut down the public transportation system, closed the schools, halted a good many other city services or cut them back to skeleton and emergency operations.

The settlement came as strikers were preparing to extend their picket lines to the docks and San Francisco International Airport, both city-operated, as well as the city yards. Almost the only area outside the reach of the walkout were police and fire operations.

The strike involved an overwhelming majority of the city's more than 20,000 employes but most immediately the 14,000 who work in the so-called "miscellaneous" job classifications and whose pay scales and job conditions were at the core of the dispute.

Spearheading the walkout were close to 7,000 members of Service Employes' local unions—hospital workers, civil service maintenance workers, and employes in literally scores of city departments.

They were joined on strike by registered nurses in city employment who are members of the unaffiliated California Nurses Association and by a local union of Technical Engineers.

The settlement provided pay increases in the 1970-71 fiscal year which union officials estimated would average about 6 percent. In addition, it restored the annual "step" increases within individual pay brackets which the Board of Supervisors had threatened to freeze during the coming year. It also restored other job conditions that the supervisors initially had proposed to eliminate.

Likely to be no less important over the long haul are the written assurance Mayor Joseph L. Alioto gave the striking unions that he would move promptly to develop procedures to "meet and confer in good faith" with designated representatives of the city employes.

Stalled somewhere in the city machinery for some months now has been just such a procedure. Work on it got started under impetus of the Meyer-Milias-Brown Act which opened the way to collective bargaining for employes of a growing number of public agencies and governmental units.

Had it been implemented some weeks ago it might conceivably have avoided the last-minute deadlock which, if it did not make the strike inevitable, at least made it a good bet.

Under San Francisco's creaking wage-setting machinery, the Civil Service Commission initially had proposed a 7.5 percent increase for the "miscellaneous" employes. Pay scales for skilled craftsmen, firemen, policemen, and municipal railway bus operators are set by other procedures and formulas.

Mayor Alioto promptly announced he would veto any such increase in the city's wage bill if it reached his desk. The supervisors, who had the next move, kept their views on the subject to themselves.

For at least two weeks, the unions representing city employes were kept in the dark. Neither the mayor nor the supervisors were talking.

The increasingly agitated silence was broken when a supervisors' committee finally unveiled its proposals: wage increases worth an estimated $6.2 million were coupled with a freeze on annual salary increments which would cost the employes $2.4 million. Employes would also lose a number of other working conditions which had been established many years.

Transport Workers tied up the city's busses and streetcars when they refused to cross picket lines. Union teachers balked at the picket lines set up by school janitors, clerical workers, and other school district employes. By the end of the strike's first day, the city's public schools were closed.

San Francisco General Hospital and Laguna Honda Home, the two chief health institutions, were on an emergency-care-only basis. Only skeleton crews manned the emergency hospitals.

In city departments throughout the city—social services, probation, water and utilities, and scores more—union members showed the way out to other thousands of non-member employes.

City Hall itself was largely closed except for the core of employes in the mayor's and supervisors' offices.

"Labor rallied to our support like nothing the city has ever seen since the 1934 general strike," said John Jeffery, secretary of City & County Employes Local 400.

The walkout carried the endorsement of the San Francisco Labor Council which set up a six-man committee to mediate the dispute and to press for a settlement. It was headed by Sec. George W. Johns and Pres. Joe Belardi of the Labor Council.

Standing firm against pay raises for the city employes had been virtually all 11 members of the Board of Supervisors. They insisted their mail was running heavily against the strike and against granting the workers' pay demands. Some frankly said they intended to hold the line to protect the "small taxpayer."

Union officials saw their stand as an even stronger reflection of the hold-the-line attitudes of the Chamber of Commerce and Downtown Association, representing the city's major industrial financial, and commercial institutions and its most influential taxpayers.

In the end, with Alioto leading the city's negotiating team, joined from time to time by an assortment of supervisors, the settlement was pieced together in sessions that ate up most of four days.

House Bill Hikes Antitrust Penalty

Legislation raising the maximum fine for violation of antitrust laws passed the House recently and is before the Senate.

The bill would boost the maximum fine from the $50,000 limit set in 1955 to $500,000. A penalty of up to one year in jail for criminal violations remains unchanged.

A House Judiciary Committee report said the present fine "is so low that it may be regarded by some corporate executives as a good business risk."

Labor Asks Action To Meet Job Needs

members of minority groups.

To help solve the problem, he continued, the nation needs a manpower policy that includes:

- Massive job creation based largely on a public service employment program.
- Consolidation and coordination of manpower programs under the Dept. of Labor with responsibility for direction and development vested in the Secretary of Labor.
- Training programs that emphasize upgrading instead of simply preparing the hard-core jobless for entry-level jobs.

Of the bills before Congress, Biemiller stressed, only the O'Hara bill would make it federal policy to move in all three areas and spell out the procedures for doing so.

"It is the most practical and realistic way to create jobs in large numbers for the long-term unemployed and the seriously underemployed," he said.

Even as a mechanism for improving the delivery of manpower services, the Administration bill "misses the mark" in that it would turn over manpower programs to the states, the AFL-CIO suggested.

Manpower programs are national in scope and "this is too important an area" to let 50 states each go their own way dispensing funds in a way "that may or may not be in line with national goals," the federation said.

Another deficiency in the Administration bill, Biemiller declared, is that it would make state employment services the key agencies in the delivery of manpower services.

These agencies "in the past have demonstrated neither the machinery nor the compassion to appropriately administer programs dealing with the disadvantaged" and are not oriented to handling their problems, he said.

"They are employer oriented. They are geared to finding an applicant for a job, rather than a job for an applicant."

By contrast, it was pointed out, a feature of O'Hara's bill is that it "does not dispute responsibility" for manpower programs but instead points the finger at the Secretary of Labor and says "you're it."

"There is no hiding behind the skirts: there is no shrugging of the shoulders on the part of local officials in ascribing the fault to the states and the states in ascribing the fault to the federal government and federal government ascribing the fault to state and local officials.

"If things go wrong, the Secretary of Labor is responsible and he should shoulder the blame."

Meany Urges House Passage Of Welfare Bill

the present program of Aid to Families with Dependent Children with a new system of family assistance allowances.

A family on welfare would receive a basic federal payment of $500 a year for each of the first two family members and $300 for each additional person—amounting to $1,600 a year for a family of four.

Persons of working age in the family, except for mothers of preschool children, would be required to register for jobs or training if available.

As an incentive for states to supplement the federal program, the federal government would pay 30 percent of additional benefits up to the current poverty level, which amounts to about $3,550 for a family of four.

Federal benefits would be gradually reduced if one or more members of the family had earnings from work. There would be no reduction for the first $720 a year of earnings and thereafter benefits would be cut 50 cents for each dollar earned.

The AFL-CIO has urged a fully federal welfare program, with eligibility standards the same in every section of the nation and with benefits no lower than the poverty level. The federation has also urged minimum wage safeguards to prevent exploitation of welfare recipients by low-wage employers.

WEEK-LONG SEMINAR covering a full range of Painters union activities is addressed by Pres. S. Frank Raftery, left. The annual seminar, held in Chicago, drew 70 participants who included general and special representatives, board members and headquarters personnel. The AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization assisted in conducting the seminar.

Laborers Get $1.9 Million for Job Training

The Laborers received a third Labor Dept. contract for $1.9 million to give on-the-job training for 1,768 jobless or underemployed workers.

About half of the trainees will be new hires, most of them recruited from the ranks of the disadvantaged jobless. The rest will get upgrading instruction to develop wider skills in all phases of construction work, aimed at assuring them steadier employment.

The training program will be operated by the Laborers in 13 states over a 13-month period.

The program calls for 360 trainees in California on a federal investment of $512,407; 128 in Florida on $128,046; 128 in Hawaii on $137,262; 96 in Kansas on $101,027; 128 in Louisiana on $133,166; 64 in Maryland on $67,095; 160 in Massachusetts on $169,656; 128 in Michigan on $137,262; 160 in Missouri on $167,736; 96 in New York on $102,563; 128 in North Carolina on $125,998; 64 in Virginia on $64,791, and 128 in Wisconsin on $137,262.

In two earlier training contracts totaling $4.5 million, the Laborers enrolled more than 4,821 trainees and 4,219 completed the programs.

Unions Call for Probe Of Postal Conditions

New York—Letter carriers staged a protest walkout throughout the New York metropolitan area, and the stoppage was reported spreading to the suburbs and nearby states despite federal court orders directing the mailmen to return to work.

It was the first Post Office strike in the nation's history.

In Washington, the presidents of six AFL-CIO postal unions and the Rural Letter Carriers Association issued a statement saying that, because of existing agreements and federal law, "we cannot support or condone" the mail service interruption "and we collectively instruct all affected postal employes to return to work immediately."

The statement also requested an "immediate full and objective congressional investigation of all the conditions and circumstances which brought this situation about."

It was issued by Presidents James H. Rademacher of the Letter Carriers, Francis S. Filbey of the Postal Clerks, Monroe Crable of the Post Office & General Services Maintenance Employes, Lonnie L. Johnson of the Mail Handlers, affiliated with the Laborers; Chester W. Parrish of the Post Office Motor Vehicle Employes, Michael J. Cullen of the Special Delivery Messengers and Herbert Alfrey of the National Rural Letter Carriers.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, the Post Office Dept. ordered an embargo on all mail to and from New York postal zones with zip code prefixes of 100 to 104 and 110 to 119.

Two U.S. district courts, in Manhattan and Brooklyn, issued orders directing the 36,000 mailmen and their supporters, including an estimated 20,000 mail clerks, handlers and drivers, to return to work. The restraining orders were sought by Postmaster Gen. Winton M. Blount, who quoted a federal law banning strikes by government employes. The law provides penalties of up to a year in prison for violators.

The carriers stopped work after a Mar. 17 meeting of NALC Branch 36. The vote for a walkout was 1,559 in favor, 1,055 against. Speakers declared that, whether a walkout is sanctioned by their national union or not, postmen are "fed up" with congressional delays and will stay away from work until Congress grants a pay raise.

Members of the Manhattan-Bronx branch, meeting in Manhattan Center, booed a suggestion by branch Pres. Gus Johnson that they be patient with Pres. Nixon's proposal to make the postal system a public corporation and delay any strike action.

A bill to establish an independent postal authority along lines originally recommended by the Administration was approved Mar. 12 by the House Post Office Committee, 17-6. In addition the committee approved a 5.4 percent pay raise, retroactive to Jan. 1.

Postal unions have been divided over the legislation—as has the committee itself during months of consideration.

Under the new system, collective bargaining generally would parallel the labor act but postal employes would still be denied the right to strike, and agreements would be for no less than two years' duration.

Adding to the congressional confusion over varying pay bills is the fact that two separate measures were passed last year—one in the House, the other in the Senate.

The House voted a grade consolidation and increase designed to give postal workers an 11 percent raise; the Senate voted a 5.7 percent average increase for all goverment workers.

Court Upholds Benefit Claim In Kentucky

Frankfort, Ky.—The "inhuman" denial of unemployment compensation to a woman who lost her job while caring for her dying husband has been overruled by the Kentucky Court of Appeals.

According to the court, Mrs. Thelma Cantrell of Louisville was given "several weeks off" from her job at United Casket Co. to care for her husband who underwent several operations for a gastrointestinal condition.

On the day of his last operation, she informed her employer that her husband was near death and she didn't know just when she would be back. She was told that the firm might have to hire a replacement. Mrs. Cantrell later contended she didn't understand that this meant she would lose her job.

The Kentucky Unemployment Compensation Commission denied her claim for jobless benefits on grounds she had left her job "voluntarily without good cause." A lower state court upheld the finding.

However, the appeals court hit at the "strict construction" applied by the commission in citing some precedents none of which involved a death.

The widowed woman is entitled to jobless benefits, with the burden of the payments to be borne by the state's pooled unemployment account rather than by the employer's account, the court declared.

Social Security Benefit Schedule

This table shows examples of monthly cash social security payments. The amounts include the 15 percent increase recently signed into law. The new rates are effective Jan. 1, 1970. The first checks in the new amount will be sent out Apr. 3 covering payments for the month of March. A separate check in the amount of the benefit increase for the months of January and February will be sent out later in April. People who get benefits will get the increase automatically. They do not have to take any action themselves.

Up to 5 years of low earnings or no earnings can be excluded. The maximum earnings creditable for social security are $3,600 for 1951-1954; $4,200 for 1955-1958; $4,800 for 1959-1965; and $6,600 for 1966-67. The maximum creditable in 1968 and after is $7,800, but average earnings cannot reach this amount until later. Because of this, the benefits shown in the last column on the right generally will not be payable until later. When a person is entitled to more than one benefit, the amount actually payable is limited to the larger of the benefits. (Source: U.S. Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare)

Mitchell Seeks Broader Curbs Under L-G

The Administration has asked Congress to broaden considerably a section of the Landrum-Griffin law barring a person from holding office in a union for five years after conviction of any of a number of crimes.

Under the statute's Section 504, the list of crimes now includes robbery, bribery, extortion, embezzlement, grand larceny, burglary, arson, narcotics laws, murder, rape, various assaults and violations of laws on trusteeships.

An amendment sought by Atty. Gen. John N. Mitchell would add kidnapping, perjury, forgery, mail and wire fraud, obstruction of justice, kickbacks from public works projects, interference with commerce by threats of violence and accepting fees or kickbacks from employers.

Further, the ban on holding office would apply to anyone found guilty of violating the Landrum-Griffin law itself, the Taft-Hartley Act or the Welfare & Pension Plans Disclosure Act.

Conviction for "conspiracy or attempt to commit any such crimes or a crime in which any of the foregoing crimes is an element" would also be added language.

The Administration bill as it was introduced would be retroactive, "applicable with respect to convictions occurring before, on, or after the date of enactment" of the amendment.

Miami Cabbies Win Pact in 19-Day Strike

Miami—A 19-day strike won union recognition and a first contract from Yellow Cabs of Miami for some 500 taxi drivers.

The Railway & Airline Clerks, through its Allied Services Division, signed the 2½-year agreement. The strike started during the recent meeting at nearby Bal Harbour of the AFL-CIO Executive Council, which passed a resolution endorsing the walkout.

The contract provides for company-paid hospitalization and life insurance, paid vacations, pay adjustments, check-off of union dues, and the posting of taxi supervisors at the busy Miami airport. The lack of supervisors had been a major grievance of the drivers, who had called for more orderly arrangements for picking up fares at the air terminal.

BRAC won a labor board election almost 18 months ago among the drivers for the local Yellow Cab firm, which is a subsidiary of the national Greyhound Co.

Local management challenged nearly 40 percent of the votes, and after the union was finally certified, it claimed negotiations would have to be carried on between BRAC and 11 firms leasing cabs from Yellow Cabs.

Late last year the NLRB issued an unfair labor practice complaint against the firm. The walkout started on Feb. 16.

Negotiating the contract for BRAC were Tom Fitzgibbon, director of organization, Vice Pres. Henry Letourneau of the Allied Services Division and six members of the Miami local.

Tugboat Crews Vote To Continue Strike

New York—The tugboat strike here continued through its seventh week as members of the National Maritime Union tugboat local voted down a management offer.

The strike by 4,000 crew members has idled 200 tugboats serving the New York harbor.

PREFABRICATED COMPONENTS manufactured by members of the Laborers at plants in Colorado and Illinois are used in the construction of this high-rise apartment building. The union has signed a national agreement for the production of the concrete components.

Laborers Sign Contract For Prefab Housing

The Laborers have worked out a national agreement for the manufacture of prefabricated housing aimed at meeting the need for adequate low-income homes and increased job opportunities for members of minorities.

This is the first contract signed by the LIU that clears the way for the mass production of union-made concrete housing components for construction of both single and multiple family dwelling units.

Pres. Peter Fosco of the LIU signed the contract for the union at ceremonies at the Housing & Urban Development Dept.'s headquarters in Washington. The participating companies are Prestressed Concrete of Colorado and Midwest Prestressed Concrete Co. of Springfield, Ill.

Witnessing the consummation of the contract were HUD Sec. George Romney and Labor Sec. George P. Shultz.

Besides producing concrete components for garden-type and high-rise apartment buildings, the companies are expected to maufacture single family dwellings selling for about $15,000.

The two firms operate four plants involved in the prefabrication process. The agreement recognizes the Laborers as the representative of the production line employes.

Expressing concern for the lack of adequate housing in the low-income range, Fosco said "urban decay is the source of bitter unrest, discontent and frustration in our cities. A key to meeting this crisis head-on is clearly to provide more housing."

"We believe we are taking a major step in that direction," he declared, "with the signing of this national agreement."

The three-year pact provides for the promotion and development of technological advances and volume production of low-income housing units.

The contract also prohibits strikes and lockouts during the life of the agreement and provides for employer participation in the LIU's National Industrial Pension Plan and its union label program.

Wages, hours and fringe benefits will be negotiated locally, the Laborers reported.

A key provision in the contract calls for extensive in-plant training programs to enable employes to keep pace with the technological developments in the concrete products industry, the union said.

Fosco suggested that these developments will make a major impact on the nation's housing shortage.

"Not only will this agreement help make more housing available to those who need it most, but through its farsighted training provisions it will provide permanent employment opportunities to many members of minority groups," Fosco observed.

More than half of the employes at the four plants covered by the agreement are from the minorities, the LIU noted. The agreement will also be extended to other plants that the firms are expected to open as the volume of production increases.

Existing plants operated by Prestressed of Colorado are in Denver and Pueblo, Colo., while Midwest Prestressed plants are located in Springfield and Rochelle, Ill.

Citing efforts of the LIU and the entire labor movement to meet the nation's housing crisis, Fosco pointed out that the union's executive board voted in January to invest $500,000 in the AFL-CIO Mortgage Investment Trust, with another $500,000 to be invested soon.

NMU Scores Delay On Passenger Fleet

The AFL-CIO Maritime Committee has criticized the Administration's lack of action with regard to the American flag passenger ship fleet which has been reduced by almost 75 percent in the past five years.

Joseph Curran, committee chairman and president of the National Maritime Union, told U.S. Maritime Administrator Andrew E. Gibson that if the purpose of the Administration's maritime program "truly is to restore this nation to first rank as a maritime power, then it must provide for continuation of the passenger fleet."

Curran also said that the Administration's 300-ship program for the U.S. merchant marine will "miss its mark" unless it guarantees that a fair portion of U.S. foreign commerce—50 percent—be carried on U.S. ships.

Stricter Federal Standards:

Nixon Asks Change In Pension Reports

Pres. Nixon has asked Congress to tighten federal supervision of employe pension plans, by requiring more detailed reporting from administrators and writing into law a requirement that pension funds be handled and invested solely in the interest of the participants and beneficiaries.

It would impose the "prudent man" doctrine of fiduciary responsibility, requiring persons with control over funds to exercise "the same degree of care and skill as a man of ordinary prudence would exercise in dealing with his own property."

The Secretary of Labor would be given broader powers to investigate pension and welfare funds and persons convicted of a long list of crimes, including offenses not related to financial matters, would be barred for five years from holding any responsible position with a pension or welfare fund.

Not mentioned in the President's message to Congress or in the Administration bill were major proposals for pension reform which have been the subject of House and Senate hearings.

These include suggestions for federal standards on funding and vesting and establishment of a system of government insurance to protect workers against loss of promised benefits if an employer goes out of business.

Last December, at House hearings, the AFL-CIO testified in favor of a mandatory government insurance program "that will assure the beneficiaries of private pension plans that they will actually receive the pension they have earned." The federation also urged funding and vesting standards for single-employer plans.

Labor Sec. George P. Shultz said the additional information required in reports filed with the Labor Dept. on pension plans would include questions dealing with employe turnover and vesting rights.

"We will know a lot more" about vesting problems as a result of the added information, Shultz said.

The President's message also prodded Congress for action on the Administration's earlier requests for legislation dealing with manpower training, unemployment insurance expansion and occupational health and safety.

Of the three, only unemployment compensation has gotten beyond the committee stage. A modified version of the Administration bill passed the House and is being considered by the Senate Finance Committee.

In a letter to committee members, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller urged that the House bill be strengthened in three key areas:

- By setting a federal minimum standard of benefits, with the ceiling not less than 50 percent of the statewide average weekly wage.
- By including agricultural labor, a provision of the Administration proposal that was dropped from the House bill.
- By advancing the effective date of extended unemployment benefits during periods of high unemployment from 1972, as provided in the House bill, to "the earliest date administratively practicable."

Struck Firm's Meat Seized By Inspectors

Dubuque, Ia.—Federal meat inspectors, alerted by union members, impounded beef cuts from the struck Iowa Beef Packers, at an A&P store here.

Pres. Harold Miller of Meat Cutters Local 150 said a patrol of union members discovered a shipment of beef carrying no government meat inspection stamps. It is a violation of federal law to ship meat in interstate commerce without a federal inspection stamp.

Miller said members of Local 150 found the unstamped meat in a company refrigerator truck and summoned government inspectors from another local plant. The shipment, which originated at A&P's central warehouse in Chicago, was placed under government seal.

California Labor Picks Henning to Succeed Pitts

San Francisco—John F. Henning has been named executive secretary-treasurer of the California State AFL-CIO, succeeding Thomas L. Pitts, who retired after 10 years in the state federation's top post.

Henning recently returned to the State AFL-CIO staff after having served for five years as Under Sec. of Labor and two years as Ambassador to New Zealand. He had previously been director of the California State Dept. of Industrial Relations.

Before his appointment to the state industrial relations post in 1959, Henning had served for 10 years as research director of the California AFL-CIO and administrative assistant to C. J. Haggerty, then the state federation's secretary-treasurer and now president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

JOHN F. HENNING

Pitts retired on medical disability and, in granting his retirement request, the State AFL-CIO executive council named him secretary-treasurer emeritus in appreciation for "a lifetime of dedication to the labor movement."

Pitts had served as president of the State AFL-CIO and the former AFL State Federation of Labor from 1950 to 1960 and had been a member of its executive council since 1941.

Henning was chosen as his successor on a motion by State AFL-CIO Pres. Albin J. Gruhn.

Nixon Eases Construction Ban:

Crafts Refute Claim Of Skill Shortages

freeing of $1.5 billion in state and federal funds for public construction that had been frozen last year, as well as withdrawal of a request to governors to postpone state-financed construction voluntarily.

He did not, however, release a freeze on $1.8 billion worth of purely federal construction projects. Budget Dir. Robert P. Mayo said Nixon wanted "to take one thing at a time."

The President called for doubling of the production of subsidized housing from 223,600 units in 1969 to more than 450,000 units in 1970, and he proposed authority for the Federal National Mortgage Association to deal in conventional as well as FHA and VA mortgages.

He urged Congress to pass his proposals to authorize the Federal Home Loan Bank System to create a secondary market for conventional mortgages and allow it to subsidize borrowing by savings and loan associations as a means of expanding mortgage loans.

Much of the statement dealt with directives going to agencies of the federal government, particularly in carrying out programs to develop jobs and skills in construction.

The Secretary of Labor was instructed to prepare a plan within 60 days to expand present enrollment in the Labor Dept.'s construction training programs by 50 percent and to accelerate this pace over the next five years.

The Labor Dept. was directed to make a six-month study on apprenticeship programs in construction and recommend ways for expansion. The Secretaries of Labor and Health, Education & Welfare were also asked to expand veterans' training programs in construction.

The heads of all federal agencies were asked to include a clause in all federal construction contracts to require maximum permissable employment of apprentices or trainees on projects, with 25 percent of them being in their first year of training.

In another area, Nixon called for timing federal construction contracts to spread out work and eliminate seasonality in the industry that leads to periodic layoffs of workers.

In the area of equal employment, the President directed the Labor Dept. to encourage and assist communities in developing "hometown" solutions to the need for hiring minority group workers in the building industry.

Haggerty expressed satisfaction in the proposals for correcting the seasonality problem, noting that the building trades have long pressed for such measures.

He also said the department is pleased to note the emphasis on cities adopting their own programs for hiring minority workers in construction. Unions have been instrumental in working out such programs in Chicago and Pittsburgh.

Haggerty said his department will "carefully study" the President's recommendations on apprentices and trainees. In the meantime, he cited two ways in which unions are helping to increase the volume of housing:

One, by negotiating agreements with contractors to provide new low-cost production techniques and training programs. Two, by investing pension and welfare funds in home financing through the AFL-CIO's Mortgage Investment Fund.

"We are ready, willing and anxious to move forward in building the housing that is needed by Americans," Haggerty concluded. "Not only do new homes improve the quality of all American life but it is our craftsmen who will be doing the building and our members who now live in homes so badly in need of replacement."

NEW UNITY HOUSE will be built by the Ladies' Garment Workers at Forest Park, Pa., to replace the administration building of the Pocono Mountains resort that was destroyed by fire last year. This is a model of the structure designed by architect Lo-Yi Chan. The new resort building is expected to be completed for the 1971 season.

Minority Group Youths Account For 11 Percent of New Apprentices

Nearly 11 percent of the new apprentices admitted to registered training programs last year—8,000 of 73,000—came from minority groups, Labor Sec. George P. Shultz reported.

The addition of new minority group apprentices brought to more than 20,000 the number of minority participants working and learning in registered programs in 1969.

Overall, there were about 255,000 apprentices in registered programs last year, according to estimates from federal and state sources. Minorities represented nearly 8 percent of the total, Shultz said. He noted that this compared with 4.4 percent registered during 1966.

The Labor Dept. reported that 5,100 of the 8,000 new apprentices from minority groups were enrolled through government-financed entry assistance programs.

Shultz said that the 63 Apprenticeship Outreach programs accounted for 3,300 of the new apprentices; the Apprenticeship Information Centers placed 1,800, and the remainder were recruited independently by program sponsors.

About half of the minority group members registered last year were Negro. The other half was made up mostly of Spanish-speaking Americans, and about 1 percent of the total were Indians and Orientals.

Preliminary statistics on the 1969 operation of the Outreach programs showed that an average of 275 young minority group members were enrolled each month. This is a 70 percent increase over 1968, the Labor Dept. said.

The Outreach programs are operated by AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades councils, the National Urban League and the Workers Defense League.

Using the tutor-and-cram technique, the Outreach programs prepare minority youths exclusively to pass examinations for entry in building and construction trades apprenticeships.

Outreach programs operated by building trades councils in 20 cities across the country accounted for 1,331 placements last year, a record high.

The National Urban League, with operations in 24 cities, placed 1,973 apprentices. The Workers' Defense League placed 1,702 young men through its 12 programs.

Since July 1967, the Labor Dept. said, 5,633 minority apprentices were placed in 18 building and construction trades through the efforts of Outreach.

From that number, 3,195 were placed in five major trades: 1,132 as carpenter apprentices, 599 as electrician apprentices, 527 plumbers and pipe fitters, 513 painters, and 424 sheet metal workers.

Living Costs of Retirees Put at $4,192 in 1969

A retired couple living in an urban area would have needed $4,192 in the spring of 1969 to maintain a moderate standard of living, the Labor Dept. reported.

The department's Bureau of Labor Statistics estimated that the amount was about $375-a-year more than the same family would have needed to maintain the same standard in the spring of 1967.

Since the Consumer Price Index moved up about 3 percent in the last half of 1969, the moderate or "intermediate" budget would cost the retired couple about $4,320 at the beginning of 1970.

BLS reported that budgets for a "lower" standard of living would have required annual income of $2,902 for the retired couple in the spring of 1969. A "higher" budget needed $6,616 in annual income at that time.

Applying the increase in the CPI for the last half of last year, would price the lower budget at $2,989 at the beginning of 1970. The higher budget would cost $6,814.

The government for the purposes of the budgets described a retired couple as a husband age 65 or over, and his wife, who are able to support themselves, live independently and are in reasonably good health.

The provisions of the three budgets vary as to what expenditures are allowed and how much may be spent on various items.

"Personal taxes" are included in the higher budget but no provision is made for them in either the intermediate or "lower" budgets since both are below the level at which the retired couples are obligated to pay federal income taxes.

Life insurance costs are not included in any of the budgets on the assumption that most couples have completed payment on policies prior to their living in retirement.

These are annual allowances in the spring of 1969 on basic items in each budget:

Food—Lower budget, $851; intermediate, $1,131; higher budget, $1,387.

Housing—Lower budget, $1,010; intermediate budget, $1,433; higher budget, $2,247.

Clothing and personal care—Lower budget, $240; intermediate budget, $396; higher budget, $608.

Medical care—Lower budget, $334; intermediate budget, $337; higher budget, $339.

Transportation—Lower budget, $205; intermediate budget, $412; higher budget, $735.

By region, the government's estimates of budget costs for an urban retired couple were generally higher in the Northeast and lowest in the South. Among major metropolitan areas, budgets were highest in Anchorage, Honolulu, San Francisco, and Hartford, Conn.

S. Dakota Hikes Workers' Benefits

Pierre, S.D.—State AFL-CIO backed bills to improve benefits for injured and jobless workers were adopted during a 39-day session of the South Dakota legislature.

The maximum weekly benefit for temporary disability under the state's workmen's compensation law was raised from $44 to $50, and the minimum weekly benefit was increased from $22 to $27.

The legislature also increased the maximum hospital and medical benefit amount under the law from $21,700 to $75,000 and eliminated a $22,500 limitation on total and permanent disability. Under a new limitation formula the maximum benefit a disabled worker may draw is $78,000 over 30 years.

The maximum weekly benefit under South Dakota's unemployment insurance law was increased from $41 to $47. State labor supported the bill although it sought to increase the maximum to $51 a week.

On the debit side for labor, the legislature failed to pass bills to spell out negotiating rights for public employes and create a state Dept. of Labor.

Contractors Lose Plea On Philadelphia Plan

Philadelphia—The controversial Philadelphia plan, which sets minority hiring "goals" or "quotas" in major federal construction, has been upheld by the U.S. District Court of Eastern Pennsylvania.

A suit brought by the Contractors Association of Eastern Pennsylvania had challenged the plan on several grounds and sought an injunction to prevent the Labor Dept. from putting it into effect.

The decision on appeal will be made by the board of the association which represents 80 contracting firms. The AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. had filed a brief in the case here in support of the association.

The main charge of the contractors was that the plan violates the 1964 Civil Rights Act's ban on requiring a contractor to hire employes on the basis of race, color or national origin. Earlier, Comptroller General Elmer Staats ruled that the plan did violate the act.

The association and the building trades brief cited language in the act which says an employer "can grant no preferential treatment" to race in hiring even to correct an "imbalance" in racial makeup of his workforce.

The building trades singled out a Justice Dept. opinion sent to the Senate when the law was being considered in 1964 which held "any deliberate move to maintain a given balance would be a violation" of the law.

Federal Judge Charles R. Weiner, at one point, conceded that the association made a "forceful" argument in this area, but that was his only reference to it in his decision. He never mentioned the ruling of Staats.

Weiner said that the Labor Dept. requires only that a contractor "make every good faith effort" to meet certain hiring goals and maintain certain percentages of Negroes in his workforce.

He also rejected the association's contention that the plan was unconstitutional in that the Executive branch of government infringed upon an area that is the domain of Congress.

The AFL-CIO had opposed the Philadelphia plan, which the Labor Dept. has said will be extended to other cities, on grounds that it is "unlawful, unsound and unworkable."

The federation has emphasized that its Apprenticeship Outreach programs are proving increasingly successful in bringing minority workers into skilled crafts, and that these programs are steadily being expanded.

The building trades brief in the case here re-emphasized that point and cited figures on apprentices brought into the crafts under the programs. However, the judge took no note of this in his decision.

Retail Clerks Boost Benefits for Retirees

The Retail Clerks announced that members voting in a national referendum approved an increase tied to the rise in the cost of living for all retirees who started to receive pension benefits before Jan. 1, 1969.

An RCIA canvassing board said 94.5 percent of those voting approved the change. The amount of the increase is based on the ratio of the Consumer Price Index for December 1968 to the index for the first month in which benefits are paid.

Pollution: Words or Action?

ENVIRONMENTAL POLLUTION, ecology, the "quality of American life" and a host of other synonyms and interchangeable phrases and parts are beginning to dominate the vocabulary of the major mass media, and in another month or so the flood will reach avalanche proportions that in turn will pose a new disposal problem for American society.

It has been ever so. At the beginning of the 1960s the media discovered poverty. The trade union movement, social work organizations, outstanding political leaders and scholars had been working to eliminate, cut back, ease the impact of poverty. Every radical and liberal organization in America was dedicated to its end. But poverty was kicked under the rug until Michael Harrington's brilliant book was discovered by Pres. Kennedy—or so the story goes—and suddenly TV, radio, magazines, newspapers, book publishers blossomed forth with detailed accounts of "The Other America."

The war on poverty had some impact, it made some people conscious that all was not well in "affluent" America. Some progress was made, most of it by improving the basic economic conditions in the country and adopting legislation such as a $1.60 an hour minimum wage. Poverty, in the jargon of the young, was "in." After all, who could or would be in favor of poverty?

The same sort of problem is shaping up on environment. Who can possibly be in favor of filthy rivers, soot and smoke-laden air, beer-can littered roads and obnoxious burning garbage dumps?

BUT AS WITH poverty—which in some circles was extended to describe the nation's culture, its social ways, its ethics and morality—so with pollution.

Indications from the early courses of the anti-pollution onslaught is that the word pollution may be stretched to cover the entire society and all facets of our lives. The contention is that the country is polluted by racism and militarism and the philistinism of pop music and art; the list is endless.

But the fight for clean water, air and land and to restore a biological balance as best as possible is a specific and definitive struggle. We know what the struggle for civil rights is all about; what the endless battle to wipe out the slums and build decent housing means; what a decent wage and standard of living is all about.

The problem is to rivet the attention of the American people on a specific problem long enough and dramatically enough so that the necessary political action and economic and social support is forthcoming.

In the environment struggle—we had better decide here and now that clean air, water and land are obtainable, reachable objectives in their own terms; not "in" and "out" fads and slogans and phony demonstrations and confrontations, but legislation and money and programs and a sharp and definitive sense coming from across the nation that the American people will no longer tolerate despoilation of their land and air and water.

Again, conservation groups, social organizations, trade unions and others have been at this a long time, a rather small and sometimes limited voice relentlessly sounding the same theme. Now, finally, there is a chance for real action, a chance that must not be kicked away by faddism or smothered in a blanket of semantic smog.

A Word Edgewise:

Liberal Democrats in Congress Trapped by Soviet Arms Plans

By John P. Roche

IF ONE ACCEPTS a conspiracy theory of politics, the strategy of the Nixon Administration is a cunning plot against the liberal Democrats. If one assumes, as I do, that no Administration could organize a three-man cabal without a fourth—from the Washington Post—getting into the act, it's just bad news. But either way, the liberal Democrats are trapped in a grinder—the Soviet Union on one side and Sec. of Defense Mel Laird on the other.

Laird, a man of first-rate ability, has been quietly setting the Democrats up. While Vice Pres. Spiro Agnew has been drawing the headlines and the fire of the opposition, Laird has been laying the trap.

He has been genial, the soul of reason. He has avoided all the cliches of messianic anti-communism. But his message has been clear: the Soviets are arming to the teeth and the Congress (read liberals) has refused to meet this challenge to our national security.

It would be some consolation to think that Pres. Nixon and Laird lured the liberals into the trap, but, alas, they have rushed in under their own steam. The bait was, of course, the Anti-Ballistic Missile (ABM), which various liberal senators have denounced because: 1. It wouldn't work. 2. It would work but would provoke the Soviets. 3. It wouldn't work and would provoke the Soviets. 4. Whether it worked or not, we should spend our money cleaning up slums.

Laird, placidly ignoring this statis, has simply gone ahead building the record. He has emphasized the incredible Soviet production of the monster SS-9 missile and hinted that it may soon be equipped with MIRVs, four or five independently targeted missiles that travel on the same bus. He has announced that the Russians have developed a "killer satellite" which could wreck our surveillance system. He has urged the expansion of the "Safeguard" ABM.

The liberals, busy chopping away at the defense budget, have dismissed all this as the theme song of the "military-industrial complex." After all, the Soviet Union did agree to arms limitation talks. And any rational man will admit that Moscow has a strong interest in stabilizing the arms race. (It is, admittedly, a bit difficult to explain Soviet policy in the Middle East on this basis, but that can be treated as an eccentricity.)

Those of us who insist on arguing that the USSR is launched on an extremely dangerous, hard-line course are written off as relics of the Cold War, men who have lost the capacity to adapt to changing circumstances. Mel Laird just sat and waited.

Then the trap was sprung. Not by Laird, but by his Soviet counterpart, Marshal Andrei A. Grechko, Minister of Defense of the USSR. Writing in Pravda, Grechko stated, "We possess weapons capable of reliably hitting enemy aircraft and missiles irrespective of height or speed of their flight at great distances from the defended targets."

In short, the Soviets have an operational ABM system. True, it may not be very extensive, but it is in place—and Soviet statements of this sort tend to be very reliable. They know, for example, that our radar has been monitoring their tests.

NOW WHAT? Somebody will undoubtedly say that we provoked them into setting it up, but that is sheer nonsense. The lead time on a weapons system like this is five to ten years: the first "Safeguard" units will not be in place until 1975.

The initial step must be a reappraisal of the whole liberal posture towards security problems—Sen. Henry M. Jackson, a liberal realist of the first order, could serve as a valuable tutor. For this is not just a bad dream: the Soviets are prowling in the Middle East, supporting Hanoi, playing with the noose around Berlin, and moving towards preponderant strategic power.

The American people cannot and—as Pres. Nixon and Mr. Laird well know—will not permit this to happen. If the liberals continue their fixation on the "military-industrial complex," and ignore the perilous shift in the balance of world power, they will consign themselves to oblivion. Laird will send a wreath.

The Bomb . . . The Dream:

Anarchism Breeds Repression

The following commentary by Eric Sevareid was broadcast over CBS radio and television on March 12, 1970:

PART OF THE PROTEST movement in this country is going back to the bomb and the dream. We are seeing a replay of the anarchist movement that periodically terrified Europe and parts of America before and after the turn of the century.

The weapons are the same: the assassin's bullet and the homemade bomb. The dream is the same: life without authorities or classes. The phraseology is much the same, and the theory of violence is the same—the propaganda of the dead.

As historian Barbara Tuchman points out, in the 20 years before World War I, six heads of state were assassinated, including the American Pres. McKinley, besides scores of less important leaders.

Now police are called pigs; then they were called dogs. Now we have the Chicago Seven, their passionate courtroom speeches of martyrdom reprinted around the world. In '86 it was the Chicago Eight, sentenced to death for the Haymarket Square bombing that killed several policemen.

Miss Tuchman wrote the following lines about that first anarchist period: "Thinkers in press and pamphlet constructed marvelous paper models of the anarchist millenium, poured out tirades of hate and invective upon the ruling class and its despised ally, the bourgoisie. They issued trumpet calls for action. Whom were they calling? What deed were they asking for? They did not say precisely. Unknown to them, down in the lower depths of society, lonely men were listening. They caught a glimpse of the shining millenium that promised a life without hunger and without a boss. Suddenly one of them would rise up, go out and kill, and sacrifice his own life on the altar of the idea."

THE NOTE presumably sent by today's bombers of three New York company buildings is in the pure anarchist spirit. "There is only one way to a life of love and freedom," it said, "to attack and destroy the forces of death and exploitation and to build a just society—revolution."

And the basic flaws in anarchist assumptions and strategy also remain unchanged: their idea that man is naturally good in spite of his bad institutions; their failure to understand that in this country working people are not revolutionary in spirit or even very class conscious; their failure to accept the fact, in spite of all the evidence, that what even a successful revolution does is to increase the power of the state, a power they detest.

Anarchist violence persisted in will bring neither revolution nor a life of love and freedom. It will simply bring counter-revolution, hatred and repression. The freedoms we have will be restricted, for everyone.

In the Name of 'Law and Order':

Civil Liberties Under Fire

The following editorial appeared in the March 15, 1970, edition of the New York Times entitled "Law and Order."

THE NATION RALLIES easily to the defense of its liberty when threatened by enemies abroad. It is far more difficult to arouse men to the protection of their freedoms when they are eroded at home, especially when civil liberties and personal rights are being diminished in the name of law and order.

Citizens everywhere are properly insisting on effective measures against crime and disorders that menace public and individual safety. The current wave of bombings must be halted, and so must the narcotics traffic, organized corruption and the various other manifestations of a breakdown in law and law-enforcement which renders cities unsafe and politics unsavory.

But instead of pressing for better police methods and a more adequate system of criminal justice, political leaders increasingly stoop to repressive legislation which would eventually limit the rights of all under the guise of curbing the lawless.

There is awesome consistency in the pattern suggested by these developments of recent months:

● Anti-riot legislation, although enacted in response to some provocative forays by revolutionary extremists, is being employed in such broad and sweeping ways that it is more likely to convict men for their thoughts than for the commission of unlawful acts.

● At a time when there is growing uneasiness over the resort to excessive bail as a form of punishment, the "law-and-order" forces threaten to legalize preventive detention, when the emphasis ought to be on speeding the legal process.

● Legislation already passed by the Senate would give the prosecution wide range in the use of illegally obtained evidence, while sharply limiting the right of the accused to challenge its veracity.

● A narcotics control bill, also approved by the Senate, would allow police to break into private homes and may eventually even permit the rifling of physicians' records.

● The use of bugged telephones and other forms of electronic eavesdropping has assumed proportions which only a few years ago would have been thought inconceivable in a free society.

The House of Representatives, in defiance of earlier Supreme Court opinion would let the federal government bar or dismiss defense plant employes, by bureaucratic fiat and on the vaguest of poltical pretexts.

THIS OMINOUS TREND is accompanied by attacks on the news media and verbal assaults on dissenters. It exploits fear and suspicions.

Instead of building confidence in the law by making it more efficient and impartial, such a strategy fosters mutual distrust. It pits one group against another and, by threatening repression of the momentarily unpopular, creates the illusion that the rights of the majority are enhanced.

In reality, when the constitutional rights of some are abridged or suspended, the rights of all are in jeopardy. To give extraordinary powers to the police or the courts in the name of "law and order" is to risk descent into the lawlessness and moral disorder that have marked every police state throughout history.

By New Studies Center:

Labor Education Stimulated

THE SIX-MONTH-OLD AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center is drawing broad interest and support from affiliates and having a "proliferation effect" in stimulating the unions to expand their labor education programs.

That report was given by AFL-CIO Education Dir. Walter G. Davis and Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., center director, on Labor News Conference.

Hoehler described the "basic core" staff development program as "rigorous," but noted that students give high marks to the course designed to update and upgrade the skill and understanding they need to do effective jobs.

Physical limitation of the center's facilities will limit enrollment during the early stages of its development, Hoehler said, but added that longer-range possibilities include resident facilities and courses of study ranging up to two years.

"I don't think you can just teach people how to organize and how to bargain collectively and come up with a labor leader," Hoehler asserted. "They have to know a lot more about the society, the sciences and the ecology, he added.

TURNING to the Nixon Administration's education policies, Davis called for greater effort toward "equalizing the quality of education in the inner-city with that of the more affluent suburbs." He said that he agrees with the Administration's added emphasis on giving pre-school-age children "some educational experience."

But, the pressing need for smaller classes and adaption of newly-developed educational technology demand more solid commitment than the Administration has given to date to provide the funds it will take to really improve the quality of education, he said.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

PRESSURE for new restrictions on organized labor and collective bargaining is growing in Washington and it's coming from all three branches of government—executive, legislative and judicial.

Collective bargaining may be facing one of its major tests since 1947 when the Taft-Hartley Act was passed, but there is a significant difference between 1947 and 1970.

Twenty-three years ago the Congress—the infamous 80th Congress—was under conservative domination, but the trade union movement had a friend in the White House in Harry Truman and the Supreme Court was deeply committed to the concept of free bargaining.

Today some objectionable restrictions on labor are being proposed from the White House, the Supreme Court appears set for a shift to conservatism and the Congress—well, the 1970 congressional elections may well decide the whole ball game.

Here are some of the trends:

EXECUTIVE BRANCH—Pres. Nixon has proposed the Emergency Public Interest Protection Act of 1970 which in effect provides final and binding arbitration by outside parties in five industries: railroads, airlines, maritime, longshore and trucking.

For the first time it would place railroads and airlines under the Taft-Hartley Act with its 80-day "cooling off" period. There are many facets to the proposal but when the final crunch comes it means that an outside panel of three members, named by the President, would select the proposal of one of the two parties to the dispute.

Admittedly it has a new twist, this "final offer selection," but it is still compulsory arbitration.

This pressure for compulsory arbitration, not only in transportation, but in the Post Office Dept. and in government employment, has even brought forth a strong note of concern from the Chamber of Commerce as well as organized labor.

Organized labor has a crucial stake in the National Labor Relations Board. Pres. Nixon has just named a management lawyer to the board who, if confirmed, will be its chairman, replacing Frank McCulloch.

The Labor Dept. has proposed a form of compulsory arbitration in agriculture which uses an involved final and binding mediation procedure to block strikes or lockouts during harvest time.

In one other area there is at least uncertainty. This is in the Labor Dept. seeking to set aside the United Mine Workers election. The Secretary of Labor has not yet revealed specific evidence of malpractices in the election that would justify upsetting a membership vote of almost two to one. The courts will resolve the dispute.

JUDICIAL—The fight over confirmation of Judge G. Harrold Carswell for the Supreme Court is taking on new meaning as a result of Chief Justice Warren Burger's minority opinion which favors giving states power in some picketing cases which they have not had before.

Joining Burger in his opinion were Justice Byron White and Potter Stewart. This indicates that a shift of one or two seats could switch the high court to a new position on picketing.

LEGISLATIVE—The 91st Congress has not been responsive to the anti-labor forces, but the pressures for such action are growing. The President has thrown the "hot potatoes" into the congressional lap.

The hoppers of both houses are filled with a wide assortment of proposals to hamstring the labor movement and while they have been contained this could all change if the 1970 elections were to go to labor's enemies.

The Senate subcommittee of the Separation of Powers of the Judiciary Committee, under the chairmanship of Sen. Sam Ervin (D-N.C.) has already issued a report calling for major changes in the NLRB which it calls too pro-labor.

For the immediate future, the hope of heading off a new anti-labor tide is a liberal, progressive 92nd Congress.

BROAD INTEREST and support of affiliated unions for the six-month-old AFL-CIO's Labor Studies Center was reported by AFL-CIO Dir. of Education Walter G. Davis and the center's director, Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., second and third from left, on Labor News Conference. Questioning them on the public affairs radio program, broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual network, were Alex Uhl, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press.

How to Buy:

Some Spring Bargains Spotted But Most Living Costs Still Rise

By Sidney Margolius

FOOD PRICES this spring have leveled off a little before the annual summer price leap. Clothing prices are taking a tumble, with some rare bargains available. But most other living costs are still rising.

The recession is hitting hardest at the younger families with low seniority and high installment debts. Reports from industrial centers also show that the families having most difficulty are those who depended on overtime to pay for installment purchases.

One of the problems in the cost of living is that while some farm and wholesale prices have come down, retailers have been noticeably slow to reduce retail tags. Despite a 15 percent increase in the supply of broilers, prices are still at about last year's level. While supplies of eggs are higher than a year ago, prices recently were at the highest levels since 1921, and retailers have lagged in passing along the recent price cuts.

Retailers also have been slow to pass on recent reductions in wholesale beef prices. You wouldn't know it from the retail prices, but production of red meats actually has been at record levels. You'll have to outwit the stores at their own game by concentrating buying on their specials, and looking for the better values (see Food Buying Calendar below).

But while your food prices are easing temporarily, housing costs have reached frightening levels with no relief in sight. The average intended sales price of new houses currently is $27,000, compared with $24,600 a year ago. That's a leap of 10 percent in just one year.

Jumping price tags on homes, and high mortgage and property tax rates, have knocked out the old rule of thumb that you usually can afford a house costing about 2.5 times annual income. Now you would have to estimate your home-buying capacity at about twice annual income. One lender figures that a family now needs an annual income of $13,000 to carry a $27,000 home compared with $8,000 for the typical $19,500 home five years ago.

A new expense problem in the form of utility rate increases is in sight, the Consumer Federation of America warns. Many private utility companies have filed for rate increases in recent months.

The federation is asking its local affiliates to mount a fight against rubber-stamping by state utility commissions of the requested increases. What has especially angered both consumer organizations and even some of the state commissioners is that rates for phone calls within a state often cost more than long distance calls.

But even though general living costs are still rising, there are bargains this month for alert shoppers. Here are tips on buying opportunities this April:

Clothing—Look this month for some of the biggest clothing sales in recent years. The combination of an early Easter, high prices of other necessities such as food, and last year's price increases, have led to reduced volume and large inventories.

Some clothing outlets already have offered men's suits at such rare prices as $19, unusual, of course, even for distress merchandise. But despite the bargains, select carefully. If the fashion designers succeed in getting women to buy the new midi length skirts, there isn't much you can do with mini skirts unless you sew two of them together. The mini skirts certainly have been profitable for manufacturers. They use only 1.9 square yards of fabric compared to 3.2 for the longer skirts of a few years ago.

Cars—While April is not usually a month of low car prices, manufacturers and dealers are trying to stimulate sales. One manufacturer has made outright list price cuts: Dodge, $150-$200, on the Dart.

Appliances, TV—Also look for cut prices on household appliances and TV sets this spring as makers and stores both cut prices because of slow sales. Especially look for big sales on color TV sets. RCA has been sitting on big inventories, but has been reluctant to cut prices as would ordinarily happen in such a situation. Meanwhile the rest of the industry is watching RCA and waiting, before they start dumping.

FOOD BUYING CALENDAR—You'll find meats a little cheaper this month, with both beef and pork (which has been high) in better supply. But broilers are still relatively better values, especially at sales.

Eggs are the buy of the month. April is the flush season both for quality and price. Prices are down about 30 percent from last winter's high.

While fresh produce generally has been high recently, you'll find good values in some of the canned vegetables and fruits in especially heavy supply. Prices are actually lower this year on canned corn, tomatoes, cling peaches and fruit cocktail.

Soup to Nonsense:

Well-Organized Day-Dreaming Soothes Pain of Boring Talks

By Jane Goodsell

EVER FIND YOURSELF bored to tears at a horse show or a lecture on Japanese flower arrangements? Have you ever waited, with sweating palms, for an x-ray report? Ever been a passenger on a plane, circling Kennedy airport for two hours in a dense fog? Listened, with sinking heart, to an after-dinner speaker (who has already droned on for 45 minutes) say, "And now, for a more comprehensive view of the problem, let us go back to 1946. . . ."?

In such situations, the only way to keep from losing your mind is to give it busy-work to do. I, myself, find it therapeutic to compose mental lists. Of, for example, the names of all the pets I've ever had. Or the teachers I've known. Or doctors. Or hairdressers. The foods I like best and hate most.

Better yet are alphabet games. Try listing colors, one for each letter: "A" for apricot, "B" for blue, "C" for cerise, "D" for dust, "E" for ecru or eggplant, "F" for fawn, and so on. Or you can use geographical names: "A" for Athens, "B" for Boise, "C" for Calcutta . . . Or makes of cars: Austin, Buick, Chevrolet, De Soto, Edsel . . . Or wearing apparel: ascot, beret, caftan, diapers, earrings, fez, garters. . .

This is ideal distraction for a dull lecture because not only are you likely to look impressively engrossed but, if you use paper and pencil (which is helpful) people will most probably assume that you are taking notes on the speech.

I can also recommend inventing second lines of verse to follow the first lines of famous poems:

Young Lochinvar is come out of the west,
Wearing a gaudy checkered vest.
Now I lay me down to sleep.
Here I go, counting sheep.
In Xanadu did Kubla Khan
Get up and put his trousers on.

Experts Refute Myth On Labor Leaders

THERE IS A COMMON TENDENCY in this country to exaggerate the power of labor leaders. They are frequently portrayed as opportunistic labor bosses—the "bad guys" of the labor movement, so to speak—who run their unions autocratically, with little or no regard for democratic procedures.

The rank-and-file, by contrast, are sentimentally and idealistically portrayed as the "good guys" who could be counted upon to do the right thing most of the time if only they could get out from under the control of their domineering leaders.

Derek C. Bok, dean of Harvard Law School, and John T. Dunlop, professor of economics at Harvard and one of the nation's leading experts in the field of labor-management relations, are of the opinion that this tendency to exaggerate the power of labor leaders is a serious mistake in that it fails to reckon with membership pressures, the influence of subordinate labor officials and staff assistants, and the pressure of the environment on union policies and programs.

In a major book on labor-management relations, "Labor and the American Community," to be published in April by Simon and Schuster, Inc., Professors Bok and Dunlop begin their perceptive discussion of this problem by taking note of the fact that, at present, most commentators seem to assume that the future of the labor movement rests mainly in the hands of its leaders.

"This point of view," they remark, "is reflected in the constant criticism of labor leaders, and it is buttressed by a mass of opinion data to the effect that unions are run pretty much as the top officials see fit."

They point out, however, that "one must beware of such opinion, for each of the groups that most influence the public view of organized labor has its special reasons for misconceiving the role of the union leader and exaggerating his influence."

OF THE MAJOR GROUPS in question, Bok and Dunlop single out two in particular: businessmen and intellectuals. Businessmen, they contend, are naturally inclined to blame their own labor problems on "some opportunistic union leader who has succeeded in leading the workers astray."

This is said to be an understandable reaction (and not merely a tactical ploy) on the part of management representatives, for "it would be most disagreeable to concede that wages are kept unfairly low or that the quest for efficiency had led to harsh supervision or uncomfortable working conditions."

Intellectuals, for their part, are said to be overly sentimental about the rank-and-file and, by the same token, overly critical of labor leaders. Liberal critics of the labor movement, in the opinion of Bok and Dunlop, have been "unable to champion the cause of the poor and the disadvantaged without idealizing them as well. As a result—until recently, at any rate—these critics could seldom bring themselves to blame union shortcomings on the members; instead, they concluded that the leaders must somehow be responsible."

The tendency to exaggerate the power of labor leaders is not simply an academic issue. On the contrary, it involves some very real problems in the practical order. Professors Bok and Dunlop cite two in particular:

1. The inability of labor leaders in some cases to exercise wage restraint, eliminate featherbedding, or refrain from strikes because of pressures from the rank-and-file.

2. The inability of labor leaders in some cases, because of rank-and-file apathy or opposition, to turn their talents to new fields: organizing the poor, mobilizing their members to fight for consumer protection, and taking the lead "in developing a more meaningful life for workers caught between the television set and the tedium of a semi-skilled repetitive job."

The first of these two problems is very much in the news at the present time. It is estimated that one out of every eight collective bargaining settlements in disputes handled by federal mediators is being rejected by the rank-and-file. A good (i.e., bad) example of this growing trend was the refusal within recent weeks of one group of railroad employes to ratify an agreement negotiated in good faith by their union leaders.

I would have to agree with Bok and Dunlop when they say that by underestimating the problems which many labor leaders face vis a vis the rank-and-file, "liberal critics have succeeded—after two decades of biting prose—in accomplishing virtually nothing except to antagonize the union leadership."

Texas Report Hits Rangers:

Nixon Urged to Halt 'Green Card' Labor

The Texas Advisory Committee of the U.S. Civil Rights Commission has asked Pres. Nixon to abolish "commuter labor" (green carders) crossing the border from Mexico and has called on the State of Texas to abolish the Texas Rangers because of their anti-labor activities.

The group also asked for coverage of farm workers under federal and Texas labor laws.

The committee, composed of citizens from all parts of the state, issued its recommendations after holding open meetings and interviewing Texans on discrimination.

They found that Mexican-Americans in the Rio Grande Valley were "fearful and bitter" toward the Texas Rangers.

Farm labor is prevented from organizing, said the report, by the state's "mass picketing law" and law enforcement groups like the Texas Rangers.

"There is strong evidence," they found, "that the conduct of law officers in strike situations in South Texas is not neutral, but rather supportive of the farm operators' position and intimidating to laborers and labor organizers."

Commission Chairman Rev. Theodore M. Hesburgh was quoted as saying the oppression of farm labor in Texas is "as close as you can come to slavery or people in bondage or a complete deprival of normal, civil and human rights and I think it is a very serious situation and it ought to be made a federal case."

The report cites an estimate by the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee that 43,687 commuters from Mexico work in Texas, California, Arizona and New Mexico in competition with American workers.

These "green carders," said the committee, "provide a limitless source of cheap labor for growers, making organization of farm labor in Texas almost impossible."

The report also asked that the National Labor Relations Act and full minimum wage coverage be extended to farm workers and that the Texas Legislature enact workmen's compensation laws, unemployment and disability insurance laws along with mandatory housing standards applicable to migrant farm workers.

There was strong criticism of some federal economic development schemes. The "twin-plant" concept of the Commerce Dept. was denounced because it permits U.S. industries to locate plants across the border in Mexico in order to take advantage of cheaper labor.

The plants are supposed to be linked with operations on the U.S. side providing jobs for both border communities. But, says the report, "in some cases after the company begins operations the plant in the United States is closed down and on occasion workers have been told if they want to work they will have to work in Mexico."

The report also called on the federal government to make its Texas installations "models of equal employment opportunity for other Texas employers to follow."

CULINARY WORKERS and bartenders struck three Las Vegas resort centers and were locked out at 13 others in a contract dispute that dimmed the lights of the entertainment strip. Here are some of the 14,000 strikers whose picket lines, respected by 5,000 other union workers, won new contract terms after five days.

Las Vegas Strike Pact Yields Gains for 14,000

Las Vegas—The first major strike in the history of Las Vegas's suburban gambling "strip" produced 31.5 percent over three years in contract improvements for 14,000 members of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes.

Five thousand showgirls, musicians, electricians and others refused for five days, the duration of the contract dispute, to cross the picket lines of striking union members. Culinary Workers Local 226 and Bartenders Local 165 struck the three hotels and resort employers imposed a lockout at 13 others.

The hotels turned off their neon signs and some asked guests to leave. Gov. Paul Laxalt (R) flew in from Carson City, met with each side in the dispute, then flew out again when negotiations were resumed.

Some gambling casinos continued to operate with non-union help but business was anemic in the resort area outside the city limits. Hotels and casinos on Fremont Street in downtown Las Vegas were not affected by the strike. Their contracts have not expired.

The strike started Mar. 11 at the Desert Inn, the International and Caesar's Palace. It ended Mar. 16 after the unions' joint executive board ratified a new three-year contract and hotels began calling back their employes on regular shifts.

The walkout was the first for "strip" employes. A 1967 strike involved only downtown resorts, the union said.

Wage increases in the new agreements range from 45 cents an hour for employes who get tips to 65 cents an hour for non-tip classifications—15 cents per year for the tip group, 25, 20 and 20 cents in the non-tip categories.

Also won was a pension plan to take effect May 1, improvements in the health and welfare plans, including a dental care program, and other gains.

Management of the Nevada Resort Hotel Association agreed to drop a no-strike no-picketing demand.

The hotel union represents maitres d'hotel, waiters and waitresses, chefs and other kitchen workers, bartenders and bar boys, housekeeping workers and, in the gambling casinos, change girls and booth cashiers.

URW Presses Health, Safety In Big 4 Talks

Akron—The Rubber Workers served notice on the rubber industry's "Big Four" companies that establishment of a URW Institute on Industrial Health and Safety will have top priority in current contract negotiations.

Pres. Peter Bommarito of the union emphasized the importance of such an institute at opening bargaining sessions with Uniroyal, Goodyear, Firestone and Goodrich. He said the union will ask each firm to create a health and safety fund to finance an institute program.

The institute would:

- Conduct a health and safety survey in the rubber, plastic and allied products industries for the evaluation, prevention and control of occupational hazards.
- Engage in research to identify the nature and extent of harmful work factors.
- Develop an industry-wide system for the early detection and recognition of the harmful effects of toxic influences.
- Arrange controls of new chemicals and processes, old processes of recognized toxicity, and working conditions that produce accidents.

Bommarito told the employers that the URW also seeks a substantial increase for skilled tradesmen, higher rates for hourly paid employes, elimination of plant wage differentials and other "unwarranted wage differentials whether based on geographic location or type of product." Members also will insist on pension improvements, better insurance provisions and key changes in the grievance and arbitration procedure, he said.

AAA Elects Kirkland, Lyons as Directors

New York—The American Arbitration Association has elected AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland to the board of directors at the association's annual meeting here.

Among nine others elected to the board are Pres. John H. Lyons of the Iron Workers and David A. Morse, who will retire May 31 as director general of the International Labor Organization.

Organized Labor's Role Traced In Pressing Equal Rights Fight

New York—History shows that union officials were among the first to press for equal rights and educational opportunities for Negroes in America.

That point was emphasized and supported in a paper presented by AFL-CIO Education Dir. Walter G. Davis at a two-day conference on Labor & the Migrant held at the Center for Migration Studies at Brooklyn College.

Attending the conference, at the invitation of its sponsor, the David Dubinsky Foundation, were more than 100 representatives of education, labor and minority group organizations.

Participants discussed economic contributions of migrants in the United States, their reactions to and involvement in U.S. unions, and experiences of migrants in Canada and Europe.

Among papers presented, in addition to Davis's, were others dealing with experiences of migrant groups, including Mexican-Americans and Puerto Ricans.

Davis noted that both the National Labor Union and the Knights of Labor, the two main labor federations formed in the period immediately following the Civil War, attempted to promote equal rights for Negroes but found local prejudices too formidable to overcome.

While Negroes suffered extensively from wage and other forms of discrimination in the South after the Civil War, Davis pointed out, this was not the fault of union leaders.

Citing studies by Ray Marshall, a University of Texas professor who has specialized in Negro history, Davis pointed out that the prevailing sentiment among whites "was to keep Negroes on the lower end of the job spectrum."

He noted the public also overlooks efforts to advance Negroes' rights in the 1930s led by such labor officials as A. Philip Randolph, then president of the Sleeping Car Porters, and Willard S. Townsend, founder of the United Transport Service Employes.

And in the years since, he continued, they and other labor leaders have been responsible for ending segregation in union locals, bringing Negroes into leadership positions in labor and securing passage of civil rights bills in Congress.

The integration of the Negro fully into society, Davis said, is part of labor's goal "to spread enlightenment throughout labor's ranks and the population in general."

This goal and an end to all racism still remain a challenge to America's future "in monumental proportions," Davis said. But, he added, "it can be achieved by a strong alliance between labor and Negroes. Their goals and objectives are identical."

Lois Gray and Edward Gonzalez of the New York State School of Industrial & Labor Relations, Cornell University, urged unions to bolster their efforts on behalf of Puerto Rican immigrants.

Their paper pointed out that Puerto Ricans have mainly settled in New York, where "more than half of their families live in poverty" despite union efforts to raise their wage levels through legislation and collective bargaining.

Puerto Ricans "look to their unions as the major organizations with which they have continuing contact" to help them get better jobs, education and housing, it was emphasized.

Julian Samora and Jorge Bustamante, University of Notre Dame educators, presented a paper tracing exploitation of Mexican workers who have come into the United States both legally and illegally.

They called for enforcement of existing immigration laws as applied to "commuters"—those who live in Mexico but come to the United States to work under "green card" permits—and enactment and enforcement of laws punishing employers of illegal aliens.

Samora and Bustamante urged the application of minimum wage laws to all workers and full rights for workers to have unions and bargain in "agribusiness."

Other papers were presented by A. J. Jaffe of the Bureau of Applied Social Research, Columbia University; Professors Jack Barbash of the University of Michigan and Solomon Barkin of the University of Massachusetts; and R. A. Jenness of Canada's Dept. of Manpower & Immigration.

Gus Tyler, assistant president of the Ladies' Garment Workers, at a conference luncheon analyzed the economic, social and political progress made in this country by immigrants.

34 Bay Foundries Struck by Molders

San Francisco—Thirty-four Bay Area foundries have been struck in a dispute over wages and a proposed cut in overtime pay.

The struck firms employ 1,100 members of Local 164 of the Molders.

New Film Records Convention Actions

The story of the AFL-CIO's Eighth Constitutional Convention and its program for the Seventies is now on film and available for showing to state conventions and union meetings.

The 26-minute color film of the Atlantic City convention, "A Long Way to Go," describes labor's goals and covers the highlights of convention activity and discussion.

Included are addresses by Federation Pres. George Meany and other AFL-CIO leaders as well as major guest speakers, former Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey, Israeli Prime Minister Golda Meir, Astronaut Edwin E. "Buzz" Aldrin, who is a member of the Machinists, Labor Sec. George Shultz and Defense Sec. Melvin Laird.

"A Long Way to Go" may be rented at $3 a showing or purchased at $195 a print from the AFL-CIO Film Division, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

AALC Funds Aid Togolese Union Center

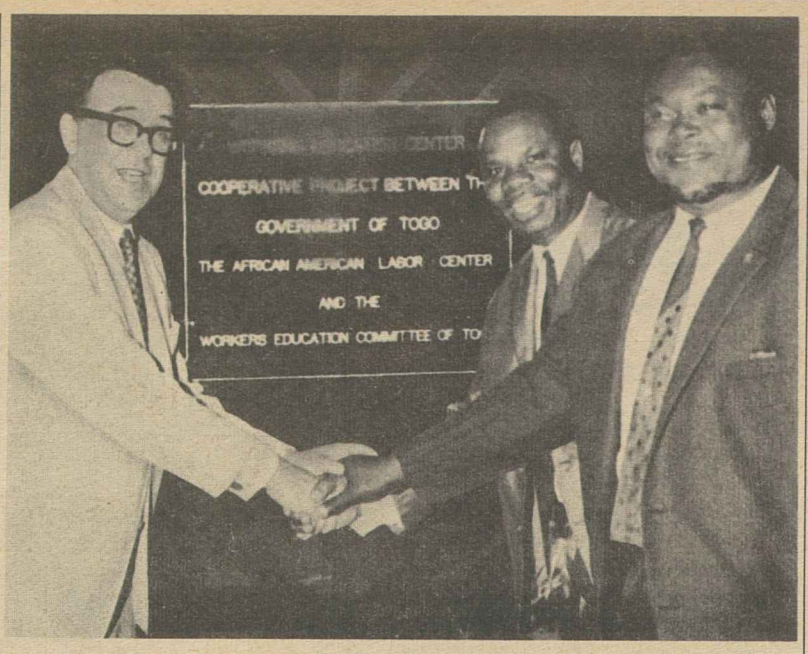
Lome, Togo—An education center for Togolese workers was formally opened here through the cooperation of African and American trade unions.



The construction costs of $37,000 for the Togo Workers' Education Center were paid by the African-American Labor Center.

The new two-story building is located in the heart of this West African nation's capital city. The structure has both classrooms and housing facilities.

Expenses for the administration and maintenance of the center will be covered by the Togolese government, trade unions and the Togolese Workers' Education National Committee.

Speaking for AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at the dedication ceremonies, AALC Executive Dir. Irving Brown noted speedy efforts which led to the construction of the center. It took exactly one year, Brown observed, from the discussion and planning stage to final completion and opening of the center. Meany is chairman of AALC.

The dedication program was attended by key Togo government officials, including Labor Minister Barthelemy Lamboni, who cut the ribbon for the formal opening.

TRAINING FACILITIES for the Togo Workers' Education Center are opened officially in the west African nation's capital city of Lome. Participating in the dedication of the building are, from left, Irving Brown, executive director of the African-American Labor Center; Eugene Agbogbe, chairman of the Togolese Workers' Education Committee, and Alphonse Tettekpoe, regional secretary of the Togo Teachers Union. The AALC provided funds for the construction of the center.

New Agency Set For Credit Unions

An independent National Credit Union Administration will be established to regulate the nation's 13,000 federal credit unions under a new law passed by Congress and signed by Pres. Nixon.

The legislation had the strong support of the nation's credit unions, with some 20 million members.

Previously the Bureau of Federal Credit Unions had been a unit of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare. The bureau's present head, J. Deane Gannon, will serve as acting administrator of the new agency until the President names an administrator, subject to confirmation by the Senate.

The legislation was sponsored by Rep. Wright Patman (D-Tex.), chairman of the House Banking Committee.

New Labor Violation Laid to J. P. Stevens

Shelby, N.C.—J. P. Stevens & Co., Inc., the nation's most persistent textile industry violator of the federal labor law, has not abandoned its union-busting in spite of court rulings and National Labor Relations Board "cease and desist" orders, an NLRB examiner has found.

The decision came shortly before the NLRB okayed another examiner's recommendation that Stevens reinstate a fired employe and post compliance notices at all its plants in the area of Roanoke Rapids, N.C. The firing was in 1968.

Trial Examiner James T. Barker ruled that the nation's second largest textile chain committed a new violation by announcing new employe benefits two days before a scheduled NLRB election here last May and by harassing union members at another Stevens plant in nearby Hickory, N.C.

The election was called off when the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. and the Textile Workers' Union of America filed unfair practice charges against Stevens, a big government contractor.

Barker heard testimony last November in Shelby and recently ruled that the corporation broke the law in these particulars:

- By timing a wage-increase announcement and announcing plans to give employes an extra paid holiday not according to its usual practice but by calling employe meetings just before the scheduled election.
- By questioning Hickory plant employes about their union activities, threatening them, putting pressure on them through supervisors, and maintaining an "unprecedented watch" over them during their normal work activities.

The ruling was the eighth in a row against Stevens's attempts to smash a union organizing drive that started in 1963.

Stevens has been found guilty of interference with the rights of its employes on seven previous occasions since 1963. It appealed all seven, lost every appeal in court—including two in the Supreme Court—and is expected by union members to appeal this one in line with its system of challenging the law every step of the way to the high court.

In the latest case, the examiner concluded that Stevens did not post bulletin board notices of an industry-wide wage increase, its usual practice, but timed the announcement to coincide with an attack on the union and a hasty promise to grant another paid holiday.

Coming two days before the scheduled election, the announcements were made to "gain maximum impact" and to influence employes against voting for the union, the examiner ruled.

He recommended also that Stevens be ordered to reinstate a union member who quit because her pay was cut, to give her backpay at her former rate and a job comparable to the one she left because of a supervisor's harassment.

D.C. Station to Air Labor News Conference

The AFL-CIO's public affairs radio interview Labor News Conference can now be heard in the Greater Washington, D. C., area on WAVA-FM Tuesdays at 11:05 p.m. Labor News Conference soon begins its 10th year on the Mutual network, featuring top union officers and staff in spontaneous interviews by veteran Washington reporters on a wide range of issues in the news.

Shift in Trade Policies Urged to Meet Realities

The nation "needs a change in its international trade posture, policy and mechanism" to meet the realities of the 1970s, Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger told a panel of the Joint Economic Committee of Congress.

He testified before a subcommittee seeking views on what trade policy the United States should pursue in the decade with regard to both its national interest and maintaining a strong position in international trade.

Goldfinger cited examples of harsh effects on U.S. workers in a number of industries due to the development of multi-national companies that are manufacturing abroad to take advantage of low wages, and then shipping products back to the United States.

Much of his testimony was based upon a 40-page report on trade presented by the AFL-CIO Economic Policy Committee to the recent AFL-CIO Executive Council meeting in Florida.

Citing a deterioration in the nation's trade position—to a point where the U.S. surplus of exports over imports has nearly vanished, Goldfinger said a new trade policy should be based upon two principles:

One, moving ahead with orderly trade expansion "with the United States as the starting point of American policy and posture."

Two, the development of "realistic trade, investment and monetary policies to deal with foreign investments and relations of U.S. firms, multi-national corporations and international banks."

New policies and mechanisms must be adopted, he continued, "to make it possible to get at the varied causes of the specific problems that affect different groups of workers, different product-lines and different industries."

"Economic and political isolationism is not the answer," Goldfinger said. "Neither is continuation of a head-in-the-sand posture and maintenance of policies that really were developed in 18th and 19th Century England, when it was the only major industrial nation in the world."

90th Convention:

Marine Engineers Press for Growth

Miami Beach, Fla.—The 15,000-member Marine Engineers Beneficial Association came into its 90th convention here Mar. 16-18 with major gains to report and broad plans for the future.

The 95-year-old union, whose basic membership comprises licensed engineering officers on the U.S. merchant fleet, has begun to organize related groups, like shipping company office personnel and naval architects. It adopted a resolution calling for an "intensified enlargement" of organizing campaigns.

The report of MEBA Pres. Jesse M. Calhoon to the 32-delegate "mini-convention" described last year's negotiations with maritime employers as a "triumph of the American system of collective bargaining."

He praised the cooperative efforts with the National Maritime Union and the American Radio Association which had made possible an agreement without resort to a strike.

The MEBA president's report noted that the union's pension plan now has assets of $104,807,000. Total benefits paid out last year by three MEBA plans—pension, health and vacation—totaled just under $35 million, an average of about $4,000 each for the almost 10,000 beneficiaries covered by MEBA's maritime agreements.

The convention heard reports on the successful operation of a number of MEBA functions begun or expanded within the past two years:

- The Calhoon-MEBA Engineering School in Baltimore has graduated 294 young men from its two-year course into jobs as third assistant engineers aboard merchant ships. An additional 168 men will be graduated this year. Over 600 men are currently enrolled at the school, either as cadet officers or men returning for advanced upgrading courses.
- The MEBA retirees group is working to serve the special needs of men who have left their maritime engineering jobs. Under the present agreements, men can retire after 20 years, regardless of age, and after 25 years they receive pensions of 50 percent of their pay.
- Four diagnostic centers have been opened by MEBA plans in New York, Baltimore, New Orleans and San Francisco. Members and their dependents are eligible for annual physical checkups and other forms of medical care.

A call for rapid enlargement and improvement of the American merchant marine was sounded by the convention. A statement passed unanimously by the delegates charged that the merchant marine is being permitted to "deteriorate quantitatively and qualitatively."

"It is nothing less than a major scandal that this rich nation is willing to turn over its overseas trade to the merchant ships of other countries, a move clearly detrimental to our economy and to our national defense posture.

"The time has come to stop demoting the American merchant marine and to start promoting it."

The union called for speedy passage by Congress of the Nixon Administration's shipbuilding program as a "first and long overdue step toward rebuilding the American merchant marine." It added that the Administration's goals for the merchant marine need expansion in order to develop a merchant fleet "consistent with our nation's pre-eminent position in world trade."

The delegates rapped Administration efforts to introduce compulsory arbitration into the transportation industry. They charged that Pres. Nixon's message to Congress on the administration of pension funds ignored a number of "constructive suggestions" and concentrated instead on catering to "those whose aims have always been to hamstring trade unions."

In other resolutions, MEBA urged more effective protection of the consumer, a more adequate program to set and enforce standards for air and water purity, and passage of the O'Hara-Williams bill for the setting of federal standards for industrial health and safety.

No elections were held at the convention. In 1968 Calhoon was re-elected president for a 5-year term and Charles A. Black of San Francisco was elected secretary-treasurer. The union has two districts: District No. 1—Pacific Coast Division, covering men on the Atlantic, Gulf and Pacific Coasts; and District No. 2, covering the Great Lakes.

Pressmen's Settlement Ends Baltimore Strike

Baltimore—Publishers of this city's three daily papers held out for 10 weeks against scheduling changes asked by striking Printing Pressmen but changed their minds an hour before a scheduled union membership meeting.

Hearst's News-American and the evening and morning Sun resumed publishing Mar. 17 after Pressmen's Local 31 voted 207-36 to accept a new three-year contract. Removal of the picket lines brought a return to work also for more than 1,000 other union members who had stayed out since Jan. 2.

The strike was the first in the history of Baltimore pressmen. It grew out of an arbitrator's ruling last year that continued to deny regular days off and scheduled lunch periods for all but a few pressroom workers.

The strike settlement moved the union part way toward its goal of better scheduling. Other gains include wage increases of $20 a week, $15 and $13 at yearly intervals; vacations with a top of four weeks now, six weeks in 1972; improvements in sick benefits, life insurance, hospitalization coverage, bereavement leave, and an eighth paid holiday — the employe's anniversary of hiring—in the final contract year.

Union members voted to put $1.25 of their weekly wage boost into pensions instead of regular pay.

The pressmen's old contract expired Dec. 31. So did contracts of the Typographical Union and the unaffiliated Mailers. The publishers came to terms with them during the pressmen's strike, and with the Stereotypers.

Due to expire later this year are Teamster contracts at all papers and the Newspaper Guild contract at the Sunpapers.

Carswell's Fitness Disputed in Senate

well's involvement in a Florida golf club set up to evade desegregation of city-owned facilities and his participation in a land development that barred Negroes.

Tuttle confirmed the telephone call in a telegram to Tydings and expressed surprise that the original letter of endorsement has been "used for a purpose inconsistent with my decision not to testify as communicated directly to Judge Carswell."

Tuttle said, however, that he didn't think Carswell was trying to deceive the Judiciary Committee by not informing them of Tuttle's change of mind.

The fact remains that Carswell made no effort to correct the record and the impression that Tuttle was still supporting him, Tydings said.

Senators, he declared, will have to draw their own conclusion as to why Carswell did not do so.

Later Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (Mont.) said Carswell's failure to reveal he had lost the backing of his former chief judge raised "new questions" that could hinder his confirmation.

And the assistant Republican leader, Sen. Robert P. Griffin (Mich.) conceded that "it doesn't help obviously when a respected jurist like Tuttle withdraws his support."

A second sharp rebuff to Carswell came from a colleague on the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals.

Judge John Minor Wisdom, a prominent jurist originally appointed by Pres. Eisenhower, disclosed that he could not support Carswell's nomination and said, "I stand with Judge Tuttle."

He said one of the judges in the circuit court had asked Carswell's colleagues to write letters to the Senate Judiciary Committee in support of the nomination. Wisdom said two other judges had refused to do so and he himself had threatened to write a "dissenting opinion" on the nomination if any effort were made to get a blanket endorsement of Carswell from the judges.

Wisdom rejected a suggestion that he might be in line for the Supreme Court vacancy if Carswell's nomination is rejected by the Senate.

"I do not fit in with Atty. Gen. John Mitchell's Southern strategy," he said.

Sen. Alan Cranston (D-Calif.) accused Carswell of violating three canons of judicial ethics while serving as a federal district judge before his promotion to the court of appeals.

He based his charge on testimony by witnesses before the Judiciary Committee that Carswell had been hostile, discourteous and prejudiced in his attitude toward attorneys bringing civil rights cases before his court.

The judicial canons involved, Cranston said, set standards for a judge's conduct on the bench, require courtesy and civility to lawyers and specify that the judge's conduct "in every particular . . . should be above reproach."

Cranston charged that Carswell has shown "a consistent pattern of bias and hostility toward anyone arguing a civil rights case," along with "emotionalism, intemperance, anger, and a close-minded determination to prejudge the cases before him without even listening to them."

Leading newspapers throughout the nation, including a number that had editorially supported the Haynsworth nomination, have come out against confirmation of Carswell.

The latest addition to the list came when the Baltimore Sun resumed publication after settlement of a 74-day Pressmen's strike.

Its lead editorial described Carswell as "about as nearly a nonentity as a federal judge can be."

The newspaper said, "We do not in any way find fault with the appointment of a conservative southerner. We object, however, to the appointment of mediocre men to the nation's highest court, and mediocrity is the word that most accurately characterizes Judge Carswell's record."

METAL TRADES delegates representing 35,000 workers in East Coast Navy shipyards stressed organizing, expanded services and other goals in the year ahead at a Washington convention. They denounced a Defense Dept. order cutting out thousands of civilian jobs. Pres. Earl Brown of the East Coast District Metal Trades Council, addresses the convention. Retiring Sec.-Treas. Merle J. O'Donal is at the left.

Metal Trades Score Slash In Navy Jobs

Delegates representing 35,000 metal trades workers in Navy shipyards denounced a Defense Dept. order that would wipe out thousands of civilian jobs and urged Pres. Nixon and Congress to halt the Administration's "current unemployment program."

In a resolution unanimously approved by more than 100 delegates to a Washington, D. C., convention of the East Coast District Metal Trades Council, the council charged that federal employes have been chosen as "pawns to be sacrificed in the chess game the Administration is playing under the guise of balancing the budget."

The Defense Dept.'s "meat-ax approach" to economy would "reward dedicated employes" for years of faithful service by reducing them to the welfare ranks, accelerate the already dangerous unemployment rate, and return the nation's defense posture to pre-Pearl Harbor status, the delegates said.

The council, headed by Earl Brown of Norfolk, Va., is affiliated with the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. It encompasses 49 locals of 20 AFL-CIO international unions working in naval shipyards in Washington, Norfolk, Philadelphia, Portsmouth, N.H., Boston and Charleston, S.C.

In other actions, the council voted to resist Navy efforts to "destroy and render ineffective" its affiliated unions by promoting the "independent organization" concept which has led to raids by unaffiliated unions. The delegates also voted to cooperate with the Metal Trades Dept. in expanding its facilities and services.

New terms in office were voted for Brown, of the Boilermakers, and Vice Pres. Charles Thomas of the Painters, Philadelphia. Merle J. O'Donal of the Pattern Makers, Portsmouth, N.H., stepped down as secretary-treasurer and was succeeded by Robert Young of the Firemen & Oilers, Portsmouth.

Supreme Court Voids NLRB Contract Ruling

The Supreme Court ruled in a divided opinion that Congress did not give the National Labor Relations Board the power to order an employer or a union to reach contract agreement on any specific point.

The court voted 4-2 to reverse a 1966 decision by the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. The lower court had ruled that the H. K. Porter Co., Inc., steel firm in Danville, Va., must agree to deduct the dues of consenting members of the Steelworkers as a remedy for the company's refusal to bargain in good faith on a checkoff clause. The high court remanded the case to the appeals judges for a new ruling.

The union and the NLRB had been trying since 1961 to find some legal way to get the Porter firm to obey the law requiring it to bargain in good faith. The board's 1966 order, fashioned at the suggestion of the D.C. appellate court, was the first in its history compelling agreement on a specific contract clause.

Justice Hugo L. Black wrote the majority opinion for himself, Chief Justice Warren E. Burger and Justice William J. Brennan, Jr. The opinion said "it may well be true, as the Court of Appeals felt, that the present remedial powers of the board are insufficiently broad to cope with important labor problems. But it is the job of Congress, not the board or the courts, to decide when and if it is necessary to allow governmental review of proposals" for contract agreements and "compulsory submission to one side's demands."

Justice John M. Harlan wrote a concurring opinion. He said "I join in the court's opinion on the understanding that nothing said therein is meant to disturb or question the primary determination, made by the board and sustained by the Court of Appeals, that petitioner did not bargain in 'good faith' and thus may be subjected to a bargaining order enforceable by a citation for contempt if the board deems such a proceeding appropriate."

Justice William O. Douglas, in an opinion concurred in by Justice Potter Stewart, dissented. Douglas said he agrees the law does not compel either party to agree to a proposal or make a concession in collective bargaining, yet the board has the power, where one party does not bargain in good faith, "to take such affirmative action . . . as will effectuate the policies" of the law under its Section 10(c).

Douglas wrote: "Here the employer did not refuse the checkoff for any business reason. Nor did the employer refuse" in the hope that delay might bring a concession from the union.

"Its reason was . . . to avoid reaching any agreement with the union." He stressed "the case is rare, if not unique, and will seldom arise. . . . Hence with all respect for the strength of the opposed view, I dissent."

Firm Ordered to Stop Harassment of Unionist

Carrollton, Ga.—The Southwire Co., which has a nine-year record of defying its employes' right to organize, has been hit with another National Labor Relations Board citation for unfair labor practice.

The NLRB ordered Southwire to stop interfering with union members at the plant where it makes wire cable and to withdraw a "major warning" notice issued in 1968 to a union supporter. The employe, Jerry McColley, Sr., was the only victim of previous company discrimination who kept working at the plant and continued to wear a big union button.

Southwire management previously had fired McColley twice for his support of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers — in 1962 and 1966. Reinstated by court order in both instances, McColley received a warning notice—preamble to possible firing — when he repaired a shearer by cutting a faulty bolt instead of straightening it two months after his second reinstatement.

McColley was a mechanic responsible for the repair of scrap area equipment, including a shearer and belt conveyors.

In August 1968, McColley reported that a bolt was bent 45 to 90 degrees in the shearer, and was instructed by a foreman not to repair it then. In September, another employe injured his hand so severely in the machine that he was taken to a hospital for treatment.

Another foreman ordered McColley to "fix the bolt." When he did so by cutting instead of heating the bolt, he was given a warning notice for "improper use" of company property. Trial Examiner Myron S. Waks found that the notice was a pretext, and the NLRB agreed.

Waks cited four court orders against Southwire from 1961 to 1967 for threats, firings, and unlawful showing of the discredited anti-union film, "And Women Must Weep."

Still pending against Southwire and Pres. Roy Richards is a special master's finding that they committed contempt of court during the course of their illegal conduct. The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals heard arguments on the contempt finding Mar. 16 in Atlanta.

Sanctions Lifted from Railway Carmen

Sanctions required under the AFL-CIO's internal disputes plan have been removed from the Brotherhood of Railway Carmen, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany informed federation affiliates.

He said the union "has fulfilled in all respects" the procedures of Section 16 of Article XX of the AFL-CIO Constitution dealing with removal of sanctions imposed for non-compliance with determinations of the impartial umpire. The sanctions had been imposed last July.

The Railway Carmen are now "entitled to full protection under the internal disputes plan as well as all other rights enjoyed by AFL-CIO affiliates in good standing," Meany said.

Unions remaining under sanctions required by Article XX of the constitution are the Air Line Pilots Association, International Leather Goods, Plastics & Novelty Workers, National Maritime Union and the International Typographical Union.

'Best-in-South' Furniture Pact Averts Strike

Fort Smith, Ark.—Major contract improvements for 1,100 employes of the Ward Furniture Co. were won by the Furniture Workers a few hours before a scheduled walkout. The company is one of 53 owned by DeSoto Inc., nationwide business conglomerate.

UFWA Pres. Morris Pizer congratulated Local 281 negotiators for "the best settlement" with a furniture company in the South.

Under it, employes will get an immediate wage hike of 18 cents an hour; two additional increases totaling 24 cents; 5 cents additional an hour for night workers, plus other benefits—a seventh paid holiday, a vacation top of three weeks, major medical insurance coverage, and a raise in employer insurance contributions from 4 percent of payroll to 6 percent.

In another southern settlement, UFWA Local 282 in Walls, Miss., reached agreement on first contracts covering 300 new members at Plastic Laminates Co. and Imperial Dinettes, both owned by the same company. The contracts increase wages, establish holiday schedules and introduce two-week vacations.

Budget Limit Scored:

Full Funding Urged For School Program

The AFL-CIO urged full funding of federal aid to education programs and warned Congress that "in many parts of the nation the very survival of the public school system hangs in the balance."

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller called on a House Appropriations subcommittee to take the big step needed to close the gap between the amount Congress has authorized for education programs and the amount appropriated each year.

For key programs this year, the Administration has again asked for only about half the money authorized to be spent for the major education programs.

That's not enough, the AFL-CIO said. Biemiller's statement, presented to the House subcommittee by Legislative Rep. Richard Warden, termed the budget request for elementary and secondary education "unresponsive to the magnitude of the problems confronting our schools."

Similar levels of appropriations in past years, the statement stressed, have meant that major cities have been able to provide special catch-up and enrichment programs to only about one-third of the needy children who need them. "This discriminatory expenditure of federal funds for some poor children but not others seems to us indefensible," the AFL-CIO testified.

In other areas of aid to education, the AFL-CIO:

● Protested Administration proposals to cut appropriations for the Teacher Corps "which was already funded far below its authorization." The program, it said, "has demonstrated a remarkable ability to draw dedicated and imaginative young teachers into the inner city schools."

● Stressed labor's concern over inadequate funding of vocational education and adult education programs, declaring: "We are greatly disappointed in the Administration's recommendations in this area. They would have the effect of sharply cutting back grants to the states for existing vocational programs."

● Objected strongly to "the continued failure to request full funding for the work-study program" for college students, describing it as "one of the most meaningful vehicles for assisting low and moderate income students without burdening them at the beginning of their careers with substantial debt."

The House Appropriations Committee, for the first time, has separated education funds from the omnibus appropriations bill for the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, Labor Dept. and other agencies. By giving it priority consideration, it hopes to have the money appropriated before the start of the school year so that school systems and communities will be able to plan their programs with the knowledge of the amount of federal aid available.

Biemiller welcomed the effort but reiterated the AFL-CIO's position that the money should actually be appropriated a full fiscal year ahead to eliminate the uncertainty.

The federation concluded its testimony with a strong plea for a high congressional priority for aid to education.

"Everywhere our schools are in deepening trouble," the federation said. "The quality of American life in the years ahead will depend in large part upon our ability to save our schools. We will pay dearly in the future for the money we save today."

FIFTY INTERNS from the U.S. Dept. of Housing & Urban Development's program for young professionals hear Thomas Hannigan of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers discuss "Labor Costs in Construction" at a recent seminar at the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center. They heard labor and government experts on subjects ranging across the entire construction field.

HUD Interns Study Labor, Construction

Fifty young college graduates ranging in age from 22 to 28 and in specialties from art to social science recently took part in a Dept. of Housing & Urban Development seminar at the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center.

The seminar dealt with all phases of construction—with experts from labor and government discussing new technology, Administration policy, apprenticeship programs and minority groups, and the labor movement in the 1970s.

Taking part from the AFL-CIO were Boris Shishkin, secretary of the federation's Housing Committee; Don Slaiman, director of the Dept. of Civil Rights, and the center's director, Fred K. Hoehler, Jr.

Other speakers were Thomas Hannigan, assistant director of research and education for the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Reese Hammond, director of education for the Operating Engineers, and Malcolm E. Peabody, HUD Deputy Assistant Secretary for Equal Opportunity. The seminar chairman was Otto Pragan of the center's faculty.

Said one intern, political science major Edwin Stromberg, "In our day-to-day work at HUD we don't get the opportunity to make contact with the representatives of labor or to discuss the issues affecting labor." He voiced the conviction that the most profitable area of cooperation between the labor movement and young HUD staffers is in the field of their greatest concern—social welfare.

Administration Assailed On Civil Rights Retreat

Columbus, Ohio — The Nixon Administration represents "the greatest setback to civil rights" since the Hayes Administration of 1876 halted the reconstruction period, a veteran civil rights leader charged here.

Bayard Rustin, director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, further accused Pres. Nixon of being "a deceptor" by pretending to be helping Negroes while working against them.

Rustin delivered the keynote address to more than 450 labor and civil rights leaders from all parts of the state attending the third biennial Ohio AFL-CIO Civil Rights Conference.

He charged Nixon with creating a coalition of southern segregationists, northern business interests and fearful whites to turn back the progress made by blacks under Presidents Kennedy and Johnson.

Rustin also charged that Nixon is trying to turn back civil rights progress in two other ways—by cutting back on funds for poverty programs and by appointing segregationists to the Supreme Court.

The Administration's "deception," he said, comes in its promotion of so-called black capitalism. A few black capitalists "manipulating" in the ghettos can no more wipe out poverty than white capitalists have eliminated it in Appalachia, Rustin declared.

Other speakers at the two-day conference included AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Frederick O'Neal, Pres. August Scholle of the Michigan AFL-CIO and Clarence Mitchell, director of the Washington office of the NAACP.

O'Neal, president of Actors Equity and chairman of the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Committee, emphasized that "a Negro-Labor alliance must be made a firm and enduring reality." There is no hope for black workers outside the context of the labor movement, he said.

Scholle similarly urged close cooperation between civil rights and union leaders. He said the unity must be extended to advancing economic and political rights as well as civil rights.

Mitchell called on those attending the conference to "get on the ball" in the 1970 elections and "return the friends of human rights to office."

He answered Administration attempts to blame labor unions for discrimination by declaring that "there is no such thing as a split between the labor movement and the civil rights movement of this country."

It is the Administration, he charged, which is promoting discrimination in three ways: By trying to water down the Voting Rights Act, by attempting to make the Supreme Court a friend of segregation, and by trying to convince Negroes that they should return to a segregated life.

Voting Rights Issue Sent Back to House

the polls. It also retains the requirement that any state or local changes in voting laws must be approved by the federal government before taking effect.

Added to the law were two widely-supported provisions of the Administration-House bill — a nationwide ban on literacy tests as a requirement for voting and a shortened residence requirement for voting in presidential elections. Hundreds of thousands of Americans lose their vote in every election because they moved to another state or county and haven't lived at their new addresses long enough to meet state residence requirements for voter registration.

The Senate bill would allow persons to vote for President if they lived in the same area at least 30 days before the election. It would not affect state residence requirements for voting for other offices in the ballot.

The 1965 Voting Rights Act, which the Senate insisted on retaining, is credited with having added 800,000 southern Negroes to the voter lists.

Although the courts have ruled discrimination in voting clearly unconstitutional, the long delays in establishing voting rights for Negroes by court order, and subterfuges used to impose new roadblocks, had resulted in only token Negro registration in many southern communities before 1965.

In another major development, Congress moved towards a new confrontation with Pres. Nixon over his tight-budget "anti-inflation" policies.

A House-Senate conference committee reached agreement on a 34.6 percent increase in subsistence benefits to Viet Nam veterans enrolled in schools, colleges and training programs.

This would raise payments for an unmarried veteran without dependents from the present $130 a month to $175, retroactive to Feb. 1. The House had originally voted for a rise to $170 and the Senate had voted a $190 basic benefit.

The final version of the bill was quickly approved by the House, and the Senate was scheduled to act on it promptly.

Last fall, when the legislation was before the Senate, Pres. Nixon termed the proposed increase "excessive" and "inflationary" and the Veterans Administration said a "justifiable" increase would be about 13 percent.

Nixon conceded that veterans were "deserving" of higher payments, but insisted that "they must be champions of responsible government."

Unlike the GI bill for World War II veterans, the government does not pay tuition for returning servicemen. They have to meet that cost themselves.

Less than one-fourth of returning veterans are enrolled in schools or training programs and supporters of the increase contend that the high costs and low subsistence allowances are keeping others from further education or job training.

Sen. Smith Wins Illinois GOP Vote

Illinois voters will choose between Republican Ralph T. Smith and Democrat Adlai Stevenson III this fall in an election to fill out a four-year Senate term.

Smith, who was appointed to the Senate seat after the death of Sen. Everett M. Dirksen last year, won a 3-2 victory over William Rentschler. He was backed by Gov. Richard B. Ogilvie (R), who had appointed him to the vacancy.

Stevenson, the son of the late two-time Democratic presidential candidate, had no primary opposition. He is currently state treasurer and had demonstrated impressive vote-getting ability in statewide elections.

In three congressional primaries in Chicago, where two incumbent Democrats are retiring and one died last summer, candidates supported by Mayor Richard J. Daley won easy victories.

Hearst Guard Charged In Pressman's Shooting

Los Angeles—An armed guard for the struck Herald-Examiner was charged under the felony statutes with assault with a deadly weapon for shooting a locked-out printing pressman in the Hearst paper's parking lot.

Pressman Robert Vail was discharged from a medical center here after being treated for the wound.

New Training Grant Issued For Painters

The Painters union and the industry have surpassed their manpower training goal and are preparing to start a new program.

The Labor Dept. announced that the National Joint Painting and Decorating Apprenticeship and Training Committee has been awarded a new contract under the Manpower Development & Training Act (MDTA) to train 1,150 persons in 28 states.

During its previous 18-month contract, the joint committee subcontracted for 42 programs in 22 states and the District of Columbia and successfully trained 582 persons, 52 more than the goal.

The new contract, to run for two years, will be supported with $972,552 in federal funds.

The contract calls for the promotion and development of subcontracts with the union and employers to upgrade the skills of 825 journeymen and prepare 325 unemployed disadvantaged persons for entry into apprenticeship.

Mail Unions, Government Negotiate as Walkout Ends

Senate Sets Showdown On Carswell

A new move to sidetrack the Supreme Court nomination of Judge G. Harrold Carswell picked up strength in the Senate as nationwide criticism of the appointment continued to mount.

A solid majority of Democrats, joined by a growing number of disenchanted Republicans, have said they will vote for a motion to send the nomination back to the Senate Judiciary Committee.

If past precedent is a guide, recommittal would have the effect of killing the nomination although the committee could still make another try at bringing it back before the Senate.

The showdown on the recommittal motion has been set for Apr. 6 after the Senate's Easter recess. If the motion should fail, the vote on confirmation would come two days later.

Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.) and Sen. Edward W. Brooke (R-Mass.), leading the fight against confirmation, expressed optimism about the outcome. And for the first time since the nomination was sent to the Senate, newsmen covering the debate were taking seriously the possibility that Carswell would not be confirmed.

In a letter to all senators, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany stressed that confirmation of Carswell "would degrade the United States and the Supreme Court."

"It is by now entirely clear," Meany wrote, "that Judge Carswell is anti-Negro and is utterly without distinction as a judge and lawyer. His 1948 white supremacy diatribe

FIRST DIRECT NEGOTIATIONS in the history of the postal service open in Washington. James C. Gildea, executive assistant to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and chief negotiator for the seven postal unions, is at right center, facing Postmaster Gen. Winton M. Blount. Labor Sec. George P. Shultz and Assistant Sec. W. J. Usery, Jr., are at the end of the table. Striking postal workers returned to their jobs as the negotiations got under way.

Talks Seek Solution To Pay Dispute

Union and management negotiators met across the bargaining table for the first time in the history of the postal service to try and reach agreement on a pay raise.

On one side of the table were the presidents of the seven unions holding exclusive bargaining rights for more than 600,000 postal workers. Their chief negotiator, at the request of the six AFL-CIO unions and one unaffiliated organization, was James C. Gildea, executive assistant to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

Speaking for management were top officials of the Post Office and Labor Departments including, at the opening session, Postmaster Gen. Winton M. Blount and Labor Sec. George P. Shultz.

They held their first meeting in a conference room at the Laborers headquarters, and later shifted to a Washington hotel.

Across town, on Capitol Hill, House and Senate conferees also met for the first time—to discuss the months-long deadlock over differing versions of pay legislation passed last year.

The conferees agreed on the principle of retroactivity and promised that other federal employes will not be bypassed on a pay raise. Then they recessed to await the outcome of negotiations.

In New York, where the first major strike of federal employes in the nation's history had erupted out of smoldering resentment over the delay in pay legislation, federal troops were withdrawn as postal employes returned to work to tackle the mountain of mail piled up in the week-long dispute.

Trade Policy Shift Urged to Benefit All

By Duane Emme

Organized labor will fight for a "healthy expansion" of U.S. trade that "enhances the well-being of the American people, in place of one that enhances corporate greed," AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland declared.

The AFL-CIO also will help process the "grievances" of workers adversely affected by the present deterioration of the nation's position in world trade, Kirkland said.

"This is the problem of the entire trade union movement, not just the problem of some workers," he told 500 representatives of 45 unions. "It's a problem of the entire nation and that's the way we intend to handle it."

Kirkland was the final speaker at a two-day conference on "The Developing Crisis in International Trade," sponsored by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

The meeting was called "to express the common concern over the effects of international trade upon American workers," IUD Pres. I. W. Abel emphasized in his keynote address.

Other major speakers included AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger, Senators Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.) and Vance Hartke (D-Ind.), and numerous foreign trade specialists from government, education and labor.

Concern over the sharp deterioration in U.S. trade, expressed by Abel and Kirkland, ran through other major addresses, views presented in conference panels and papers submitted by individual unions.

Speakers from the floor gave vivid, first-hand accounts of workers left jobless by firms fleeing to low-wage areas in Japan, Taiwan,

Higher Prices Wipe Out Gain In Earnings

Over-the-year gains in average weekly earnings of rank-and-file workers were more than erased by price increases, the Labor Dept. said in its February report on the Consumer Price Index.

A seasonally-adjusted rise of five-tenths of 1 percent in living costs in February sent the CPI to 132.5 meaning that goods and services worth $100 in the 1957-59 base period cost $132.50 last month.

The index as a whole, said the Bureau of Labor Statistics, was 6.3 percent above its level for February 1969, the highest year-to-year rise in 20 years.

New York Plan Keyed To Minority Training

New York—A labor industry program has been launched here to expand training efforts aimed at bringing more minority group members into the building trades.

Called the New York plan, the program provides for on-the-job training of 800 workers during the first year of operation.

While the ground work for the program is well advanced, its implementation hinges on adequate financing. Negotiations for funds are continuing between Mayor John V. Lindsay and the New York Building & Construction Industry Board of Urban Affairs—the sponsor of the plan.

An unspecified amount of state money has been committed by Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller, but the federal government has rejected the group's request for financing.

The Manpower Administration turned down the request for $5.5 million for the first year of operation on the theory that the training could be achieved by other means than through a central trade facility.

The New York plan would operate independently of established training programs, said Peter J. Brennan, a trustee of the Board of Urban Affairs and president of the Building & Construction Trades

Building Trades Press Legislative Action Goals

Increased unemployment is no way to halt inflation or meet the nation's urgent needs, delegates representing 3.5 million building trades workers told Congress and Pres. Nixon.

Nearly 3,500 delegates to the 15th legislative conference of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. came to the nation's capital to impress on their congressmen and senators the extent of back-home support for labor's program.

They stressed their demand for action now to meet the nation's needs for housing, pollution control, health care, safety legislation —and jobs.

With more than half a million construction workers currently unemployed, severe joblessness is a fact, not just a threat, BCTD Pres. C. J. Haggerty told the delegates.

Haggerty and other department leaders, including presidents of the affiliated unions, met at the White House with Pres. Nixon for more than an hour in a broad-ranging discussion of government policies and issues.

An all-day briefing session for the delegates was keynoted by AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller.

Bill Endorsed For Insurance Guaranty Unit

Strong support for a Federal Insurance Guaranty Corp. to protect consumers against the failure of insurance companies has been voiced by the AFL-CIO.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller stated labor's position in a letter to Sen. Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.), chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee.

A bill sponsored by Magnuson would create a federal insurance agency similar to the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. that protects bank customers.

With his letter, Biemiller submitted a fact sheet showing that:

● In the last 12 years, 135 property-casualty insurance companies have become insolvent. More than a million consumers have lost $200 million in unpaid claims and unearned premiums. A half-million victims of failed mutual-insurance companies have been assessed about $60 million to pay claims—including their own—against their mutual firms. Five million persons have suffered indirect losses from such failures.

● Only a centralized federal agency could prevent the interstate manipulations that often lead to such failures, and guarantee prompt and full payment of losses if insolvency occurs. The cost of such an agency has been estimated at less than 5 cents a year per $100 of premium.

Hearings on Magnuson's bill have demonstrated the need "far better than we could," Biemiller wrote. "But we wish to urge as strongly as possible that the committee take affirmative action on the legislation to create the Federal Insurance Guaranty Corp."

Dr. W. F. Draper Dies, UMW Medical Chief

Dr. Warren F. Draper, 86, retired executive medical officer of the United Mine Workers Welfare & Retirement Fund, died at George Washington University Hospital.

During his 21 years of leadership with the UMW fund, the union built 10 hospitals in the mining regions of Kentucky, Virginia and West Virginia and supervised medical care for miners and their families in 1,500 hospitals in 28 states.

Dr. Draper also served in the U.S. Public Health Service for a number of years and held the post of deputy surgeon general. He is survived by a daughter, Miss Ann Draper, an economist with the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research.

Schoemann Asks Cures For Critical Housing Ills

Labor is taking steps to help cure a "sick" housing industry "but we demand similar action from those who are most responsible for the shortage of homes," Pres. Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumbers & Pipefitters declared.

Schoemann outlined the steps being taken by the Plumbers and other unions in a luncheon address to about 500 of the union's members attending the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Dept.'s legislative conference in Washington.

He also re-emphasized the determination of labor and the Plumbers to expand job opportunities for workers from minority groups. Schoemann reported on successful results of the union's efforts in this area.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, addressing the group, discussed labor's legislative activities in Washington and the "tremendous importance" of political action by unions in this year's elections.

Meany stressed that "we can't talk very effectively on legislation unless we have friends in Congress." That theme was also emphasized by another speaker, COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan.

The Plumbers are "doing a lot more than talking about the housing shortage," Schoemann declared. "We are trying to do something about producing more housing, and at least attempting to hold the current price level, if not reducing prices."

He cited agreements signed with manufacturers of pre-fabricated homes to facilitate their expansion and create thousands of new jobs in the construction industry.

He further pointed to a union agreement with American Standard, Inc., which will help expand housing production by providing complete, factory-built plumbing systems.

These and other actions prove that "we are attempting to do our share—as we always have"—to keep up with changing conditions in providing Americans with more homes, Schoemann said.

Now, he added, "We call upon the moneylenders, the land speculators and the government administrators to take similar bold action to resolve the critical problem of providing more homes."

Schoemann described the union's recently negotiated agreement with the National Constructors Association to train 500 minority workers over an 18-month period "and find jobs for them on NCA projects."

He traced the union's participation in Apprenticeship Outreach programs that are now training Negroes and members of other minority groups for building trades apprenticeships in 50 cities.

Urging local unions to expand their efforts to provide job opportunities for members of minorities, Schoemann said the nation is "looking to us for leadership."

"We can and we must assist the neglected citizen to find a way to climb up the economic ladder and enjoy the bounty of America," he concluded.

At Legislative Parley:

Crafts Spur Action On Pressing Needs

The "very, very tough problems" Congress faces, he said, are compounded by "an Administration that talks one way and acts another."

A year after the President assured labor that inflation would be halted without a rise in unemployment, Biemiller noted, "inflation is worse than it was and unemployment is going up."

The Administration talks about putting $10 billion into an anti-pollution program. "Fine. The kind of thing we need," Biemiller added.

"But what do they actually do when they get down to brass tacks? They cut back on existing appropriations and hold back the money that should be paid out right now."

The "final straw" for postal workers, he told the delegates, was when the Administration proposed to balance the budget "by postponing for six months a wage increase that by law is due the government employes July 1."

Biemiller termed the Administration's proposed transportation labor disputes law "Rube Goldberg gimmickry" that would make a mockery of collective bargaining and "has got to be defeated."

From House Majority Leader Carl Albert came a tribute to the building trades legislative program as one that is in "the nation's interest . . . not only in your interest."

Albert suggested that the key issue in this year's election will be "acute economic stagnation in consort with record-breaking inflation."

House Speaker John W. McCormack warned that "the country is slipping into an economic recession . . . an unfortunate replay of what happened to this nation's economy in the 1950s."

Two senators facing tough reelection battles this fall—Ralph Yarborough of Texas and Harrison A. Williams, Jr., of New Jersey—received enthusiastic, standing ovations from conference delegates.

Yarborough, who is chairman of the Senate Labor Committee, said that passage of construction safety legislation last year must be implemented this year by appropriation of the money needed to enforce it and "see that you get that protection."

Williams, who heads a key Labor subcommittee, charged that the Administration is misleading the nation by seeking to put the blame for high housing costs on labor.

Over the past 20 years, he said, the labor cost in housing has gone up less than 15 percent—compared with increases of 400 percent in both the cost of land and in the cost of financing.

Other speakers at the day-long program included Chairman Carl Perkins of the House Education & Labor Committee, Chairman Wright Patman of the House Banking Committee, Rep. Martha W. Griffiths (D-Mich.).

Louis Sherman, the department's general counsel, discussed with the delegates some of the specifics of labor issues and warned that there are pressures to gut the Davis-Bacon prevailing wage law, either through legislation or through administrative interpretation.

Delegates reported back to the department's legislative representatives—and to their members back home—on the positions taken by congressmen and senators towards such labor issues as on-site picketing legislation, occupational health and safety, clean air and water programs, urban mass transportation, trade promotion funds and expansion of Davis-Bacon to buildings built to be leased to federal agencies.

Labor Dept. Study Revives Issue Of Lower Wage Floor for Youths

A Labor Dept. study has again raised the issue of whether high unemployment among teenagers is a byproduct of the federal minimum wage law.

Ultimately, the study by the Bureau of Labor Statistics concludes that "the magnitude of the employment effects of minimum wage legislation probably has been small."

But on the path to that conclusion it suggests that "a substantial differential between youth and adult rates would increase job opportunities for teenagers."

Last November, Labor Sec. George P. Shultz denied published reports that his department was considering proposing a special youth wage below the $1.60-an-hour federal wage floor.

Replying to a letter from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Shultz said at the time that he had made "no policy decision to recommend a youth wage at all, and I would oppose any youth wage figure below the existing statutory minimum of $1.60 an hour for all persons in covered industries."

Meany wrote Shultz after Commerce Sec. Maurice H. Stans had been quoted as saying the Administration was considering dropping the minimum wage for persons under 21 to "about $1.20 or $1.25 an hour" to reduce youth unemployment.

The claim that high teenage unemployment is the result of the wage-hour law was refuted in an article in the July 1969 issue of the AFL-CIO Federationist. The author was Francis X. Burkhardt of the AFL-CIO staff.

Burkhardt wrote that the worsening of teenage unemployment "could hardly have been caused by the Fair Labor Standards Act" when it began to show up in 1963 or the years following.

From 1938, when the law was passed, until 1967, he emphasized, "most typical teenage occupations were not covered by FLSA—such as medium-sized and small retail stores, restaurants, service establishments and farms."

It was in the 1966-68 period that the teenage jobless rate moved up to about five times the adult rate. Actually, BLS unemployment figures since then show little change in the ratio.

As for a special lower minimum for teenagers, the Federationist article asserted that it would have four clear social disadvantages:

It would displace family heads, discriminate against young workers, result in a loss of dignity in the work performed by youths and enrich employers for their "youth discrimination."

"The need is to provide more job opportunities for both teenagers and adults, with FLSA as a uniform wage floor—rather than to encourage low-wage employers to displace adults and hire lower-wage teenagers," Burkhardt declared.

The Labor Dept. study said a survey of employers revealed that they most frequently cited restrictions on employment of youths in hazardous occupations as a consideration for not hiring them.

Employers also view teenage job applicants with strong reservations, the study said, because of uncertainty over the draft, high labor turnover and the unreliability of teenagers with respect to job performance.

The study noted that one formerly easy-access job for youths—the family farm—has greatly diminished. Young people are also restricted in employment opportunities by their limited skills, and for youths in school, by their availability, it said.

Burkhardt pointed to many of these factors and, like the Labor Dept., said that a great part of high joblessness among youth is due to the influx of 16-to-19-year olds into the job market—a 53 percent increase between 1958 and 1968.

While this was going on, Burkhardt wrote, BLS estimates show that employment in the kinds of jobs employing three out of four teenage workers increased only 20 percent.

The Labor Dept. study sees some diminishing of the problem in the 1970s in that the teenage population is expected to increase by about 12 percent as against a 40 percent increase in the 1960s.

Pay Boost Delayed:

Nixon Budget, Veto Threat Lit Fuse for Postal Walkout

By David L. Perlman

A letter from Pres. Nixon to House Republican Leader Gerald R. Ford last October and the President's budget message in February lit the fuse that exploded this month in the first major work stoppage in the history of the U.S. postal system.

In his "Dear Jerry" letter, which Ford read to the House, the President strongly indicated he would veto the pending postal pay bill because it would "seriously undercut" the Administration's efforts to check inflation.

Before there could be any pay raise, Nixon insisted, Congress should approve his proposals for a postal corporation to deliver the mail. This, he suggested, would solve all the problems.

The bill that Nixon protested so vehemently would have given postal workers a 5.4 percent raise retroactive to Oct. 1, 1969. It would have set up machinery for an additional 5.7 percent raise for all salaried federal employes, including postal workers, early in 1970.

It also would have shortened from 21 years to eight years the period it takes postal workers to move from the starting salary—currently $6,176 a year—to their top salary of $8,442.

Despite the veto threat, the House passed the bill by a 311-51 vote.

But the Senate listened more carefully to the veto warning.

Last December, it passed a pared-down substitute for the House bill and made it applicable to all salaried federal employes. The Senate bill would give employes making less than $10,000 a year a 4 percent raise as of Jan. 1, 1970, with a smaller percentage increase for persons making higher salaries. In addition, it would mandate a "comparability increase" on July 1, 1970 of not less than 3 percent.

House and Senate conferees were named, but never met. Among the problems that emerged to delay action were differing opinions over legislative strategy among the unions affected.

The White House, at a series of meetings, sought to win over postal unions to the concept of a postal corporation. The Letter Carriers' leadership was willing to take this route if it could obtain assurances of an immediate pay raise plus more effective collective bargaining procedures. The other six postal unions with exclusive bargaining rights, the largest of which was the Postal Clerks, opposed the concept.

The American Federation of Government Employes, meanwhile, representing the largest organized group of non-postal employes, pressed for equality in pay raises for classified employes—a concept written into the Senate bill but not the House measure.

But overshadowing these differences was the startling demand made by Pres. Nixon in his Feb. 2 budget message.

Under a 1962 law, federal employe salaries are supposed to be pegged to comparable rates in private industry, based on annual surveys by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The last survey, taken in June 1969, showed federal pay an average of 5.7 percent below private industry—as of that date. Since then, of course, prices and pay have risen substantially putting federal workers still further behind.

The Administration's initial timetable called for the 5.7 percent increase to be effective as of July 1, 1970—a year behind in comparability.

But now, Nixon told Congress, in order to slow inflation and show a budget surplus, comparability increases should be put off still another six months—until Jan. 1, 1971, a full 18 months after the salary survey.

His budget did allow for a 5.4 percent increase for postal workers retroactive to Jan. 1, 1970—but only if tied to approval of a postal corporation.

As the AFL-CIO Executive Council said in a statement sharply denouncing the President's proposed delay, "We do not believe the government should buy a budget surplus at the expense of its workers."

To force federal employes to wait until 1971 would break both "the nation's pledge" in the 1962 pay law and Nixon's "personal promise" to federal employes in his election campaign, the Executive Council declared.

Delays, veto threats and vetoes are nothing new in the history of federal employe pay legislation.

What the Post Office Dept. and the congressional committees involved failed to fully realize was that the tensions were greater than in the past—reflecting both soaring living costs and a new public employe militancy.

There had been some signposts. As far back as 1968, convention delegates voted to drop the strike ban from the constitution of the Postal Clerks. And the Letter Carriers, also with a convention mandate, brought a successful court suit overturning as unconstitutional the ban on government workers advocating the right to strike.

Leaders of all of the postal unions had reported frankly on the growing membership demands for militant action if pay legislation were delayed. But government leaders dismissed the warnings as traditional rhetoric.

Adding to the legislative confusion was the decision of the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee on Mar. 12 to accept a modified version of the Administration plan—a 5.4 percent raise, retroactive to Jan. 1, coupled with the postal corporation concept that the committee had sidetracked last year by a tie vote.

The committee action was supported by the Letter Carriers but opposed by the other postal unions.

From the White House came constant reiteration that there must be no pay raise this year without a postal corporation tie-in. Not until postal workers in New York, joined by tens of thousands elsewhere, risked their jobs and civil service careers in an illegal strike did the word come from the Administration that "we stand ready to begin negotiations . . . on all issues, including pay."

On the union side, the impact of the spreading walkout produced a new unity on strategy, reflecting the urgency of the postal pay needs—the "complete agreement" announced by all AFL-CIO unions after a meeting with Federation Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland.

It specified that in negotiations with the Administration and in lobbying efforts with Congress, only "an immediate pay raise measure" will be considered. Postal reform proposals "are separate and distinct measures and should be so treated."

Bargaining Under Way In Mail Wage Dispute

Elsewhere, in the cities where the wildcat strike had spread, mail service was virtually back to normal.

At the peak of the walkout, nearly 200,000 postal workers in 12 states were off the job and only the urgent appeal of their unions prevented a total nationwide shutdown. Government officials agreed to the unions' call for direct negotiations, but only on condition that postal service continued while the talks were being held.

Pres. Nixon, in a nationwide television and radio address, acknowledged that postal workers "are underpaid and they have other legitimate grievances."

But he said "essential services must be maintained" and announced that military units were being ordered into the New York City post offices where the backlog of mail was "most acute."

A statement by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany after Nixon's speech deplored the use of military personnel to perform the work of civilian employes. (Text, this page.)

"This action will not restore mail service nor contribute to an early resolution of the problems," Meany said. "It raises a specter of the misuse of military power that is foreign to this nation's traditions and principles."

Meany stressed that "postal workers have genuine, deep-seated problems and grievances" and "have been made the victims of partisan political maneuvering, false economy and budgetary sleight-of-hand."

He said that "as a first order of business, the pay increase to which these workers are clearly entitled should be enacted." The assurance of prompt action on pay and other inequities, Meany said, "should of course be extended . . . to all federal employes."

He joined with the officers of all of the postal unions in urging the workers to resume their duties.

In another statement, Meany announced that the presidents of all the unions had met with the AFL-CIO executive officers and reached full agreement that only "an immediate pay raise" will be considered in the negotiations. Proposals for a postal corporation or postal reform are "separate and distinct" issues which should not enter into the current talks.

Postal workers in New York made no effort to interfere with the army and national guardsmen assigned to key post offices and the servicemen moved only a trickle of mail as they struggled good naturedly with the complexities of postal sorting schemes requiring the memorization of hundreds of slots for journeymen-level speed.

Most of the strikers in other cities voted to return to work and New York letter carriers, whose vote to walk out sparked the strike, returned with both the assurance of immediate national negotiations and the mandate of a federal court order.

During a break in negotiations, the Postmaster General met with Nixon and told newsmen that "the President feels the postal employes have returned to their jobs so they have done their part. It is time for us forthwith to do our part by reaching an agreement."

He said Nixon promised to do everything possible to secure congressional approval of an agreement reached through negotiations.

Use of Troops Termed Misuse of Military Power

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany issued the following statement on the postal situation, Mar. 23:

The AFL-CIO deplores the use of military personnel to perform the work of civilian employes of the post office in New York or any other city. This action will not restore mail services nor contribute to an early resolution of the problems and circumstances which caused the stoppage of those services. It raises a specter of the misuse of military power that is foreign to this nation's traditions and principles.

The postal workers have genuine, deep-seated problems and grievances that merit the sympathetic concern of all Americans. They have petitioned their government for the redress of those grievances, so far in vain. They are loyal, patriotic citizens who have devoted their lives to the service of the public. Their reward, so far, has been neglect by their government and public indifference. They have been made the victims of partisan political maneuvering, false economy and budgetary sleight-of-hand.

The best and surest way to bring about the restoration of full, efficient postal service, which we all desire, is not punitive sanctions, but prompt action to meet the basic needs of those workers and to resolve their genuine grievances on the basis of simple, obvious justice. Partisan politics and empty posturing for the sake of public image should be set aside and, as a first order of business, the pay increase to which these workers are clearly entitled should be enacted now.

The assurance of prompt action on pay increases and of the full and fair consideration of all inequities and grievances should of course be extended, not only to postal workers, but to all federal employes.

The AFL-CIO joins the officers of all the postal unions whose members are involved or affected by the stoppage in calling upon all postal workers to return to their stations and resume their duties. The point of the walkout has now been clearly made and brought to the attention of the public. With the support of the public, we are confident that these workers will achieve economic justice. That support should not be jeopardized.

Julius Hochman Of ILGWU Dies

New York—Julius Hochman, a veteran of the great cloakmakers' strike of 1910 and a long-time vice president of the Ladies' Garment Workers, died here of an apparent heart attack. He was 78.

Hochman held positions with the ILGWU from 1916 until his retirement in 1962. He also served as general manager of the union's New York Dress Joint Board. He was born in Bessarabia and came to the United States when he was 15, after working as a tailor in Europe for three years.

Hochman joined the ILGWU's Local 25 during the 1910 cloakmakers' strike and became its business agent in 1916. He was named a vice president of the union in 1925.

Active in politics, he was a leader in the old American Labor party and the Liberal party. His broad cultural interests also brought him prominence as an author and lecturer.

Postal Strike Lesson

NEW YORK TIMES columnist and associate editor James Reston has posed one of the basic issues of our time as it flows from the postal dispute. In a recent column he wrote that the issue goes far beyond the mailman.

"It is central to all questions of freedom and authority and respect for institutions, now under challenge in the church, the universities, the government and even in the family.

"The fundamental question is whether institutions claiming the right of authority have the wisdom to recognize and remove legitimate grievances in time. If they do not, they are clearly in danger of losing respect and having to use force in order to avoid anarchy."

Applied to the postal dispute Reston continues:

"The President and the Congress did not recognize the legitimate grievances of the mailmen in time. They trifled with them, and played politics with them. They are now insisting on respect for their authority, as they must in the crisis, but they did not use their authority to be fair to the mailmen before their authority was challenged."

This clear and cogent statement applies across the board to all government institutions—state and county and local—which have failed to recognize and act on the legitimate grievances of their workers, their right to organize and bargain collectively.

It applies equally to those in government at all levels that do not heed the legitimate grievances of minority groups—especially Negroes—relating to equal rights in schooling, housing, jobs and the simple right to vote.

It applies as well to those in colleges and universities who have placed the welfare of the faculty and the administration ahead of that of the students, who have failed to handle legitimate grievances dealing with students and courses and decision-making and all the rest—grievances by students as students, not as politically oriented organizations seeking to disrupt and destroy a campus.

ORGANIZED LABOR'S historic mission has been to present and correct the grievances of the American worker—to business and industry on wages and working conditions and grievance handling itself, to the government at all levels on safety and compensation for injury and unemployment and illness and old age and minimum wages and fair elections—the entire scope and host of issues that make up labor's program.

There have been some outstanding successes and some failures and a lot of unfinished business, but labor is still, in Reston's terms, petitioning the government for redress of grievances.

The erosion of authority among the basic institutions of American life that Reston writes of is a real one and stems in fact from a failure to respond to real and actual needs. Reston says that the mailmen have made the point clear, although he terms their methods wrong. But he concludes:

"They are insisting that governments must be responsive to the legitimate grievances of the people if they are to be respected and obeyed."

A Word Edgewise:

International Reality Dismissed By Hit-Miss Recognition Policy

By John P. Roche

ANYONE with a logical mind has a terrible time making sense out of American attitudes towards foreign policy. The reason for this is simple: all factions employ logic the way a drunk uses a lamp post—for support, not for light. The first question, in other words, is "What do we want?" The second, "What theory can we use to get what we want?" It usually takes, at most, 10 minutes to provide ideological justification for desired objectives.

Take "recognition" as a case in point. A while ago the U.S. Senate passed a quite sensible "sense of the Senate" resolution sponsored by Alan Cranston of California. It declared that the act of recognition of a foreign government was in no way to be construed as approval or disapproval of the character of its regime. It was merely acceptance of the fact that the government ran the place.

This was cheered by liberals who have been urging U.S. recognition of Peking. It was denounced by various conservatives, particularly the pro-Taiwan lobby, on the ground that Mao Tse-tung is a Communist dictator whose hostility is well known and whose power will be strengthened by our recognition.

Now in my judgment this is a phony issue, and has been for 20 years. While accepting the view that we should recognize any existing government —fascist, Communist, racist, or vegetarian—I do not believe the act of recognition would have an impact one way or the other.

We have been meeting with Peking in Warsaw since 1955 and the lack of formal recognition has hardly influenced the negotiations. The hangup is not over protocol—they want us to give them Taiwan. If we were willing, they would not insist on recognition as a precondition for acceptance. As long as we (correctly) refuse to give them Taiwan, they won't recognize us.

This sort of cold-blooded assessment is, of course, scorned by liberals and conservatives alike. For one thing, it takes the spice out of life, mutes the fun and games, and—perhaps most seriously—undermines organizational fund-raising.

God alone knows how many thousands of dollars have been raised to prevent, or support, recognition of Red China. To suggest that this was analogous to rolling a drunk hits a professional lobbyist on his most sensitive corn—his pay check.

So the entertainment continues, but now the conservatives are on the offensive. Using the weapon captured from Sen. Cranston and his liberal allies, they were demanding recognition of Rhodesia, the breakaway white regime in what used to be British Southern Rhodesia, before Sec. of State Rogers announced that we would close down our consulate there. The very thought of recognizing the white-supremacist minority government of Ian Smith had brought liberal and Negro pressure groups out screaming.

THE BLACK AFRICAN states went further, suggesting to Sec. Rogers on his recent tour that the United States should help overthrow Smith, the Republic of South Africa, and the Portuguese in Mozambique and Angola to boot. Presumably we have a mandate from them to eliminate white racist government, though one may wonder how they would react if we also opposed black discrimination against Asians, which is rife in East Africa.

It should be obvious that I have no affection for Smith or his "cowboys" (he has a striking resemblance to George Wallace), but the only question that Sen. Cranston permits us to ask is "Does Smith run Rhodesia?" The answer is "Yes." (Our concern is not with the legality of his break with London, which is a problem for Her Majesty's Government to wrestle with.)

Smith is no more, or less, legitimately in power than Mao, the Greek Colonels, Castro or Kosygin. We recognize the Colonels and Kosygin, we should recognize Mao and Castro—and Smith. Recognition is not a blood test; it is just a statement of reality.

Regulated Shift in Trade Policy Termed Key to Halt Job Erosion

The following is excerpted from an address by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland to a conference in Washington of the Industrial Union Dept. on "The Developing Crisis in International Trade."

YOU HAVE LISTENED to reports and you have discussed the difficulties faced by workers as a result of the deterioration of the United States position in world trade.

You know about the adverse impact on steelworkers, machinists and electrical workers, on clothing, garment, textile and shoe workers, on glass and pottery workers.

That, of course, isn't the whole of the problem. There are many other workers adversely affected, like maritime and shipyard workers, among others.

The direct victims are affected by either a fall-off in exports or a flood of imports or both. Every one of them has a right and a duty to demand redress of their grievances.

They have come to their unions, as is right and proper, and their unions have a right and a duty—singly and in concert with other unions—to demand a redress of these grievances from the government of the United States, because it is the government's foreign trade and investment policies that are responsible.

Let me assure you that the AFL-CIO is going to help process their grievances and fight for international trade and investment policies that will end this hardship.

We are going to seek, in short, a policy of healthy expansion of international trade on a reciprocal basis, that enhances the well-being of the American people, in place of one that enhances corporate greed.

This is a problem of the entire trade union movement—not just the problem of some workers. It's a problem of the entire United States and that's the way we intend to handle it.

Since 1934, the trade union movement—the AFL and the CIO before merger and the AFL-CIO since—has provided consistent support of United States reciprocal trade policies and the expansion of world trade, based on our goal of increasing employment and improving living standards both at home and abroad.

In the beginning, as world trade expanded greatly, the majority of Americans and, for that matter, the majority of the people of the world benefitted.

But during the 1950s, changes in world economic conditions began to appear. By the 1960s, such changes accelerated. The benefits to Americans of expanded world trade decreased and the problems grew.

The world economic scene of 1970 is altogether different from 1934 or even from 1960. Changes in world economic conditions require changes in United States trade policies. The hard facts of life require that the government's foreign trade policies be modernized with speed, in the light of what has been happening.

This isn't a new idea for us. Since 1965, the AFL-CIO has been seeking a shift in government policy in this area. To date, our demands have not been met and the situation has grown more urgent.

We know that the solution cannot be found in going back to high tariff walls, any more than it was found by the United States unilaterally pursuing a policy of unlimited free trade, while its trading partners erect barriers.

We in the AFL-CIO have supported the expansion of world trade. We continue to support such expansion. But expansion of world trade must be made orderly. It must be regulated to prevent the loss of American jobs and the exploitation of American workers or workers in other countries.

Let me state the AFL-CIO position clearly and without equivocation:

We are not isolationists and have no intention of becoming isolationists.

We support orderly expansion of world trade. We oppose the promotion of private greed at public expense or the undercutting of United States wage and labor standards. We want expanded trade that expands employment at home and abroad and that improves living standards and working conditions, here and abroad.

NO SINGLE ACTION or one-shot panacea can meet the complex issues of world trade, foreign investments of United States companies and the operations of United States-based multi-national corporations. No single measure can solve the different trade-related problems of different groups of workers in different industries and occupations.

A battery of realistic policies and measures must be adopted to meet the needs of the American people in world economic relations in the 1970s. We will work in the Congress and in the Executive branch for the necessary changes in government posture and policy.

I will not repeat, here, the list of AFL-CIO recommendations to achieve this goal. They are contained in the resolution on international trade, adopted by the AFL-CIO convention last October.

It seems to me that this conference has served an excellent purpose by focusing attention on this major problem.

But we can't solve the problem by just talking to each other. We can't solve parts of the problem for some workers and overlook other workers just as adversely affected. We can't solve the problem by erecting barriers around the United States. We can't solve it by turning our backs on world trade.

We have to solve it with a practical, commonsense foreign trade and investment policy that promotes trade and employment, and achieves decent wages and working conditions—in the United States and in every nation with which we trade.

And, working together, we can make the Congress of the United States and the Executive branch understand the magnitude of this problem.

A HIGHLY RESPECTED conservation group says that Pres. Nixon is not seeking enough money to do a real job on cleaning up the environment.

"The new budget requests for the environmental program," says the Conservation Foundation, "do not add up to the major reallocation of federal funds which many believe to be essential if we are to control pollution and enhance the environment."

The Conservation Foundation, a non-profit research and education foundation here, outlined its conclusion in its monthly letter.

The publication credits the President for proposing legislation to strengthen the nation's air and water pollution control laws by expanding federal clean-up authority. It also notes that he has taken steps to improve park and recreation programs, and that he has asked Congress to increase funds for several programs in fiscal year 1971.

He seeks $168 million in Land and Water Conservation Fund appropriations for outdoor recreation lands and facilities. For fiscal 1970, he requested $124 million, which was appropriated. He also seeks more funds for national parks administration.

For family planning programs, he seeks $101.9 million, up from $69.3 million in 1970.

And he also seeks more funds for aid to development of new communities, for water and sewer system grants, for water resources planning and research, and for fish and wildlife programs.

However, says the publication, the President's description of his environmental program as the "most comprehensive and costly" in history is open to question. For example:

- The President seeks less for air pollution control than Congress approved in the 1970 HEW appropriation bill he vetoed.
- His budget requests are exactly the same as last year's appropriations for several other environmental programs.
- Thus far, he has said nothing about liability for pollution from oil spills, strip mining, acid mine drainage, the environmental impact of electric power generating plants.
- He has said nothing about noise pollution.

In a detailed analysis of Nixon's proposed "$10 billion nationwide clean waters program," the letter points out he proposes to "alter the current system of grants" to help local governments build sewage treatment plants.

INSTEAD OF SEEKING appropriations under the existing authorization of $1.25 billion for these grants in fiscal year 1971, he wants to replace this with $1 billion in "contract authority" and only $40 million in appropriations for Fiscal 1971 (compared to $800 million appropriated for 1970).

Nixon's proposal would also reduce the federal contribution to a maximum of 50 percent of the cost of a local government's sewage treatment plant, compared to the 55 percent maximum under the existing system, the newsletter says. It comments:

"It is clear that 'the environment' is an issue of great public concern and it is clear that politicians realize this. There is a danger, of course, that as the two parties compete to outdo each other as defenders and restorers of the environment, partisan politics might obstruct substantive progress toward cleaning up the nation's degraded air, water and land."

In the final analysis "the fact that the public does care, is concerned, and will be watching, is perhaps the best hope that the 1970s will be 'the years when America pays its debt to the past by reclaiming the purity of its air, its waters, and our living environment.' "

Goldfinger Cites Slump:

Speedy Administration Action Sought to Shore Up Economy

THE NIXON ADMINISTRATION must move quickly to stem the rising unemployment and shore up the slumping economy, declared labor economist Nat Goldfinger.

"Unemployment has been shooting up sharply over the past couple of months," said the AFL-CIO director of research. He pointed out that 600,000 workers have been added to the unemployment rolls since December. Goldfinger also noted that "weakness in various parts of the economy," particularly the decline of residential construction and industrial production, "point to a continuing trend of unemployment, unless the Administration moves in fast to turn things around."

Goldfinger said "there is no sign yet that the Administration is taking strong action" to reverse the trend. He said the release of $1.2 billion in federal funds to aid state and local construction projects is only "one small step in the right direction," but not "enough to get us back on the road to rising employment and increasing job opportunities."

Goldfinger appeared on Labor News Conference, a public affairs interview broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

GOLDFINGER SAID the Federal Reserve System should "directly control bank loans to business for plant and equipment investment," to "get at the only part of the economy which is rising sharply and absorbing funds out of the money markets," where interest rates have climbed to the highest point "since the Civil War period."

He said the federal government should also give "immediate assistance" to residential construction, through "direct loans for creation of low- and moderate-income housing." He said that the proposal of Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.) to make $3 billion available through the Home Loan Bank for loans to home buyers earning less than $10,000 a year would also "stimulate residential construction in the moderate-income area," and should be adopted.

THE NIXON ADMINISTRATION must move in fast to stem rising unemployment and shore up the slumping economy, AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger, center, declared on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Lee Cohn, left, of the Washington Evening Star and Frank Swoboda of Business Week magazine. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview is broadcast on Mutual radio.

SAG Moves to Spur Domestic Film Making

Hollywood, Calif.—Members of the Screen Actors Guild voted by a 98 percent majority in a national referendum to approve contract changes aimed at bringing "runaway" film production back to the United States.

SAG Pres. Charlton Heston announced that the revised agreement, which he called the "comeback" film contract, was ratified by a record-breaking vote of 14,903 to 354.

"This proves we are on the right track," Heston said, "in taking affirmative action to make it more feasible economically to produce films in this country which can compete in the marketplace with films made in other countries."

The changes go into effect at once, he said.

The notice to SAG members of the proposed changes said in part:

"An essential part of that program is to seek legislation to encourage domestic production." Another aspect of the board's program is self-help under which all crafts and guilds would "carefully examine practices and contracts and make meaningful adjustments to help revive production."

It also said the SAG board met with film producers and offered to make five contract changes for the remainder of existing contracts.

The studio reporting zone will be changed to permit actors to report anywhere within a 30-mile radius of Beverly and La Cienega Blvds., instead of six miles, the present limit. Other changes will reduce costs of films made principally for first showing on television, the union.

The changes may not seem important to the layman "but to the producer they mean a great deal," Heston said.

New York Plan Set On Minority Training

Council of Greater New York.

Brennan said the plan will combine periods of instruction counseling and remedial education at a central training facility.

"The result will be a comprehensive work-learn program with a continuity of training . . . and a reasonable assurance of entry into the industry as a qualified craftsman," he declared.

The program is the answer of the city's construction trades and building contractors to the Philadelphia plan that imposes racial quotas on federal projects of more than $500,000 unless independent programs are devised. Such programs have already been developed in Chicago and Pittsburgh.

The on-the-job training aspects of the New York plan would be carried out initially on federal, city and state assisted projects where such training is stipulated.

A pilot program on which the New York plan is based has been operated by the Board of Urban Affairs since last June at a Model Cities project in Brooklyn.

The Workers Defense League has agreed to assist community screening committees in the selection of the trainees. The plan stipulates that they would have to be New York City residents, although there are to be no age restrictions.

Brennan pointed out that the advantage of the program over the Philadelphia plan is that the New York plan will provide continuity of both training and work.

A minority group member might get on-the-job training for three or four months on a construction project under the Philadelphia plan, he said, but he would find himself unemployed again when his trade finished work on the project.

Most of the trainees coming under the New York plan would have little or no experience in the construction trades, the Board of Urban Affairs said. The length of the training period for each individual would be determined by the amount of experience he had before entering the program.

Between on-the-job assignments, a central training facility would continue to develop the trainee's skills until he could be assigned to his next on-the-job position.

Represented on the Board of Urban Affairs, besides the Building Trades Council, are the Building Trades Employers Association of New York and the General Contractors Association of New York.

The operations of the board are financed through a 1-cent-an-hour contribution negotiated in contracts between the unions and contractors last July.

Minority group members now represent 16.6 percent of the city's 73,454 construction trades workers in the 65 local unions, according to a survey conducted by the Building Trades Council. Of that number, 7,871, or 10.7 per cent, are black, and 3,676, or 5.1 per cent, are Spanish-speaking.

Nixon Program Aimed At 'Official' Segregation

Pres. Nixon pledged his Administration to immediate efforts to end "official" school segregation in line with the Supreme Court's 16-year-old decision outlawing it.

But the President said his interpretation of the decision is that where school segregation is not the result of "official action," integration is "a matter for local determination."

In a 10,000-word statement, Nixon reasserted his opposition to busing of school children to achieve racial balance in school enrollments.

He proposed allocating $500 million in fiscal 1971 and $1 billion in fiscal 1972 to be used in improving education in "racially-impacted" areas and resolving desegregation problems. The funds would have to come from other programs.

"Words often ring empty without deeds," Nixon said. "In government, words can ring even emptier without dollars."

He repeatedly drew a distinction between "de jure" segregation—arising by law or acts of school officials—and "de facto" segregation—resulting from segregated housing patterns.

The Supreme Court, he said, spoke most clearly in Brown v. Board of Education, the historic 1954 decision, to find that de jure segregation is unconstitutional.

On the other hand, he argued that while de facto segregation "is undesirable," it has not generally been held to violate the constitution and has not been dealt with by the Supreme Court.

Granting that some lower court decisions have interpreted the 1954 ruling as requiring busing in some instances, Nixon contended that these were "not prevailing judicial views."

"Unless affirmed by the Supreme Court," he added, "I will not consider them as precedents to guide Administration policy elsewhere."

The President took issue with those who have charged him with "backing away" from the principle of school desegregation and have "therefore feared that the painstaking work of a decade and a half might be undermined."

"We are not backing away," Nixon asserted. "The constitutional mandate will be enforced."

Although Nixon said official school segregation "must be eliminated at once," the statement set no deadlines for action and it did not spell out how the government would enforce desegregation policies.

It did cite a long list of "basic principles" to guide the Justice Dept. and the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare in seeking solutions to desegregation problems "that are both realistic and appropriate."

Move to Kill Nomination:

Senate Vote Slated On Judge Carswell

has repeatedly been affirmed, not repudiated, by his actions. The nation's most eminent attorneys and law teachers attest that he is not qualified for any high court, including the one on which he now sits."

As for the argument that "Judge Carswell's very mediocrity is a qualification because he will represent the average man," Meany termed it "an insult" to the nation's workers.

"We see this nomination, when coupled with other Administration policies and actions, putting into question the commitment to racial equality," Meany stressed.

In an embarrassing rebuff to the White House, 39 black elected Republican officials called a press conference shortly after a meeting with Pres. Nixon to announce their unanimous opposition to confirmation of Carswell.

The group, including mayors, judges, state legislators and city councilmen had taken part in a two-day meeting in Washington sponsored by the Republican National Committee.

In a significant switch, Sen. Mike Gravel (D-Alaska) said he will oppose the Carswell nomination even though he voted to confirm Pres. Nixon's first choice for the Supreme Court, Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr.

He attacked Carswell's record on civil rights, ethics and judicial performance and termed the Florida judge "undistinguished."

An even more dramatic turnabout came with an announcement from Sen. J. W. Fulbright (D-Ark.) that he will vote to send the Carswell nomination back to committee even though he is not certain how he would vote on direct confirmation or rejection.

Fulbright voted for confirmation of Haynsworth and normally has voted with the conservative southern bloc on issues related to civil rights.

Carswell has been sharply criticized, by some of his supporters as well as opponents, for evasiveness about his role in the transfer of a segregated Tallahassee golf club from city to private ownership so as to keep Negroes out.

At the time, Carswell was a high-ranking federal official—U.S. attorney for that section of Florida.

Witnesses have testified that the motive for transferring the club to private ownership—to avoid court-ordered desegregation of a public facility—had been widely discussed in local newspapers and throughout the city.

Nevertheless, Carswell told the Senate Judiciary Committee, when he served as one of the incorporators of the private club and helped arrange the transfer, he wasn't aware of any racial issue and the question of whether the club would be open to Negroes "was never discussed."

At the hearing, Carswell first denied that he had been an incorporator of the club and then backtracked and admitted he had when copies of the incorporation papers with his signature were shown to him.

A Washington Post news story on Mar. 26 dropped a new bombshell on the episode.

It related that the night before he testified, Carswell had admitted his role in the transfer of the golf club to two members of the American Bar Association committee investigating his appointment.

The very next morning, when asked under oath whether he had served as an incorporator of the club, Carswell replied flatly, "No, sir." Not until the evidence was produced did he retract his denial.

Kirkland Hits Carswell On Race Bias, Ability

New York—Established "bias against Negroes and basic incompetence" are the grounds for labor's unaltering opposition to the confirmation of Judge G. Harrold Carswell to the Supreme Court, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland declared.

He spelled out the opposition in an address to the annual spring education conference held by Teachers' Local 2 to discuss current education problems and national issues.

Kirkland told 2,300 teachers and representatives of other unions that labor cannot dismiss Carswell's "white supremacy" speech "as a youthful indiscretion committed two decades ago and now recanted."

The judge, at 28, was not a child when he expressed his "repugnant views" and he never repudiated them until the speech was exposed by a reporter and threatened his confirmation, Kirkland pointed out.

Labor would be impressed if Carswell's actions had proved "his latter-day conversion," he said. "But his decisions adhere more to his 1948 white-supremacy prejudices than to his suddenly announced 1970 views."

On the question of Carswell's ability, Kirkland noted that leaders of the bar, esteemed constitutional lawyers and heads of law schools, "many of them political conservatives, have publicly attacked the judge's record on the bench.

"He hasn't written any books, or any articles in the learned journals. He hasn't made any landmark decisions, and his words are seldom quoted in legal briefs."

There is only one way in which Carswell's record is "spectacular," Kirkland continued. "It would be hard to find any judge on the federal bench whose mediocrity, to put it kindly, is so thoroughly documented."

Kirkland said that as a national average federal judges are sustained on four out of every five of their decisions appealed, whereas Carswell's "batting average" is three reversals in every five of his decisions appealed.

"Now I say that in any factory in the country, any production worker with that kind of rejection rate would never be able to hold his job," he concluded.

The two-day conference covered such subjects as teacher training, educational progress, new elements in education, the student-activism movement and the emerging role of the community in education.

The local's annual John Dewey Award, honoring one of the founders of the teachers' labor movement, was presented to Dir. Cesar Chavez of the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee by Albert Shanker, Local 2 president.

Chavez was cited for inspiring all of labor with his organizing among migrant farm workers and "successful teaching in one of life's most difficult schools."

Kirkland Hits 'Corporate Greed':

Shifts in U.S. Trade Policy Urged at IUD Conference

Mexico, Hong Kong, Singapore, other areas in the Far East and some countries in Europe.

One union representative estimated that 5,000 jobs are being lost a month in electronics. Another said the U.S. shoe industry "is in danger of being closed down completely." A third told of "shop after shop" shutting down in the rubber industry.

"We can't wait. . . . We need jobs now. . . . Pensions are being lost. . . . It's a crisis in full-bloom"—were some of the comments from the floor.

There were no resolutions adopted, since the purpose of the conference, as Abel explained it, was to "seek the pieces to a puzzle." However, there were several clear points of concensus emerging from the sessions:

- Old theories about trade are obsolete. So are the labels "free trade" and "protectionism." There must be expanded trade by the United States, but the goal can and must be accomplished without exporting jobs.
- A wide variety of new policies, mechanisms and changes in law are needed to accomplish the goal.
- The time has come for the government to regulate U.S.-based multi-national companies spreading around the globe and curb skyrocketing investments in foreign subsidiaries.

In opening the conference, Abel said, "We are here because our members have been hurt, and are being hurt, by imports and they want something done about it."

He stressed that the multi-national firms are either manufacturing products or producing components in widely separated areas of the world—at wages as low as 15 cents an hour—then shipping products back into the United States.

Noting that the process has brought no reduced prices for American consumers, Abel said, "It might be one of the understatements of the year but labor does not believe that all decisions of industry are necessarily in the best interests of our nation."

The industries in which workers are being displaced were identified as ranging "far and wide"—through electronics, steel, shoes, glass, pottery, leather goods, textiles, meat processing, pianos, motion pictures, shipbuilding and shipping.

Kirkland emphasized that labor always has supported trade expansion. "We are not isolationist and have no intention of becoming isolationist," he asserted.

But, he added, "expansion of world trade must be made orderly. It must be regulated to prevent the loss of American jobs and the exploitation of American workers or workers in other countries."

This problem, he said, cannot be solved by erecting barriers around the United States nor can it be solved by the nation turning its back on world trade.

"We have to solve it," he concluded, "with a practical, commonsense foreign trade and investment policy that promotes trade and employment . . . in the United States and in every nation with which we trade.

"And, working together, we can make the Congress of the United States and the Executive branch understand the magnitude of the problem."

Goldfinger said that in the last 25 years multi-national firms have set up at least 8,000 new foreign subsidiaries with total assets of more than $100 billion.

"The whole world is their oyster," he pointed out. They juggle wages, prices, profits, dividends, exports and imports beyond the control of any nation, he asserted, adding: "These runaways have been a major factor in U.S. trade deterioration."

Noting that as much as 50 percent of "what is called America's foreign trade" involves the multi-national corporations, Goldfinger added, "These are not trade relations among nations. They are company transactions."

He appealed to the U.S. government to take immediate steps to regulate and control giant companies "that are exporting American technology and jobs, and perhaps even trending towards a multi-national corporation dominated society."

Senators Muskie and Hartke accented the need for other nations to remove trade barriers, for enlarging U.S. trade and for protection of workers who suffer harshly from imports.

Muskie summed it up as "an urgent need for a balanced trade policy." Hartke said increased trade must be accompanied by "fair and equal trade."

Theodore R. Gates, Pres. Nixon's special representative for trade, and U.S. Tariff Commissioner Bruce E. Clubb urged amendments to the 1962 Trade Act to make it easier for workers affected by imports to get benefits.

Of 16 speakers on various panels, only two appeared to be out-of-step with the thinking of the conference. Both were challenged sharply by fellow panelists and speakers from the floor.

Prof. Richard N. Gardner of Columbia University Law School contended there is adequate protection for workers hurt by imports and Assistant Sec. of State Philip H. Trezise maintained "there is no crisis in trade," only a "few growing pains."

Lazare Teper, Ladies' Garment Workers' research director, said it was evident that Gardner had never participated in any union's effort to get relief for workers.

Elizabeth Jager, an AFL-CIO economist, charged Trezise with practicing "19th Century diplomacy." His attitude, she said, "justifies the State Dept. having cultural exchanges with the American people to find out what is happening in the United States."

AMERICA'S FOREIGN TRADE can and must be expanded without exporting jobs, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland and Pres. I. W. Abel of the Industrial Union Dept. emphasized at the IUD-sponsored conference in Washington on the "developing crisis" in trade. The sessions drew more than 500 representatives of 45 unions, trade specialists and educators.

1-Day Stoppage Protests Rise of Apparel Imports

New York—Tens of thousands of Clothing Workers across the country demonstrated peacefully in the streets of large and small cities in a work stoppage protesting the rise of low-wage imports imperiling their jobs.

The demonstrations ranged from turnouts of 30,000 in New York City and 25,000 on the streets of Philadelphia to 1,500 in Staunton, Va., 1,000 in New Albany, Ind., and hundreds in small towns.

Thousands of workers paraded in Los Angeles and San Diego and rallies took place throughout the South, too.

The Clothing Workers said the massive turnouts surpassed the union's expectations.

"If the present flood of imports continues," ACWA Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky said, "we are informing our employers that we may have to consider the stopping of cutting and sewing Japanese cloth in order to protect the jobs and conditions of our members and prevent the destruction of the industry. We also will petition Congress to take appropriate action to protect the industry."

The nationwide demonstration, Potofsky said, will continue the union's demand that Japan sign a comprehensive international agreement regulating the imports.

The ACWA has no desire to cut off trade, Potofsky said. "We do, however, want to regulate the flood, thereby protecting the jobs and security of American workers."

Demonstrators carried signs asking for both Congressional action and for the public not to buy low-wage imports.

In Philadelphia demonstrators heard Mayor James J. Tate; in Baltimore 6,000 listened to Gov. Marvin Mandel and Mayor Thomas J. D'Alessandro; in Chicago 6,000 heard Mayor Richard C. Daley and Adlai Stevenson III; Gov. Frank Licht spoke in Pawtucket, R. I.

THE GOVERNMENT must expand assistance to workers who suffer harshly from imports, Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.), right, told the Washington conference on trade sponsored by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. With him from left, are Presidents John E. Mara, Boot & Shoe Workers, and George Fecteau, Shoe Workers.

All-Out Drive Pledged For National Health Plan

New York—Past efforts by labor to secure health legislation—successful as many of them have been—appear in retrospect as "preliminary skirmishes for the real battle now underway."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland emphasized that point here to illustrate the federation's determination to win enactment of a national health insurance program now before Congress.

Kirkland spoke at a testimonial dinner for the benefit of Deborah Hospital honoring E. Howard Molisani, vice president of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

Deborah is a 40-year-old nonsectarian hospital in Browns Mills, N.J., which specializes in treating lung and heart diseases. Labor organizations have made many contributions to help support it.

For years, Kirkland pointed out, labor has been calling for "a rational, national system of health service" to provide care for everyone—rich or poor, black or white, young or old, employed or not.

Now, he continued, Rep. Martha W. Griffiths (D-Mich.), a member of the House Ways & Means Committee, has introduced a bill "that would create just the kind of national health insurance program we have been talking about."

The legislation would cover curative and preventive medicine, inpatient, outpatient and rehabilitative care—"the best medical care in the world for all of our people," Kirkland declared.

At the same time, he stressed, the program would preserve the free choice of doctors and patients, traditional freedom of practice and the traditional authority of medical associations.

The entire program would be financed through the social security system for about 7 percent of the nation's payroll, which is less than the nation's present financial spending on health, Kirkland noted.

Terming rational organization of medical services "the key" to the program labor advocates, Kirkland said the Griffiths bill would end the "chaos" that now characterizes such services.

"It would encourage group practice," he explained, "bringing the specialists together under one roof, along with all their supporting technicians and the expensive machines and equipment that are now endlessly duplicated and mostly idle.

"The product would be a total prepaid package of medical services, regardless of which medical skills were called into play in any particular case. Billing, bookkeeping and other business functions would be centralized and that is no small matter."

The legislation "does not propose to change the nature of medical service, only the method of distributing, delivering and financing it," Kirkland noted. "We propose to make the best available to all."

Members of AFL-CIO unions are, for the most part, among the lucky 75 percent who have some sort of health insurance, but it's not good enough, he observed.

"And, of course," he added, "the fate of the unlucky 25 percent of the American people, with no insurance, is intolerable."

Many of them, he stressed, are the nation's poorest citizens, living in ghettos, where men and women can expect "seven fewer years of life" and the infant mortality rate "is about even with that in Ecuador."

"So," Kirkland concluded, "the AFL-CIO is going to fight for the Griffiths bill with all the resources at its command and with all the allies and all the support it can find.

"We believe this is the next real opportunity for another great advance in the struggle for human progress. We must take full advantage of that opportunity. And we must and will keep at it until we win."

Air Line Pilots Name Lou Davis as Editor

Lou Davis has been named executive editor of the Air Line Pilots magazine and other publications of the Air Line Pilots, the union's director of publications, Frank Martineau, announced.

Davis will also manage the editorial activities of the various ALPA newsletters, bulletins and news bureau operations.

Before joining the union staff, Davis was special report editor of Air Transport World and Washington editor of Airport World magazine.

Senate Floor Fight Due:

Committee Curtails Jobless Benefits Bill

Senate liberals, outvoted in the Finance Committee, will seek to strengthen a House-passed unemployment compensation bill when it reaches the Senate floor.

The Finance Committee voted down all but one of a series of labor-backed proposals to improve the House bill. It then took a big step backward and knocked out a House-approved extension of coverage to some 750,000 workers in small establishments with fewer than four employes.

The one step forward was extension of unemployment insurance rights to about 250,000 farm workers—those employed by the largest 2 percent of the nation's farm employers. But even this was substantially less than the 400,000 farm workers the Administration had proposed be covered.

While the bill was before the committee, the AFL-CIO urged that it be strengthened by setting federal minimum standards of benefits. But an amendment proposed by Sen. Abraham Ribicoff (D-Conn.) was rejected by a reported 8-6 vote.

Other amendments dealing with duration of benefits and federal financing of extended benefits during periods of high unemployment were likewise rejected.

The bill is expected to reach the Senate floor sometime in April, after action on the Carswell nomination.

In another development a hot Senate debate was touched off by a House-Senate conference agreement on extension of the basic program of federal aid to education.

Southerners sought to return the bill to conference, protesting that the conferees had nullified a controversial Senate-passed amendment aimed at curbing government pressure for school desegregation.

The original amendment, sponsored by Sen. John C. Stennis (D-Miss.), would have prohibited the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare from applying different standards to segregation resulting from illegal dual school systems than it applies to segregation resulting from neighborhood housing patterns.

Opponents charged that the effect would be to halt all desegregation directives since the Supreme Court desegregation rulings apply only to school systems which had been segregated by law.

The conference committee, in somewhat involved language, restored the distinction between the two types of segregation.

Almost lost sight of in the debate was the fact that the basic legislation extended the Elementary & Secondary Education Act an additional three years, substantially increasing the amount of federal funds authorized to be appropriated and allowing new uses for funds earmarked for low-income neighborhoods. It expands adult education programs and allows school districts, if they wish, to use federal funds to offer bonuses to recruit teachers for schools with high concentration of disadvantaged children.

On the House side, a Labor subcommittee headed by Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.) approved an Occupational Health & Safety bill giving the Secretary of Labor broad powers to set and enforce industry health and safety standards.

The AFL-CIO supported this concentration of authority in the Secretary of Labor as far preferable to the Administration proposal, which would have diffused responsibility in a five-member board.

The subcommittee bill provides for an advisory committee to work with the Secretary of Labor, but puts the final responsibility on him.

The Senate voted final approval of a 34.6 percent increase in subsistence payments to veterans enrolled in schools, colleges and training programs.

This cleared the bill for the President's signature — or veto. Last year he had attacked an earlier version of the bill as "inflationary." The legislation, nevertheless, had near-unanimous bipartisan support in both the House and Senate. Its sponsor is Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.).

Plans for House action on the welfare reform bill before the Easter recess were put off when Rules Committee Chairman William M. Colmer (D-Miss.) refused to give an early hearing to Ways & Means Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.), who will manage the bill in House debate. Rules Committee clearance is necessary before the bill can be brought up on the floor.

Increased Living Costs Erase Gains in Wages

The gross average weekly earnings of production and non-supervisory workers rose $1.06 in February to $117.18, the government said. While that was $7.07 more than a year ago, the 6.3 percent price rise wiped out $7.38 of earnings over the 12-month period.

The January-to-February pickup in average weekly earnings was attributed to a gain of one-tenth of an hour in the workweek and a 2-cent rise in hourly earnings.

Spendable earnings, average weekly pay after the deduction of social security and federal income taxes, increased by 85 cents in February to $102.82 for the worker with three dependents. It was up 6.5 percent over the year.

Real spendable earnings—expressed in 1957-59 dollars to reflect price increases—averaged $77.60 in February for the worker with three dependents, up 10 cents from January but essentially unchanged over the year.

Real spendable earnings were down over the year in manufacturing, wholesale and retail trade and finance, insurance and real estate. But these drops were offset by an increase in contract construction earnings.

On the price front, Labor Dept. figures showed that the cost of commodities in February had increased 5.4 percent over the year while services rose by 7.9 percent.

The department saw a faint ray of hope in that the increase in the February CPI was less than the rise of six-tenths of 1 percent in each of the previous three months.

The February price rise was led by larger-than-seasonal increases in food and apparel prices and advances in charges for consumer services, particularly home mortgages.

Prices of beef, pork and fresh fruits and vegetables were up more than usual in February and were blamed for much of the overall increase in food costs.

Apparel prices also were up more than seasonally last month, five-tenths of 1 percent. Substantial increases were posted in other nondurable goods, particularly cigarettes, alcoholic beverages and household furnishings.

Medical care services climbed by eight-tenths of 1 percent in February—their sharpest monthly increase in nearly a year.

Also contributing to the overall increase in the cost of services were advances in property taxes, insurance and maintenance and repairs.

Prices of consumer durables remained unchanged on the whole in February rather than edging down as they usually do. Used car prices were down for the second consecutive month but the decline was offset by increases in housing and household goods.

Of 67,000 workers who will receive cost-of-living pay hikes as a result of the February index, nearly 33,000 in farm equipment, chemical and household appliances will receive boosts ranging from 2 to 5 cents.

About 23,000 workers, half of them in electronics and auto equipment, will receive increases of 2 to 8 cents an hour. About 6,600 employes of a Chicago mail order house will get a 4-cent hourly increase.

Nixon Presses Longer-Term College Loans

Pres. Nixon has asked Congress to make more money available for college education loans to students from low and middle-income families.

His proposals would, however, saddle students with a bigger debt after graduation since interest payments while they are in school would merely be deferred until graduation. At present, the government pays the interest cost while the students are in college.

To keep down the payments in the years right after graduation the President proposed to stretch out the repayment period from 10 to 20 years.

The President proposed to increase the amount of money available for student loans by setting up a national student loan association that would "buy up" loans to students made by private banks. The principle is based on the mortgage-buying role of the Federal National Mortgage Association.

The present law provides equal benefits for students from families with adjusted incomes of up to $15,000 a year.

Under the new proposal, benefits would be limited to youngsters whose parents have income under $10,000. Those from families above that amount would receive no loan subsidies, but the government would guarantee banks against default. The present 7 percent interest ceiling on educational loans would be lifted and banks could charge whatever interest they wanted.

The President expressed the hope, however, that the government guarantee would induce the banks to charge a lower interest rate.

Bargaining Resumes in Bid to Settle Long Railroad Shopcrafts Dispute

Negotiations between four shopcraft unions and the railroads resumed in an effort to settle their 17-month-old wage-rules dispute before a moratorium on any strikes or lockouts expires Apr. 11.

The agreement for continued talks, with help from mediators, was obtained by Chairman Harley O. Staggers (D-W.Va.) of the House Commerce Committee after spokesmen for all sides testified at committee hearings.

The hearings centered on Pres. Nixon's plan—strongly opposed by labor—to impose a tentative agreement accepted earlier by the Machinists, Boilermakers and International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers but rejected by the Sheet Metal Workers.

It includes a wage increase of 68 cents an hour over two years for more than 40,000 skilled shopmen along with a controversial provision for limiting crossing of craft jurisdictional lines.

The latter provision caused the Sheet Metal Workers' members to reject the tentative pact. It had been agreed earlier that all four unions must accept it to make it effective.

Some talks have been held since Congress imposed its 37-day moratorium on March 4 to head off a threatened strike, but they involved only three of the four unions. The Sheet Metal Workers had objected to Labor Dept. participation on the grounds that the department had drawn up the Administration bill.

In testimony before the committee, spokesmen for the unions emphasized that the dispute would be "quickly settled" if railroad managements were forced to negotiate by the realization the government would not intervene.

IAM Vice Pres. William W. Winpisinger, who also testified for the Boilermakers and IBEW, said, "If we are to be prohibited from striking then someone should see to it that there is no further stalling by railroad managements."

Vice Pres. W. J. O'Brien of the Sheet Metal Workers charged that Nixon's proposed mandatory solution to the dispute amounts to turning union men into "involuntary servants."

He gave the committee a detailed account of the union's objections to the controversial work rule, contending that its application "would imperil our entire craft."

Labor Sec. George P. Shultz, testifying for the Administration's proposal, traced the lengthy history of the dispute. He said more legislation simply delaying walkouts or lockouts might only inflame the situation.

The committee before securing pledges for further negotiations, advanced several ideas for arbitration of the dispute but could find none that was acceptable to all parties.

Pilots Endorse Global Drive to Halt Hijacking

The Air Line Pilots have given their complete endorsement to a resolution passed by the International Federation of Air Line Pilots Associations calling for steps to curb hijacking and sabotage of airliners.

The resolution, adopted by a recent IFALPA conference in London, calls upon all affiliates to press their governments, airlines and airport authorities for the development of safety standards to prevent hijacking and sabotage.

If steps are not taken by a country or airport to adopt standards, principal officers of IFALPA may call for a ban on all traffic into and from a country failing to comply.

ALPA said it will carry the IFALPA's position to Congress, the Departments of Labor and Transportation, the Federal Aviation Administration, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and other areas of government concerned with the two problems.

Unions Score Major Gains In Postal Wage Agreement

First for Union:

3 Growers Sign Table Grape Pact

Los Angeles—The AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee signed its first contract with table grape growers in California opening the way to the sale of union label grapes.

While the pact is with a small segment of growers in the lush Coachella Valley, it was heralded by both sides as a "significant breakthrough" toward a forseeable end through collective bargaining of the long strike and nationwide boycott of table grapes.

Actual signing of the three-year contract took place on Apr. 1, at a press conference in an auditorium of the Los Angeles Catholic Archdiocese.

A bishops' ad hoc committee on farm labor, representing the U.S. Catholic Conference, has been active for some months in bringing together UFWOC and grower negotiators.

The landmark contract, termed "reasonable" by UFWOC Dir. Cesar Chavez, was formally signed before the bishops and the press by Chavez and Lionel Steinberg, a principal stockholder in vineyards representing one-eighth of the total Coachella Valley grape production — about 8,000 acres near the Southern California-Mexico border.

At their sides were Bishop Joseph Donnelly, chairman of the bishop's committee, and William L. Kircher, AFL-CIO director of organization, who has been actively aiding the Farm Workers since their establishment in 1965.

Kircher was deeply involved in helping to hammer out details of the contract in Los Angeles earlier in the week.

The new contracts are the first

White House Woos Votes For Carswell

Pres. Nixon told the Senate it has no business questioning his choice of Judge G. Harrold Carswell for the Supreme Court and demanded that it confirm the nomination.

The President posed the issue as one of presidential prerogative in a letter aimed at holding the votes of a number of Republican senators who have indicated their distaste for the nomination.

A solid majority of Senate Democrats, including several southerners, have announced they will vote Apr. 6 to send the nomination back to the Judiciary Committee. Senate Republican leaders had reportedly told the White House that the nomination was in trouble.

Using a letter to a freshman Republican senator to get his message across, Nixon demanded that senators swallow their misgivings and vote to confirm Carswell because the President is "the one person entrusted by the Con-

School Aid Package Approved by Senate

The Senate voted final approval of a new three-year program of federal aid to education—holding out the hope, but not the guarantee, that more federal funds will be made available to overcome the financial crisis facing the nation's schools.

A die-hard group of senators held up the bill in an effort to restore an amendment that would have had the effect of halting most government efforts to desegregate dual school systems in the South.

But the move to send the legislation back to a House-Senate conference committee was beaten, 43-32, and minutes later the Senate approved the bill on a 74-4 vote.

The House is expected to approve the conference report promptly after it returns from an Easter week recess.

On paper at any rate, the new legislation authorizes $24.6 billion in federal aid over the three-year period, including more than $15 billion for the key program of improving the education of children in poor neighborhoods.

This type of assistance includes both in-school and after-school programs, with the extent of federal aid governed by the number of children from poverty-level families in each school district.

The legislation also permits expansion of the "impact" aid program for schools attended by children of federal employes and servicemen by adding new categories of children in public housing proj-

Meany Hails Bargaining Commitment

By David L. Perlman

In a triumph for collective bargaining, seven postal unions and the federal government negotiated a two-part, 14 percent pay increase for the nation's 700,000 postal workers.

Included in the package is a 6 percent raise, retroactive to Dec. 27, 1969, which will be extended to 1.3 million other salaried federal employes.

The additional 8 percent raise for postal workers will be part of a new postal reorganization law "requiring collective bargaining over all aspects of wages, hours and working conditions including grievance procedures, final and binding arbitration of disputes, and in general all matters that are subject to collective bargaining in the private sector."

The reorganization bill will provide still further increases for most workers. The time needed to move from the starting salary to the top pay of the grade will be cut from 21 to 8 years.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany termed the agreement on collective bargaining "a tremendously significant forward step in the history of labor relations in this country."

The wage provisions, he said, will bring "a measure of justice to postal employes." But the "most significant" development is that the Executive Branch of the federal government has agreed to collective bargaining procedures covering the same areas as in private industry.

The example, Meany suggested, "will not be lost on the people whose job it is to deal with public

IAM Reaches Accord With National Airlines

The Machinists reached tentative agreement with National Airlines on the eventual return to work, with full seniority of nearly 1,000 mechanics locked out by the big airline more than 14 months ago.

The pact hinges on two key factors—settlement by National of its dispute with 3,500 members of another union, the Air Line Employes, who have been on strike since Jan. 31, and final negotiation and ratification by IAM members of the terms of a new three-year contract retroactive to Jan. 1, 1969.

The agreement was reached at headquarters of the National Mediation Board in Washington under pressure of an Apr. 2 IAM strike deadline, according to George M. Brown, chief union negotiator.

The union blamed the "archaic, long-drawn-out" processes of the Railway Labor Act for prolonging the dispute more than 15 months. The Mediation Board kept the case in mediation for nearly a year, thus preventing the

HEW Plan Endorsed For Medicare Option

A proposal for new comprehensive health programs under Medicare and Medicaid advanced by the Health, Education & Welfare Dept. has been given strong endorsement by the AFL-CIO.

Federation Pres. George Meany said the proposal, if adopted by Congress, would bring "substantial progress" toward achieving one of labor's goals.

A new Medicare option would be provided allowing aged beneficiaries to join a prepaid comprehensive health service plan providing preventive health care as well as physician service and hospitalization.

The option also would be offered beneficiaries under Medicaid, the federal-state-local program to help the poor pay their health care bills.

The proposal was first set forth by HEW Under Sec. John G.

HISTORIC BARGAINING AGREEMENT covering nearly 700,000 postal workers is announced at news conference in the AFL-CIO building. In front, center, with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany are Postmaster Gen. Winton M. Blount, right, and Assistant Labor Sec. W. J. Usery, Jr., left, who assisted both sides as a mediator. Also shown are some of the union and government negotiators, along with Labor Sec. George P. Shultz, who helped get the bargaining sessions under way.

employes at the county, state and city level.

Meany added:

"This means that the federal government is taking the lead in resolving the question of representation for public employes, and they're resolving it by the method we know best—collective bargaining."

Postmaster Gen. Winton M. Blount, who appeared with Meany at a joint news conference to announce the agreement, said the successful eight days of negotiations which turned "disruption and discord" into "accord and progress" was in itself proof of the "validity" of collective bargaining, which he termed "the crucial element in postal reorganization."

Congress must still act to seal the bargaining table agreement. Some details of the postal reorganization bill to be presented to Congress by Apr. 10 still have to be worked out in further discussions, but agreement was reached on the key elements.

All seven postal crafts, which hold exclusive bargaining rights for non-supervisory postal workers, had asked Meany to represent them when spreading wildcat strikes at major post offices throughout the nation spurred an agreement by the government to enter into immediate negotiations with the unions.

Meany designated his executive assistant, James C. Gildea, as chief negotiator for the seven unions.

Deputy Postmaster Gen. Elmer T. Klassen, former board chairman of the labor-management Institute of Collective Bargaining & Group Relations and a veteran management negotiator in private industry, headed the permanent government team.

Blount and Labor Sec. George P. Shultz were present at several of the meetings. And Assistant Labor Sec. W. J. Usery, Jr., a former Machinists representative, played a unique mediation role with the confidence of both sides. When Gildea and the seven union presidents met with Meany to consider the government's counter-proposal to the unions, Usery was invited to sit in.

In addition to a firm guarantee of collective bargaining procedures —to be established by law—the departmental reorganization bill will:

- Provide an additional 8 percent wage increase for postal workers effective as of the date the legislation becomes law.
- Establish through immediate negotiations with the unions a new wage schedule that would reduce the time required for an employe to move from the starting rate to the top pay of his grade to no more than eight years. It now takes 21 years to reach the top pay step.
- Provide a Post Office structure so that the department "can operate on a self-contained basis" and have "authority commensurate with its responsibilities" to improve postal services.

The Administration pledged to recommend to Congress the legislation needed to put the agreement into effect.

The Post Office Dept. also promised not to initiate disciplinary action against any postal employes with respect to the strikes that took place until there have been union-management discussions on the issue.

Here is what the new agreement will mean to the vast majority of postal workers in the big postal clerk and letter carrier pay categories:

Their pay now starts at $6,176 and after 21 years of service goes to $8,442.

Under the new agreement, the starting rate will be $7,069—an increase of $893 a year.

The top rate will be $9,663 after eight years—$1,221 more in pay reached 13 years sooner than under present law.

Parties to the agreement are six AFL-CIO affiliates—the Postal Clerks, Letter Carriers, Mail Handlers (a branch of the Laborers), Post Office & General Services Maintenance Employes, Special Delivery Messengers and Post Office Motor Vehicle Employes—and the unaffiliated Rural Letter Carriers.

Differing versions of pay legislation had passed the House and Senate last year, none of them as high as the amount provided in the agreement.

A House-Senate conference committee met for the first time after the wildcat walkouts, but recessed to await word from the negotiating table. The conferees, however, agreed on the principle of retroactivity.

The Administration earlier had insisted that its "anti-inflation" budget couldn't stand a general federal pay increase and had imposed a postal corporation condition for a maximum 5.4 percent raise for postal workers. But it dropped its inflexibility and agreed to negotiate "unconditionally" on all issues.

With experienced bargainers on both sides of the table, the history-making negotiations got under way on Mar. 25, after virtually all postal workers had gone back to work.

On Apr. 2, Meany, Blount and the negotiating teams came down together from their meeting in the AFL-CIO Executive Council room to announce to waiting newsmen that agreement had been reached—and labor history had been made.

Machinists Reach Accord With Airline

union from setting a strike deadline.

The IAM said that when the board finally released the case and permitted a 30-day waiting period before a strike could be set, National management agreed to return the mechanics to work. The 30-day period was due to end Apr. 2.

Meanwhile, ALEA members continued to picket National ticket offices across the country in a dispute over their own contract terms. Their walkout caused the airline to suspend flight operations, which to that point had continued with the help of shop supervisors and strike-breaking mechanics.

The return-to-work agreement provides that all fired employes shall be reinstated with the same seniority they had on or about Jan. 20, 1969, when they were discharged following a brief work stoppage in a dispute over safety.

Recall Set

Upon resumption of service following contract settlements with the IAM and ALEA, the airline will recall all IAM members on their old shifts within 12 days. Employes will return with the right to all benefits previously earned—wage levels, extended vacation time, sick and injury leave, and pension benefits, the union reported.

No layoffs will be made during the new contract term unless the layoff is caused by "an other-than-minor curtailment" of National operations. Work "farmed out" after Jan. 15, 1969, will be returned to the airline's own shops in New York, Newark Philadelphia, Miami and other points.

Benefits for the period of the lockout will be subject to the final court decision in the IAM's lawsuit against National, it was agreed. The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled for the union last Sept. 23, then remanded the suit to the original U.S. District Court in Miami. Another hearing on the IAM appeal will be held Apr. 6 in Jacksonville, Fla.

During the dispute, National announced the start of Miami-to-London service but postponed it when members of Britain's Transport & General Workers Union refused to handle any flights by the struck airline. IAM and British air transport unions are members of the International Transport Workers Federation.

Administration Accused Of 'Writing Off' Negro

The Administration "has written off the Negro" for strategy that is designed to give it a political advantage, Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) charged at the annual conference of the National Civil Liberties Clearing House in Washington.

The two-day conference, attended by nearly 400 participants, heard addresses by leaders in government, spokesmen for civil rights groups and three prominent newsmen.

There was no attempt to develop a consensus among speakers or participants. The broadly-supported liberal coalition is set up to spur discussion of issues rather than adopt policy.

Hart, speaking at a dinner meeting, said the Administration strategy is to sustain itself in office by forming a coalition of southern political leaders and "everyone who feels irritated, threatened or angered" by Negroes' gains.

"Unhappily," the Michigan senator declared, "this is one of those times when political consideration, even if it's sound, does not result in sound public policy."

Evidence of the Administration's "strategy," Hart suggested, shows up in a weaker stand on enforcement of school integration, support for a "watered-down" voting rights bill and the nomination of Judge G. Harrold Carswell to the Supreme Court.

A conference panel discussed the Justice Dept.'s recent subpoenas of newsmen's notes to aid prosecution of members of the Black Panthers and Vice Pres. Agnew's verbal attacks on the objectivity of news media.

Frank Mankiewicz, a syndicated columnist and television commentator, charged the seizure of notes was clearly an "unconstitutional policy." He compared it with the Administration's "anticonstitutional" policy in the civil rights area.

Fred P. Graham of the New York Times viewed the subpoenas in a somewhat lighter manner, as an unintentional mistake. However, he said, he was "appalled" at the insistence of department officials that newsmen testify in trials "at the risk of their careers."

Bill Monroe, an NBC news editor, warned of many signs of "the possibilities of freedom for television being chipped away," including the "harshness" of Agnew's attacks and their tendency to set up "guidelines" for television news coverage.

Other speakers at the conference included Stephen Horn, vice chairman of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights; Representatives Louis Stokes (D-Ohio) and Brock Adams (D-Wash.); Mayor Howard N. Lee of Chapel Hill, N.C., and Paul Anthony, executive director, Southern Regional Council.

Jacob Clayman, administrative director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., and Dr. John W. Turnbull of the National Council of Churches served as co-chairmen for the conference.

Tugboat Strike Ends as Crews Win New Pact

New York—Harbor tugs began moving again when captains, engineers, deckhands and cooks ended a nine-week strike with a vote to accept a new three-year contract.

Nearly 4,000 members of Marine Local 333, National Maritime Union, roared approval of a negotiating committee report in crowded Manhattan Center. There were about 150 no votes.

Capt. Joseph O'Hare, president of the local, called the settlement "the best we ever had." It will give tug crews their first pay raise in four years, improve pensions, provide fixed overtime for barge workers not previously affected and sharply improve hourly pay scales, he said.

O'Hare put the increase in wages and other benefits at 53.6 percent over the contract term.

Wage boosts alone were put at 20 percent the first year, 10 percent the second and another 10 percent in the final year.

The pension plan was changed to permit retirement at age 55 after 20 years of service, instead of at age 65 after 25 years. Pension benefits are to be figured at $10 per month times years of service.

The strike, longest in the local's history, was called against 250 tugs owned by 40 companies that bargain through the New York Towing & Transportation Employers Association, and 10 firms that bargain independently.

No struck tugs left the dock during the tieup. All harbor traffic was halted except for railroad tugboats, independent oil barge operations and deepsea ships whose skippers managed to move without tug assistance.

THE CAUSE OF RACIAL JUSTICE has been "written off" by the Administration in favor of its southern strategy aimed at sustaining it in office, Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) charged in an address at the 22nd annual conference of the National Civil Liberties Clearing House in Washington.

'Significant Breakthrough':

Farm Union Wins First Pact With Table Grape Growers

in a series that UFWOC hopes to sign with other growers. Negotiations with additional employers will be held here starting Apr. 6, Kircher announced.

Presently unsigned to contracts are the bulk of Coachella Valley growers—eight ranch owners—and employers in Central California's San Joaquin Valley, heartland of the table grape industry.

Until now, UFWOC has had contracts only with California wine grape growers.

At one point Kircher held up an artist's rendering of the first Farm Workers' union label—red and black, with UFWOC's eagle emblem.

He told the conference: "When I told AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany about this contract, his comment was: 'Great—now we have to promote the sale of union label grapes while continuing the nationwide boycott of scab grapes.' "

Serving with Bishop Donnelly on his committee were Archbishop Timothy Manning of Los Angeles; Bishop Hugh A. Donohoe of Fresno, Calif.; Bishop Walter W. Curtis of Bridgeport, Conn., and Bishop Humberto S. Medeiros of Brownsville, Tex.

"From our many conversations," Bishop Donnelly said, "the committee is confident that this breakthrough will serve as a pattern for others who wish to help solve this prolonged dispute.

'A Beginning'

"The present settlement is but a beginning. But we do feel confident that additional settlements will follow this formula worked out with so much goodwill by the United farm workers and the Coachella Valley growers who are parties to the agreement."

He added that the bishop's committee in a recent conference with Meany had been assured "that the AFL-CIO would stand solidly behind this agreement and any future agreements."

Bishop Donnelly, who for nearly 20 years served as chairman of the Connecticut State Board of Mediation & Arbitration before he became a bishop in 1965, said that he would request the U.S. Catholic Conference, scheduled to meet later this month in San Francisco, to continue the bishops' committee on farm labor.

Archbishop Manning, recently named to the Los Angeles archdiocesan post, opened the news conference on a note of cordiality and hope for the future of farm workers everywhere.

"I welcome to this interview," he said, "so many people concerned with the questions of justice and peace.

"It is our ardent hope that this day's business will be but the beginning of a chain of such contracts so that prosperity and peace can once more descend into our fields and our homes.

"The church is happy to have been a servant to the parties involved in these conflicts, to have been the bridge across which a meeting could take place."

Steinberg, in signing represented the David Freedman Co., the Wonder Palms Ranch, owned by Freedman Brothers, and, in effect, the Travertine Ranch, owned by Charles Freedman who is incapacitated by a stroke and was to sign separately.

Steinberg was interviewed facing a battery of cameras and newsmen.

He pointed out that while his agreement with UFWOC represented only his interests, that "through friendship with Chavez this will be a constructive solution to the problem—a huge step forward."

He indicated among the reasons for the breakthrough the fact that farm workers "represent the lowest paid segment on the economic scale . . . and next to them are the farmers themselves."

"Farmers in this state are not receiving 5 percent on their investment. We are in the midst of an agriculture recession in California"

Steinberg later was more optimistic in referring to the agreement and the union label on grapes that will be harvested in his fields in early July.

"I am certain that this will mean more grapes will be sold and eaten in the United States as a result of what we do here today."

Chavez, spelled out terms of the contract and said, "we are signing what we consider a reasonable contract."

For the first time in many months he was not sitting in his customary rocking chair—part of therapy for an ailing back condition—as he punctuated with emotion the words "signing a contract."

"Some of the critics have charged during the last five years that the union doesn't want contracts. Well, we have disproved that today.

"If the other growers, in light of what is happening here and now, continue to ignore us, then they are dealing in bad faith and their only object is to destroy the industry and the union."

He said that UFWOC will assume a "wait and see" attitude with other growers throughout the state, but meanwhile will prepare to call a strike again against those unsigned Coachella Valley growers "in a matter of days."

Coachella's growing season—abbreviated by the desert heat—spans only about 60 days in May and June, while in the Central Valley it runs some 90 days beginning in August-September.

The contract, Chavez said, calls for a 6 percent wage increase bringing the minimum hourly rate to $1.75, plus 25 cents per box per picker during the harvest.

The employer will contribute 10 cents an hour per employe toward health and welfare and two cents an hour toward an economic development fund for workers displaced owing to age or mechanization of the industry.

750 Workers

Steinberg said the contract will affect some 750 workers during the peak of the season.

The contract, which contains a provision for reopening on wages in each year of its term, also includes a successor clause.

As a safeguard for farm workers and consumers the growers involved agree not to use "hard pesticides" including DDT, Aldrin, Dieldrin, Endrin, Tepp and Parathion.

Kircher, describing UFWOC as "the baby of the AFL-CIO," said that while the agreement "is a great breakthrough, it only scratches the surface."

"It does, however, demonstrate that it is possible to have a collective bargaining agreement with the Farm Workers and if the other growers do not recognize this then they are only interested in destroying the union."

NEW UNION LABEL of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee will be stamped on more than 3 million boxes of California grapes under a first contract signed with three growers, AFL-CIO Dir. of Organization William L. Kircher tells Los Angeles press conference. Others, from the left, seated: Archbishop Timothy J. Manning and Bishop Joseph Donnelly of a Catholic bishops' committee that assisted the contract negotiators; standing, Msgr. George G. Higgins of the U.S. Catholic Conference, and UFWOC committeemen.

Newspaper Negotiations Continue in New York

New York—Contract negotiations between the city's major daily newspapers and 10 unions have continued beyond the expiration of the old agreements in an effort to reach a new accord without a strike.

The employers waited until just before the contract deadline to make their initial wage offer. They presented the same proposal to all the unions—a 16.5 percent increase over three years, covering wages, health and welfare, pensions and all other benefits.

The unions — representing about 13,000 employes of the three papers—rejected it, saying it would barely equal the increase in the cost of living since the last contract was negotiated in 1967.

Strike authorizations were voted by members of Typographical Local 6, ITU Mailers Local 6, and members of the New York Newspaper Guild at the Post. The Deliverers voted to strike but withheld a date for the walkout.

The Guild represents news, advertising, clerical and maintenance employes at the Post, Times, and Daily News. The craft unions have members also at the Morning Telegraph, Fairchild Publications and the Long Island Press.

Members of ITU Local 6 voted 474-4 to authorize the ITU executive council to set a date for a walkout and to determine which newspapers should be struck. Mailers Local 6 voted 102-1 for strike authorization at all papers except the Telegraph, where tentative agreement was reached.

After contracts reached their expiration date and were extended day to day, the printers called membership meetings at the plants of the Times, Post and News. A union spokesman said the intention was not to interfere with newspaper production but to speed the pace of negotiations by the publishers.

Bargaining between the publishers and key unions was aided by Theodore W. Kheel, whose services as mediator were offered by the city government. Kheel met with both sides frequently and also offered the assistance of Chairman Vincent D. McDonnell of the State Mediation Board and Regional Dir. Frank H. Brown of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

Local 6 Pres. Bertram A. Powers told members at a Times chapel meeting that publishers want the right to unlimited use of outside tape for setting type without any additional payment to union members, the unlimited right to install automated equipment, and an end to the requirement that type for advertisements set outside the plant be reset in the plant.

The publishers have offered to raise wages in all union departments by 6.5 percent this year, 5 percent more next Mar. 31, and an additional 5 percent one year later. The offer did not include continuation of an existing cost-of-living escalator clause.

Existing weekly pay scales for craft unions are, for day work: paper handlers $154.89, drivers $160.86, mailers $167.67, pressmen $183.52, stereotypers $184.05, printers $184.43, machinists $189.27, electricians $192.97, engravers $206.03. Newspaper Guild rates also vary from one job to another.

Striking Atlanta City Workers Gain Support as Dispute Widens

Atlanta—Community support for striking municipal employes mounted as the dispute with the city administration widened.

Members of the State, County & Municipal Employes have been off their jobs since Mar. 17. The strike was triggered, the union said, when Mayor Sam Massell reneged on the third step of a wage package negotiated by SCME earlier.

The city granted an 8 percent increase in January, but the additional 4.3 percent wage boost was withdrawn. Continued efforts by the union to reopen negotiations, and keep moving until settlement, have been rebuffed by the city.

When strikers marched on City Hall Apr. 1 and showed Massell their take-home pay stubs ranging from $60 to $70, the mayor failed to respond to their appeals, the union reported.

The march was led by SCME Pres. Jerry Wurf and leaders of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, including the Rev. Ralph D. Abernathy.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany fully endorsed the efforts of the strikers, declaring in a message to Wurf that "their cause is just; their needs have been demonstrated."

Meany said he found "especially shocking" the firing of 1,600 workers by the mayor and the use of city prisoners to collect garbage.

"This situation demands an immediate and satisfactory settlement to protect the rights of union members and the welfare of the city of Atlanta," he declared.

Before the Mar. 17 walkout, negotiators for SCME Local 1644 had worked out what they thought was the entire three-step wage package with the city's aldermanic finance committee.

Later, attempts were made to renegotiate the additional wage boost with Massell, but when talks broke down, more than 2,000 city workers walked out.

On the fourth day of the strike, Massell—who had the full support of labor organizations, including SCME, in his campaign for last year's election—announced the dismissal of 1,600 of the strikers.

The city mailed termination notices to the strikers and began advertising for replacements. At first only about 25 strikebreakers took out applications. The city withdrew the offer for hiring when the fired strikers themselves applied for the jobs in a show of unity.

Most of the striking workers are employes of the city's sanitation department and other public works operations. In an attempt to clear away accumulating piles of garbage, the administration employed prisoners from the city jail. When this proved ineffective, private hauling firms were employed.

As rallies got under way during the third week of the strike, Rev. Abernathy pledged the full backing of the SCLC, which he heads.

Abernathy called on nearly 1,000 listeners at one rally to be ready to launch a strong "non-violent" struggle in support of the strikers "unless Massell gets the word."

Police have arrested nearly 40 strikers, many of whom were charged with "criminal action against government property." The union charged that several strikers have been severely beaten by police.

Full Benefits Urged For Panamanians

Panamanians employed by the U.S. government in the Canal Zone should be entitled to health and life insurance benefits on the same basis as the American citizens working alongside them, the State, County & Municipal Employes said.

Pres. Jerry Wurf, in a statement to a House Civil Service subcommittee, urged approval of legislation to extend the federal employe insurance programs to the 10,850 non-citizen federal employes in the Canal Zone.

The cost of the government's share of the premiums, he said, could easily be met out of the operating revenue of the Panama Canal Co. and the Canal Zone government.

To Meet America's Needs

WE ARE HERE to urge legislation to provide for public service employment to meet all the needs of America—to provide jobs for those who need them, to provide services for America that have been too long ignored, to make the economic and social picture in America one of which we can all be proud.

We want to make it expressly clear that federal funds should be used only to hire additional personnel to perform needed services. These funds should not be used to help defray current payroll costs or to hire replacement personnel. The underlying justification of federally created jobs is that they will help the disadvantaged worker and help improve the quality of public services.

A federal program to create public-service jobs for the unemployed and seriously underemployed was needed in 1967, 1968 and 1969. It is even more essential today. It is time we all stopped fooling with the notion that the private sector can find enough jobs for everyone, including the hard-core unemployed. It just can't.

We are shocked by the Secretary of Labor's statement that the Administration has no "intent to create jobs in the public sector, especially for the hard-core unemployed." We cannot agree with the Secretary of Labor's view that the basic responsibility of government is to "commit itself to preparing people to fill those jobs" that will presumably materialize out of thin air in the private sector of the economy which has no major growth opportunities because of the Administration's current economic slowdown policies.

BASIC TO SOLVING the problems of poverty in America's work-oriented society, is a national economy that is growing rapidly enough to provide job opportunities for all persons who are able to work and seeking employment. Under such conditions—linked with an expanded manpower training program—the vast majority of workers will be employed in the normal channels of private and public employment.

For those who remain unemployed or underemployed, a federally-financed public-service employment program is the only logical answer. Such a program would create jobs and it would provide badly needed public services in hospitals, schools, parks, recreation centers and other public and private non-profit facilities. Linked with training and guidance, as may be needed, such a program would make it possible for these workers to move up the career ladder.

In this respect, the Administration's manpower bill is completely inadequate. It creates no jobs. It lacks a provision for a realistic public service employment program. The main thrust of the Administration's manpower bill is in establishing a mechanism for coordinating and consolidating existing programs.

But even as a mechanism, the Administration bill misses the mark. As part of the so-called "new federalism" it would decentralize manpower activities and vest responsibility for development and administration of manpower programs in the hands of each of the 50 states. The implications of manpower programs are national in scope. This is too important an area to allow it to be fragmented into 50 different parts, each going its own way and dispensing federal funds in a manner that may or may not be in line with national goals.

We are faced with problems of serious proportions. We are aware that there is no simplistic solution to these problems. We are convinced, however, that a public service employment program meets these problems in a realistic manner.

The Man Who Came to Dinner

A Word Edgewise:

Foreign Policy Brashly Invaded By Massachusetts Legislature

By John P. Roche

THOSE WHO SHARE my view that the first step in reorganizing government in the United States should be the abolition of the states will find recent events in Boston cogent evidence for the prosecution. The Great and General Court—as we in Massachusetts style our legislature—has been engaged in almost unbelievable shenanigans.

It all began when the serious ladies of the League of Women Voters proposed that the size of the lower house be decreased 50 percent. They argued that a smaller assemblage would be more efficient, that presumably more money could be spent on staff, and hopefully (though they couldn't quite come out and say it) a higher quality of individual would be elected. This requires an amendment to the Constitution, and the first step in getting such a measure on the ballot is to gain one quarter of the votes in the legislature meeting jointly as a constitutional convention.

The General Court met in joint session and, to make a long story short, the amendment failed by a whisker. But what depressed the league (and others who did not share their enthusiasm for the cut) was the circus atmosphere, the blatant pressures, the absence of any dignity. It was a shambles, a public market.

I happened to oppose the cut—it would make minority representation more difficult at a time when we need to have things fought out in legislatures, not on the streets—but in view of subsequent events, I want to apologize to the league. Indeed, I am proposing that the General Court be abolished entirely and replaced by a legislative council, one member from each congressional district, chosen by lot. Anything would be an improvement.

Having disposed of the threat to its size, our legislature has now branched off into foreign policy.

It will not even consider repealing the birth control statute—which presently has Dr. William Baird in the Charles St. jail for providing unmarried women with contraceptive devices—but it is busy trying to repeal the Constitution of the United States.

Involved is a law forbidding the United States government from using Massachusetts men in any wars not formally declared by Congress. It was dreamed up by some anti-Viet Nam enthusiasts and, on its Madison Ave. merits, it is real cute. The principle, of course, was borrowed from the segregationist doctrine of "interposition."

No legal scholar, whatever his views on Viet Nam, can take this seriously. It is a clear intrusion into the reserved powers of the federal government. But what has happened at the statehouse? To wild applause from the peaceniks in the galleries, the legislature has rushed to approve this absurd proposal—with universal agreement that it will be declared unconstitutional by the courts.

I have been around, but this is by all odds the most cynical legislative performance I have ever seen. It combines contemptuous deference to the goals of the peace militants with a neat technique for putting Gov. Francis Sargent on the spot—a little revenge for the governor's vigorous support of the amendment cutting the size of the assembly.

AS THE COLDBLOODED realists in the legislature see it, the peace movement may be small, but it is upper-class, wealthy and articulate. Thus it can drive a legislator nuts, but its weakness is a hopeless addiction to pious abstractions. So the heroes of the General Court have paid off the peace forces with a counterfeit bill.

As one legislator gleefully put it when I objected, "what are you talking about? With one vote I got those damned kooks off my back. And what did it cost? Nothing."

If the peace movement finds satisfaction in being treated with contempt, it can enjoy this great triumph. As for the Great and General Court, nothing has been lost but honor. However, those who take representative government seriously are nauseated by the whole charade. Democratic institutions are precious; they should not be mocked.

Dual Role of UA Program:

Plumbers Training Minorities While Filling Manpower Needs

The following is excerpted from an address by Pres. Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters at a luncheon for UA delegates attending the recent Building & Construction Trades Dept. legislative conference in Washington.

THE NATION is calling upon us to provide economic opportunities for minorities through membership in our unions.

In a society that is becoming increasingly divided between the races, between city and suburb, between haves and have-nots, our responsibility increases. The nation is looking to us for leadership in providing solutions to these confrontations.

We must not turn our back upon our nation's needs. We can and we must assist the neglected citizen find a way to climb up the economic ladder to enjoy the bounty of America.

In 1965, we initiated an affirmative action program to enlist minority applicants in our apprenticeship programs. That challenge has been met successfully, as attested to by the Apprenticeship Outreach programs that are now operating in 50 cities. In my address to you in 1968, I set forth a program of affirmative action and the reasons for the necessity of recruiting minority applicants in our apprenticeship programs.

At that time, I said that we were making a beginning, and the time would come in the future when we would have to do more. That time has now come. I call upon all of you—every local union and its officers—to commit your resources to the unfinished work that must be done.

The Building & Construction Trades Dept. which met in Atlantic City in December, set forth an expanded program of minority employment in the building and construction trades.

This is the department's present policy position: "We make the flat and unqualified recommendation to local unions throughout the United States that for a stated period of time they should invite the application of qualified minority journeymen for membership in their respective local unions and should accept all such qualified minority journeymen provided they meet the ordinary and equally administered requirements for membership.

"We also recommend that the local unions and the local councils explore and vigorously pursue training programs for the upgrading of minority workers who are not apprenticeship age."

We believe that this approach is also preferable to the unsound or unlawful government measures that would impose a quota system upon us. The general officers of the United Association are unalterably opposed to any quota system, whether it is called a "Philadelphia plan" or some other form of bureaucratic verbiage.

To implement the policy of the Building & Construction Trades Dept., which we helped to formulate, the United Association has negotiated with the National Constructors Association to amend the national agreement. We have incorporated a program to train minority workers in labor shortage areas and to find jobs for them on NCA projects. The program is financed by a Labor Dept. grant of around $1.4 million over an 18-month period.

Five hundred workers will be trained under the program which will involve 33 major construction companies. Those selected for training will be men who have been working in the piping field without benefit of related training, who are beyond normal apprenticeship age, and who may have less scholastic preparation than the normal apprentice. They will be recruited within a geographic area where construction jobs are about to start. Journeymen trainees will be hired at the location only after the union, the company, and the Labor Dept. investigate and determine that a shortage of skilled manpower exists.

ALL TRAINEE-WORKERS will be paid local wage rates. Wages will approximate those paid apprentices and will depend on the level of experience at which a man is rated.

Sec. Shultz told reporters that the agreement is "a major forward step to train workers and to get more minorities into the construction trade."

He added, "Pres. Schoemann and his union have taken the lead among international building trades unions to provide both on-the-job training and related classroom instruction to develop journeymen training for minority workers across the country."

This agreement is now part of the national contract, and all our local unions are bound by its terms just as they are bound by the terms of the other provisions of the national agreement.

This is not merely a charitable or altruistic gesture. We need these craftsmen in many areas of the country. We cannot supply needed manpower for many construction jobs. Nearly every week the general office is involved with contractors who need skilled craftsmen and looking to us to discharge our obligations under our contracts. In too many instances, we have to tell them that the men they ask for are not available.

There will be some who say that we can't meet these challenges. But there have always been men of little faith. I emphasize that we must commit ourselves to these tasks. The labor movement is the only force that has the resources and the philosophy to do these practical jobs.

I for one have unlimited faith in the capacity of free men if they know the problem and if they have the leadership to guide them. We who are the elected representatives of the members of the United Association have to do more and to get more people thinking about these problems, thinking about the alternatives. Out of that greater understanding, we will forge the means to move forward together to build the America we all dream of.

GE Strike an Example:

Labor's Unity, Determination Prevail Against Its Opponents

UNIONS are meeting attempts to erode the effectiveness of the labor movement with firm determination. This was made clear in the 100-day General Electric strike, declared Pres. Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers—the major union involved in the long dispute.

The GE strike basically involved "a corporation that had wedded itself, philosophically, to the concept that the union should be destroyed" plus the reaction of the labor movement to such a challenge, Jennings said.

Jennings, who is also a vice president of the AFL-CIO, refuted the claim some have made that the strike was "suicidal for the union."

"Looking back to what was riding when the strike at GE started . . . the labor movement more than survived and is better for this kind of struggle," he declared.

He was questioned by reporters on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Jennings refused to speculate that the successful coordinated strike at General Electric increases the likelihood of another work stoppage when the contract expires in 1973. "A union flexes its muscle . . . only as a defensive action," he declared. "Our posture is very simple—not just the IUE's, but all of the unions: If this company will live with us, we'll live with them," he asserted.

"WE WANT THEM to be realistic—we want them to understand what has happened across the country," Jennings said. But, he added, "If they don't, then we know what we have to do."

Jennings said that the union learned from the GE strike "that there is no limit to the ability of rank-and-file workers to take on any kind of struggle" when they know the issues and are committed.

Reporters questioning Jennings were Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press and Stanley Levey of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers.

ONE OF THE MOST COMPREHENSIVE studies of the medical, environmental and economic consequences of air pollution was recently made public.

It was prepared for hearings of the Massachusetts Dept. of Public Health by the Union of Concerned Scientists' Committee on Environmental Pollution.

Since it is national in scope, the study carries a vital message on a subject of growing concern. Following are some of the high points in the report:

Effects on Health—"There is no longer any doubt that air pollution causes death and chronic disease. In some cases, the direct evidence of excess death and illness is unmistakable as in Donora, Pa., in 1948 or in the well known London smog episodes. There is, in addition, an increasing body of statistical evidence linking illness and chronic diseases to less spectacular levels of air pollution."

Among the diseases linked to air pollution are lung cancer, stomach cancer, dyspnea (labored breathing), bronchitis and other illnesses of the respiratory tract.

The scientists found that not only is the level of pollution important but also the period of time individuals are subjected to it. They could not state what levels of air pollution are "safe."

The Costs—"The national cost of air pollution is currently estimated at about $12 billion annually. This is for damage to property only. It does not account for increased health costs, production losses due to absenteeism from work, etc. Furthermore, the estimate of $12 billion is based only on known expenditures."

A Pittsburgh study was quoted to show that 15 percent of the cost of pollution is being borne by the polluters. The cost to the city of Boston, the scientists estimated, was between $75 million and $100 million per year.

The Aesthetic Damage—Since 50 percent of the U.S. population lives on less than 1 percent of the land area, the problem is concentrated.

They estimate that in Boston dust and grime fall at a rate between 20,000 pounds per square mile to 400,000 pounds per square mile, depending on the season.

The resulting effect on streets, buildings, cars and agricultural products cannot be estimated. It was noted that not only the exterior of the Boston Museum of Fine Arts has been increasingly deteriorating but that there is partial deterioration indoors, too.

Then there is the affect of eye stinging air on the public's attitude and morale.

Hazards to Flying—The report estimates that there were 24 near-misses near Logan International Airport in 1968 due to poor visibility.

The scientists fear that with the introduction of the "jumbo jets" carrying close to 500 passengers each, disasters of major proportions are threatened.

Sources of Pollution—The report divides these into two sectors, sources that move—largely automobiles—and those that are stationary.

"The automobiles in this country," they write, "are frequently and accurately quoted as contributing upward of 60 percent of all air pollution in the United States. This means that of the 150 billion tons of waste released into the air each year in the United States about 90 million tons come from our cars.

The stationary sources of pollution, such as those coming from electric utilities, industrial processing, residential and commercial buildings, open dumps, incinerators, etc., vary from city to city.

"It is our conviction that the serious environmental problems that we face today," the scientists say, "are primarily the results of inadequate knowledge of the long range local and global effects of our activities.

"It is our further belief that future disasters can be avoided only if both citizens and their elected officials are well informed on the possible effects of urban and regional planning on environment."

ATTEMPTS TO ERODE the effectiveness of the labor movement—as in long disputes such as the 100-day General Electric strike—are being met with the firm determination of unions, Pres. Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers tells reporters on Labor News Conference. He was interviewed by Neil Gilbride, left, of Associated Press and Stanley Levey of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers.

SPRING ARTS FESTIVAL prize winner Alexander Scutari, a retired member of International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 3, shows off his string designs to friends. The annual festival, sponsored by a joint union-industry fund of Local 3, was held in the Electric Industry Center at Flushing, N.Y.

N. Y. Festival Displays Unionists' Arts, Talents

New York—The arts and crafts and talents of hundreds of union members were on display for a week at the second Spring Arts Festival, produced through a union-negotiated labor-management fund.

The annual show, in Flushing, is one of many events sponsored by the Educational & Cultural Trust Fund set up in 1964 by the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 3 and electrical contractors.

Participating in the show were 288 non-professional artists and sculptors—members of the local along with their wives and children—and 14 nationally-known professionals. The last two nights of the festival, held at the Electrical Industry Center, was highlighted by musical and dancing performances, including ballet and opera.

Seventy-two awards were presented to the exhibitors. The prize-winning works included metal sculpture, pastels and oil paintings, ceramics, enameled jewelry, beadwork, embroidery, rug weaving and a number of other media.

Prizes were also awarded for exhibits in photography and cartooning.

Several retired union members, who attended art classes conducted by the trust fund, were recognized for outstanding work by artist Rene Shapshak, the director of the festival. Shapshak was assisted by Anthony Ruocco, director of the fund.

The 35 non-professional performers who put on a special program one night of the festival included singers, instrumentalists, dancers and actors.

Ballet Performed

Performances by the Eglevsky Ballet Company and guest stars from the New York City Ballet were featured during the last two nights of the festival. One of the highlights of the event was the presentation of Rossini's comic opera, "The Barber of Seville."

During the past year, the fund has sponsored 10 other cultural events, including ballets, musicals and plays.

The fund promotes cultural progress through a scholarship program for children of Local 3 members and through an adult education tuition reimbursement plan. The fund also makes grants to various organizations to advance cultural development.

The fund is headed by chairman Armand D'Angelo. Labor representatives include top officials of Local 3: Pres. Edward J. Cleary, Business Manager Thomas Van Arsdale and Financial Sec. Harry Van Arsdale.

TWUA Asks Action to Halt Brown Lung

New York—The Textile Workers Union of America has called on the government to give the "highest priority" to preventing the spread of byssinosis, a lung disease which afflicts workers in cotton mills exposed to cotton dust.

TWUA Sec.-Treas. Sol Stetin, in a letter to Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Robert H. Finch, urged development of a pilot project to design dust suppression measures to control the major sources of dust in cotton processing.

The project's emphasis, Stetin said, should be placed on removing vegetable matter from cotton before it enters the production process. "The project could be a limited one concerned with the machines which are the largest sources of cotton dust," he added.

Recalling Finch's declaration last September that byssinosis — or "brown lung"—is a "serious occupational disease too long ignored," Stetin said: "Surely the threat posed by this disease to the health of so many textile workers demands an urgent approach to its prevention."

Mississippi Senate Kills Strike Ban Bill

Jackson, Miss.—A labor-opposed bill banning public employe strikes was killed in the Mississippi Senate.

State AFL-CIO Pres. Claude Ramsay said the punitive legislation was criticized by nearly all participants in the Senate debate and only a handful of votes were cast against the motion to table the bill.

The measure would have automatically fired any public employe who struck. If he were later re-employed, he would be subject to dismissal for any reason during a three-year probationary period and barred for two years from receiving more pay than he was getting before the strike.

Timid Guidelines Adopted:

Panel on Public Employes Snubs Plea for Union Rights

Union recommendations for meaningful collective bargaining rights for public employes were largely disregarded in a report issued by the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations.

The commission, made up of local, state and federal officials, struggled for a year to reach a consensus on the type of public employe labor relations law states should adopt.

Its final report acknowledged the surge in public employe unionism, militancy and collective bargaining.

But its list of recommendations was headed by a timid proposal for state legislation requiring public employers merely to "meet and confer" with employe organizations.

The difference between "meet and confer" and negotiating, the report noted, is that "under a meet and confer system, the outcome of public employer-employe discussions depends more on management's determination than on bilateral decisions by equals."

Union witnesses, who had testified at commission hearings last June, sharply criticized the recommendation as a backward step in labor-management relations in the public sector.

Six of the 24 commission members — including two Republican governors and Pres. Nixon's budget director—dissented from the weak "meet and confer" recommendation and indicated their preference for clearcut negotiations.

The minority included Governors Nelson A. Rockefeller of New York, Raymond P. Shafer of Pennsylvania, Budget Dir. Robert P. Mayo, Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.), State Sen. Robert P. Knowles of Wisconsin and Edwin G. Michaelian, county executive of New York's Westchester County.

At the earlier commission hearings, the AFL-CIO and two affiliates—the Service Employes and the State, County & Municipal Employes—had urged that state laws require local governments and state agencies to bargain with unions representing a majority of workers in the unit.

They opposed any flat prohibition on strikes as unworkable and a detriment to meaningful bargaining. At the same time they supported machinery designed to avert strikes, including mediation and the offer of voluntary arbitration.

The unions urged that bargaining in the public sector be as broad and flexible as possible, with state and federal standards setting minimums that could be built upon. The two sides should have the same freedom to negotiate a union shop as do workers and management in private industry, the labor witnesses urged.

But the commission's final recommendations shied away from these concepts.

Instead the commission said state laws should bar public employe strikes, prohibit a union shop by affirming the right of public employes "to join or not to join" a union and require unions of public employes to meet state-set standards of "internal union democracy."

The commission also said that state labor laws should spell out a long list of "management rights" that cannot be bargained away and assert the binding effect of any present or future civil service regulations in public employment.

Some of the language in the report itself was less hidebound than the commission's formal recommendations.

But the overall tone of the proposals was sharply criticized by the unions that had testified before the commission.

Pres. David Sullivan of the Service Employes said the commission "missed the opportunity to make a meaningful and important contribution to stabilizing the sometimes chaotic conditions in the public employe sector."

And Pres. Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employes said the commission's proposals would mark "a big step backwards" from the progress made in recent years in public employe collective bargaining.

It could result in more, not fewer, disputes, he stressed.

The commission report noted—without any expression of disapproval—that a number of states and communities have gone considerably further in the direction of real collective bargaining than it proposed. It left the implication that its report was intended to urge a small, forward step on states that have balked at dealing with public employe organizations on a formal basis. And the commission flatly disclaimed any pretense of "final or ideal answers in this turbulent area of public policy."

Railroads Reject Offers Of Unions for Accord

The nation's railroads have rejected attempts to settle the shopcrafts' wage-rules dispute in hopes that Congress will force a settlement through legislation, the Senate Labor committee was told.

Vice Pres. J. W. O'Brien of the Sheet Metal Workers made the charge in urging the committee to reject Pres. Nixon's proposal to impose a settlement in the 17-month dispute.

The Senate committee held hearings as both sides continued to seek a solution through negotiations, sponsored by the Labor Dept. No progress was reported in the talks, which resumed at the appeal of Chairman Harley O. Staggers (D-W.Va.) of the House Commerce Committee.

It earlier held hearings on Nixon's plan to impose a tentative agreement accepted previously by the Machinists, Boilermakers and International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers but rejected by the Sheet Metal Workers because of a rule permitting limited crossing of craft jurisdiction lines.

Instead of immediately accepting the Administration proposal, sent to Congress on Mar. 4, lawmakers enacted a 37-day moratorium on any strikes or lockouts in the dispute. It expires Apr. 11.

O'Brien testified that he offered to participate in a fact-finding study on the controversial work rule but the offer was turned down by the railroads. He said he offered to accept the rule as being applied on one railroad, the Santa Fe, but the railroad again said "no."

Asserting that management also refused his reluctant consent to arbitration of the issue, O'Brien added: "Every proposal from the union has been refused without negotiation."

Labor Sec. George P. Shultz traced the history of the dispute and urged the committee to report out the Administration's proposal.

Meanwhile, the Sheet Metal Workers announced that they have appealed an injunction issued by U.S. District Judge Howard F. Corcoran in Washington to ban the four unions from striking a single railroad, the Union Pacific, over the dispute.

HEW Plan Backed For Medicare Option

Veneman in testimony before the House Ways & Means Committee, and later enlarged upon by him, HEW Sec. Robert H. Finch and HEW Assistant Sec. Lewis H. Butler.

Finch said that the "cornerstone" of this new option will be to give "a choice between obtaining services from a health maintenance organization or arranging for them in the usual way from individual doctors and hospitals."

The option, he pointed out, could help prevent illness, bring quicker treatment when it occurs, avoid unneeded hospitalization and "provide a full range of services from a single source in a coordinated, efficient manner."

Veneman said the proposal could "encourage the growth of health maintenance organizations to serve not only Americans under Medicare and Medicaid, but private consumers as well."

The "health maintenance organizations," it was made clear, could be controlled by consumers, business firms or by groups of doctors. Group health associations throughout the nation are the best-known among such organizations.

Butler said the option as a part of Medicare, to be contracted for by the government with a health insurance carrier, would reduce the duration and extent of illnesses.

All it would have to do, he added, "is cut out one-half day per year of hospital care for each person . . . for the program to pay for itself."

Health economists have estimated that prepaid comprehensive health plans have reduced the average person's total annual hospitalization by a much greater rate than that.

Meany said that the AFL-CIO "particularly welcomes encouragement of prepaid group practice as an alternative to fee-for-service."

"By placing emphasis on preventing illness instead of paying for treatment after sickness has occurred," he added, "Medicare and Medicaid beneficiaries will receive a broader scope of benefits while medical costs can be controlled."

The proposal, Meany said, "is a move toward implementing the recommendations on Medicare and Medicaid made by the AFL-CIO before the House Ways & Means Committee last November."

That testimony called for contractual prepayment of comprehensive benefits and "the new proposal will make possible substantial progress toward his goal," he concluded.

Bargaining Trend:

Education Emerges As Fringe Benefit

Educational opportunity for both the worker and his children is increasingly becoming a collective bargaining objective, according to an article in the March issue of the American Federationist, the AFL-CIO magazine.

The author, Dr. Herbert A. Levine, director of labor education at Rutgers University, also reports that this emphasis on education benefits is bringing substantial results.

His article, "Education: An Emerging Fringe Benefit," cites provisions appearing in union contracts that call for joint labor-management responsibility and sometimes government cooperation in a wide range of education programs.

For the worker, these programs may mean training or retraining for skills that will help him keep his job in the face of automation as well as opportunities for expanding his general knowledge.

For the worker's children, they offer the chance for higher education beyond the limits of the family's income.

Even though unions are taking scholarship proposals to the bargaining table, Levine notes that they still "correctly" maintain "that education primarily is a public responsibility to be supported in the main as a social charge on the public treasury."

Levine describes a number of different educational plans negotiated by unions:

- A program negotiated by the Plumbers & Pipefitters with several national construction firms which has provided more than $11 million in grants for apprenticeship training.
- Training courses for workers and their children under a plan negotiated by Laborers' Local 222 with building contractors in southern New Jersey.
- A contribution of 1 percent of payroll by New York's voluntary hospitals to train members of Local 1199 of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union for better jobs.
- An educational fund negotiated by the Chicago Joint Board of the Clothing Workers that provides money for the children of union members to go to college.
- Educational funds negotiated in New York by the State, County & Municipal Employes and by Local 3 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

The article points out that despite the mounting achievements in negotiating education benefits, "American labor is still feeling its way toward building this new fringe benefit."

This parallels the efforts of trade unionists in England who are experimenting with provisions for released-time education and by others in Germany, Holland and Scandinavia who have recently won paid educational leave, Levine writes.

He predicts, however, that by the end of the present decade "the American worker and his children are likely to have won educational opportunity as a collective bargaining benefit . . . as inextricably woven into the labor-management relationship as are the social welfare provisions and pension and health insurance."

"Education as a new fringe benefit in bargaining," he suggests, "can have a profound effect not only on the character of organized labor but on the quality and skill of the American work force.

"It can also significantly alter the nation's education system."

EDUCATIONAL OPPORTUNITIES for workers and their children are increasingly being sought by unions through collective bargaining, according to an article in the March issue of the American Federationist. Steelworkers' members are shown here attending classes which will lead to a high school equivalency certificate under a program supported by the union, management and government.

Meany Asks Clemency For Jailed Teachers

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany urged New Jersey Gov. William T. Cahill to grant clemency to Teachers Pres. David Selden and other jailed teachers, declaring that injunctions and punitive contempt sentences "have no place in decent labor relations."

"Public employes are not second-class citizens," Meany wired Cahill, the state's new Republican chief executive.

Selden and other teachers subjected to fines and jail sentences for striking were protesting conditions "intolerable to teachers and detrimental to the achievement of the highest standards of education," Meany wrote.

"Clemency can do more than imprisonment for the cause of education," he added.

Meany was joined in his appeal for clemency by Pres. Charles H. Marciante of the New Jersey State AFL-CIO, who urged amnesty for all jailed strikers.

Selden surrendered last week to begin serving a six-week sentence for picketing a Newark school in violation of a court injunction. His release is expected May 1 or 2.

"This is a real jail, even though it is not a maximum security prison," Selden wrote union members from the Essex County penitentiary. "Only two visits a week are permitted from persons other than lawyers; books may not be brought in, and the library is poor." He added:

"I am in jail as a result of a deliberate protest, not because I was unlucky. Second, I am conscious of the power of the union behind me" and "a large part of the labor movement."

Selden said that when he gets out he will continue to seek changes in no-strike laws and legal precedents, "even if this means more picketing."

After Selden was jailed, Vice Pres. Betty Rufalo of the Newark Federation of Teachers surrendered to begin serving a 90-day contempt-of-court sentence. Six other local leaders must serve three-month sentences also. Sentences of 10 to 30 days were given 92 other local members, and fines of $80,000 must be paid.

The union stayed on strike for more than three weeks until it won major advances in wages, teaching conditions and community programs.

U.S. Steel Indicted On Pollution Counts

Chicago—A federal grand jury here has indicted the U.S. Steel Corp. and the superintendent of its Chicago plant on charges of polluting Lake Michigan.

The indictment alleged that the plant had discharged waste solids from blast furnaces into the lake on five occasions last September in violation of federal law.

Close Senate Vote Takes Shape As Showdown Nears on Carswell

stitution with the power of appointment."

He asserted that "if the Senate attempts to substitute its judgment as to who should be appointed, the traditional constitutional balance is in jeopardy and the duty of the President under the Constitution impaired."

He wrote Sen. William B. Saxbe (R-Ohio) that the issue is "whether I, as President of the United States, shall be accorded the same right of choice in naming Supreme Court justices which has been freely accorded to my predecessors of both parties."

Opponents of the nomination quickly retorted that the President's letter belittled the equal constitutional responsibility of the Senate to "advise and consent" to nominations. And far from giving routine approval to nominations, the Senate less than two years ago ignored two of Pres. Johnson's Supreme Court nominations.

After making public the letter, Saxbe said he would vote against recommitting the nomination even though he was not satisfied with Carswell's "weakness on civil rights" and the Florida judge would not have been his choice for the court.

As the list of undecided senators narrowed, opponents of confirmation continued to pick up strength from Democratic senators who had voted last November to confirm Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., for the Supreme Court nomination.

The latest convert was Virginia Sen. William B. Spong, Jr., who said he will vote to send the nomination back to committee even though the vote "could hurt me" politically in the conservative-dominated state.

But the list of Republicans willing to oppose the President twice in a row on a Supreme Court appointment was obviously going to be shorter than the 19 who voted against the Haynsworth nomination.

So close was the lineup that Vice Pres. Spiro T. Agnew was withdrawn as the dignitary scheduled to throw the first ball at the baseball season opener in Washington. He will preside over the Senate, instead, with the power to break a tie on the first of a possible four votes.

This was the parliamentary lineup on the nomination:

The Senate has scheduled a vote for Apr. 6 on a motion to send the nomination back to the Judiciary Committee. It would require a majority of senators present and voting to adopt the motion.

But first, the Senate will vote on a proposal to table the motion. Agnew would be able to cast the deciding vote—obviously in favor of tabling—in case of a tie.

If the tabling motion is defeated and the motion to recommit the nomination is adopted, that would probably—but not necessarily— be the end of the nomination. The Judiciary Committee, presumably after additional hearings, could once more send the nomination back to the Senate floor. But past precedent would make it likely that the nomination would be withdrawn and a new name submitted.

If either the tabling motion passes or the recommittal motion is defeated, the final vote would come on Apr. 8. The lineup would not necessarily be the same as on the vote to recommit. Several senators who will vote to send the nomination back to committee have said they are undecided on how they would vote on the straight confirmation issue. And several senators who are opposing recommittal have said they have not decided how they will vote on confirmation.

To add to the parliamentary possibilities, a motion could be made to table the nomination.

A charge that a Negro government lawyer was pressured into signing a letter that appeared to endorse Carswell added new fuel to the case against confimation.

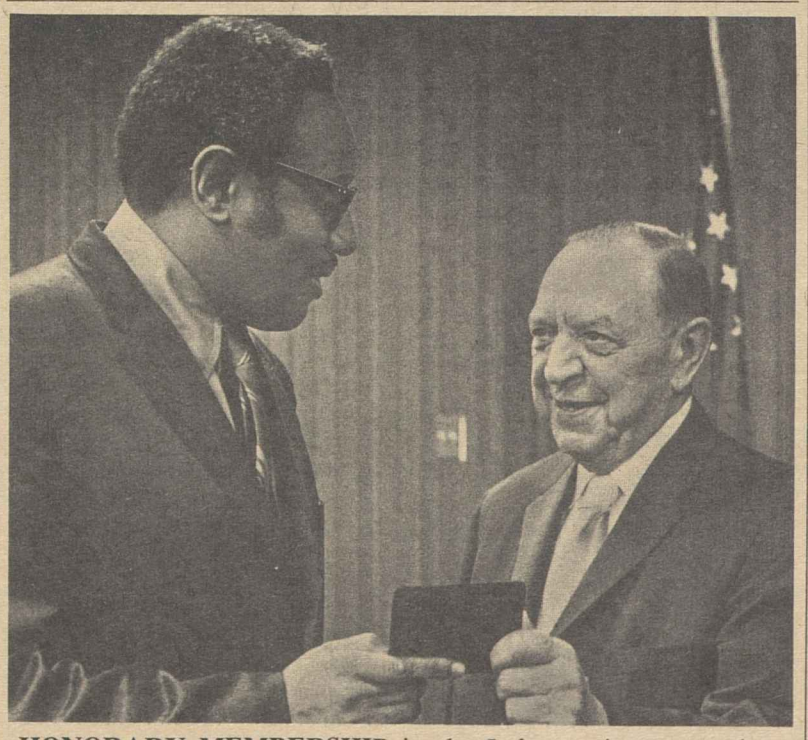
The lawyer, Charles F. Wilson, is currently an official of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. His letter to the Senate Judiciary Committee on Feb. 5, declaring that he had been treated courteously by Judge Carswell when he had appeared in his court as a private attorney in civil rights cases, has been widely quoted by supporters of Carswell.



One of the charges against Carswell is that he was hostile and discourteous to civil rights attorneys and particularly to black lawyers.

Sen. Alan Cranston (D.-Calif.) told the Senate that he had affidavits from lawyers who know Wilson and quoted him as declaring he was "pressured" into writing the letter when actually he considered Carswell biased and unfit for the court.

Deputy Atty. Gen. Richard G. Kleindienst called a news conference to deny that Wilson had been pressured or that he had sent the letter because he had been recommended for a federal job by a former law partner of Kleindienst.

Wilson told newsmen that no "pressure" had been put on him to send the letter, that an assistant attorney general had come to his home to talk about Wilson's dealings with Carswell, and that the assistant attorney general, William H. Rehnquist, had drafted the letter that Wilson signed.

In still another development, 207 former law clerks to Supreme Court justices—many now prominent in law and government—signed a letter telling senators that confirmation of Carswell would be "a disservice to the court and the nation."

HONORARY MEMBERSHIP in the Laborers is presented to Samuel C. Jackson, left, assistant secretary of the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development, by Pres. Peter Fosco of the Laborers. Jackson was a member of Laborers Local 142 in Topeka, Kan., while attending college.

Warns of Danger Signs:

Congress Unit Sees Real Threat to Jobs

Democratic members of the Joint Economic Committee of Congress warned of "a very real danger of higher unemployment" this year "while inflation continues without substantial abatement."

The majority report of the committee said the economic danger signs include a "stagnant economy" coupled with "an increasing shortage of homes and public facilities."

Republican as well as Democratic members of the committee joined in describing the economic outlook for 1970 as "difficult" and urged the Administration to prepare "contingency programs to be implemented if anti-inflationary economic policies induce continuing unemployment or recession."

The committee is made up of an equal number of congressmen and senators, with a rotating chairman —currently Rep. Wright Patman (D-Tex.), who is also chairman of the House Banking Committee.

It came up with a mixed bag of recommendations, one set drafted by the Democratic majority, another by Republicans, with a scattering of separate views on both sides. A brief statement of agreement by both Democrats and Republicans included these comments:

- Housing should not have to bear the brunt of restrictive monetary policies. The Administration should act to provide an ample supply of credit for housing and other "high priority" needs.
- There are "serious disadvantages" to direct wage and price controls, including the difficulty of effective enforcement.
- "With determined efforts to improve the functioning of the economy, an unemployment goal of about 3 percent can be achieved over the long term."

Both Democrats and Republicans on the committee ignored warnings by labor and other groups about the adverse effects of American investments abroad leading to the export of jobs.

The consensus recommendation said the government "should proceed to remove the present restrictions on American lending and investment abroad."

The Democratic members also called for review and reconsideration of all import quotas, claiming that this could reduce inflation by lowering prices for both imported goods and competitive American-manufactured products.

Warnings about the risk of slipping into a recession were reinforced by the latest monthly business survey of the Commerce Dept.

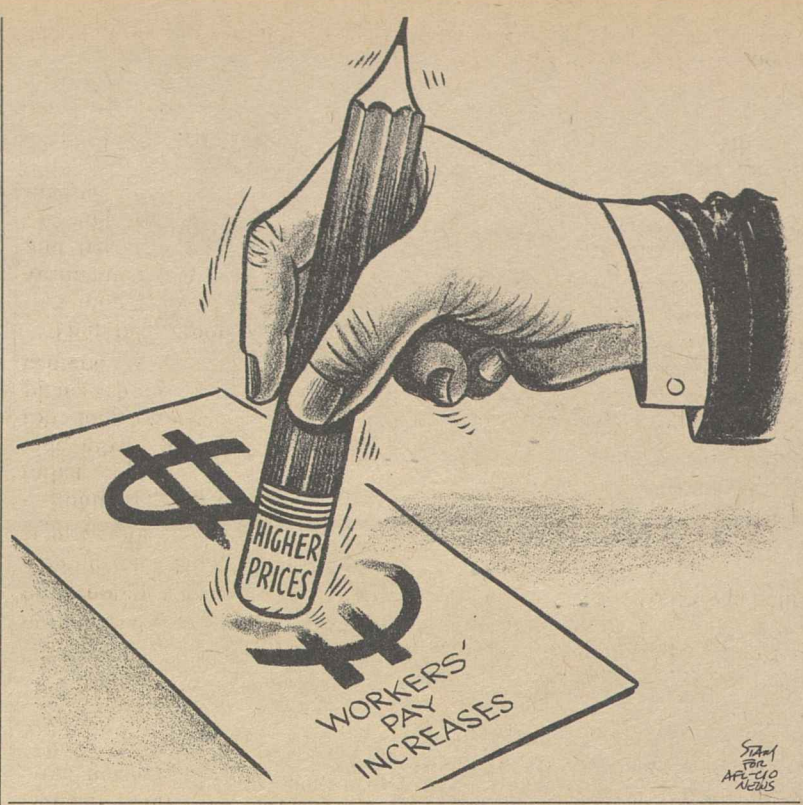
The report said the nation's gross national product—the total of goods and services produced—is expected to drop for the second quarter in a row. Many economists consider two quarterly declines in the GNP as a sign of recession.

A Michigan State University economics professor, Dr. Charles A. Killingsworth, warned in testimony before a House Labor subcommittee that unemployment is likely to rise substantially higher than government officials have indicated. He said the rate could reach 6 to 8 percent next year.



The first sign of a possible retreat of interest rates from their current 100-year high came with a reduction in the prime interest rates charged by the nation's largest banks. This is the rate banks charge their best and most financially sound corporate customers; most businesses and all consumers pay higher rates.

The prime rate dropped from 8.5 to 8 percent, but leading banks stressed that the supply of money remains tight, that loan applications will be closely screened, and that other interest rates usually tied to the prime rate would move down only slowly.

Hightower Named To Hawaii Post

William Hightower, long-time field representative for the AFL-CIO in the region encompassing Maryland, Virginia and the District of Columbia, has been named by Pres. George Meany as the federation's Hawaii-Pacific representative succeeding the late A. S. Reile.

The appointment is effective Apr. 6. In announcing it, Meany said Hawaii's union potential is "as great a challenge" as that presented by any state. Hightower and the state's AFL-CIO leadership should bring it to a "new high level" of activity and growth, he said.

Manpower Report Cites Hidden Unemployment

Pres. Nixon's first manpower report to Congress recites the accomplishments of the training and job placement programs of the 1960s but stresses that "there is still a great deal to do" before "full opportunity for all citizens" becomes a reality.

The report, prepared by the Labor Dept.'s Manpower Administration, acknowledges the problem of increased unemployment and puts a spotlight also on hidden unemployment—persons who have given up the job hunt because of lack of opportunity.

Surveys indicate that "there is one 'discouraged worker' for every four unemployed workers," the report notes.

It also stresses that unemployment alone is not an indicator of poverty. More than 1 million families with below-poverty income are headed by men working fulltime throughout the year.

Although the report does not recommend a higher minimum wage, it does acknowledge that "a higher minimum wage with more extended coverage could help to raise the low earnings of many family heads and thus play an important part in the needed complex of antipoverty measures."

The report also focused on the low-wage, high-poverty economy of the South, particularly as it affects Negro families.

While 30 percent of the nation's families live in the South, 50 percent of all poor families are in southern states.

"In the South," the report notes, "one out of every four Negro family heads who worked fulltime throughout 1968 earned too little to bring his family's income above the poverty line, compared with only about one out of 20 in the Northeast and North Central states and less than one out of 30 in the West."

While the number of families below the poverty line declined in the 1960s, the report cites a widening gap between those at the poverty level and the national income average for all families.

The report acknowledges the inadequacy of unemployment benefits in nearly all states.

"Too low" weekly benefits are "the most serious shortcoming" of the unemployment insurance system, it declares.

But after a detailed discussion of the inadequacies of the present state-determined benefit level, the report merely notes that "the present Administration is urging the states to act quickly on this problem to avoid the need for federal action."

The "leave-it-up-to-the-states" doctrine sharply contrasted with manpower recommendations of the Johnson Administration urging federal minimum standards on the amount and duration of benefits.

On the continuing manpower programs, the report says that more than 1.76 million persons were enrolled in federally assisted programs during 1969, with the number estimated to rise to 2 million during the current fiscal year.

A transmittal letter from Pres. Nixon to Congress renews the Administration request for changes in the Manpower Training Act, for extension of coverage of unemployment insurance, along with federal extended benefits during periods of high unemployment, and for enactment of the family assistance program to supplement the income of the working poor as well as set a federal floor under welfare benefits.

Senate Okays New Program Of School Aid

ects, migrant farm children and Cuban refugees.

It will be up to Congress and the President, however, to determine how much of the new funding authorizations is actually appropriated.

Currently, for example, the "Title I" program of aid to children from low-income homes is about $1.4 billion a year compared to the "authorized" amount of $3.6 billion. The new legislation would boost the authorization to $4.2 billion in the fiscal year starting July 1, to $4.5 billion the second year and to $6.5 billion the third year.

The Senate debate over school segregation centered on an amendment Mississippi Sen. John C. Stennis had succeeded in tacking on to the original education bill. It would have prohibited the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare from applying different standards to segregation resulting from unconstitutional dual school systems than to segregation resulting from neighborhood housing patterns.

The effect would have been to end government desegregation directives since the Supreme Court desegregation rulings apply only to school systems that had been segregated by law.

Pres. Nixon's recent education message also made this distinction and was credited with switching the votes of some Republicans who had originally voted for the Stennis amendment.

Final passage of the authorization bill will clear the way for early House action on aid to education appropriations for the fiscal year starting in July. The House Appropriations Committee this year has separated school aid funding from the overall appropriation bill covering the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, the Labor Dept. and several independent agencies.

Its goal is to give priority handling to the education program so that school districts throughout the nation will know as soon as possible the amount of federal aid they can expect for the 1970-71 school year.

In an unrelated area, Pres. Nixon has signed into law a bill which will soon make cigarette commercials on radio and television a thing of the past.

Starting next January, all cigarette commercials will be banned from the airwaves. By October, a new and stronger warning against smoking hazards will appear on cigarette packages. And after July 1, 1971, the Federal Trade Commission will have the power to require similar warnings on all cigarette advertising, including ads in newspapers, magazines and on billboards.

Creation of Public Service Jobs Urged to Give Value to Training

A public service employment program must be combined with manpower training legislation "to successfully grapple with the problem of the unemployed and the underemployed," the AFL-CIO emphasized to Congress.

Training by itself is not enough, the federation warned, because that will only compound the problem—giving hope to the disadvantaged and then "throwing them back into the morass from which they came."

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller made the points in testimony to a Senate Labor subcommittee holding hearings on manpower measures. (Excerpts, Page 4.) Biemiller was accompanied by AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger.

As it did earlier before a House Labor subcommittee, the federation called for a manpower bill that would create jobs in public service and provide training designed to give workers new skills.

Such a bill has been introduced by Rep. James G. O'Hara and 111 other House members. No similar measure has as yet been introduced in the Senate although O'Hara's proposal has strong support there.

The Administration's manpower bill is opposed by labor as "completely inadequate," Biemiller again made clear. "It creates no jobs. It lacks a provision for a realistic public service employment program," he said.

The purpose of the Administration's bill, Biemiller pointed out, is to set up a mechanism for coordinating and consolidating existing manpower training programs.

But even as such a mechanism the bill "misses the mark," he continued, because it would decentralize manpower activities by placing them in the hands of the states.

Manpower requirements "are national in scope" and must not be fragmented into 50 different parts, "each going its own way and dispensing federal funds in a manner that may not be in line with national goals," Biemiller asserted.

Citing government statistics on worsening unemployment, he said that a federal program to create public-service jobs that was needed in 1967, 1968 and 1969 "is even more essential today."

"I think it is time," he added, "that we all stop fooling with the notion that the private sector can find enough jobs for everyone, including the hard-core unemployed. It just can't."

Public-service employment, Biemiller continued, would also provide jobs in badly-needed services too long ignored—such as hospitals, schools, parks and recreation centers.

That takes money, he said, but it is money that represents an "investment in the future of America and her people." And, he added, "I can't think of a better way to invest."

CONVENTIONS

Five labor organizations have announced dates and locations for conventions scheduled for 1970.

They are: The Canadian Labor Congress at Edmonton, Alberta, May 18-22; New Jersey AFL-CIO, Atlantic City, June 1-4; Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, Bal Harbour, Fla., June 1-5; Musicians, Houston, Tex., June 15-18, and the Upholsterers, Los Angeles, June 18.

Postal Talks Pressed On Full Package

Congress moved speedily to ratify the first stage of the collective bargaining agreement negotiated by seven postal unions—a 6 percent pay raise, retroactive to Dec. 27, 1969.

The retroactive pay hike will go to 750,000 postal workers, 1.3 million other salaried federal employes and 3.2 million persons in the armed forces. It does not affect the 700,000 hourly-paid federal blue collar workers, whose pay scales are tied to prevailing area wages in private industry.

The Senate passed the pay bill, 84-1, on Apr. 8, just six days after its terms had been announced by Postmaster Gen. Winton M. Blount and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at a joint news conference.

The House acted the next day, voting 370-7 approval. Minor differences between the two bills, not affecting the pay raise, have to be reconciled before the legislation is cleared for the President's signature.

Meanwhile, union and management negotiators were putting the final touches on separate legislation which will include an additional 8 percent raise for postal workers as part of a postal reorganization.

A key ingredient of the legislation—its "most significant" feature according to Meany—will be the most comprehensive procedure for collective bargaining ever entered into by the federal government.

AFL-CIO legislative experts were working with union and postal management officials to draw up a bill embodying these concepts agreed to by the negotiators:

"Collective bargaining procedures under a statutory framework establishing methods for conducting elections, providing one or more methods for resolving negotiating impasses, and requiring collective bargaining over all aspects of wages, hours and working conditions including grievance procedures, final and binding arbitration of disputes, and in general all matters that are subject to collective bargaining in the private sector."

The agreement, subject to implementation by Congress, also specifies that the unions and the Post Office will negotiate a compression of the pay scale so that it will take a worker only eight years to move from the starting rate to the top pay of his grade, instead of the present 21 years.

This will mean an additional pay

GOP Votes Key to Loss Of Carswell

By David L. Perlman

After two successive rebuffs from the Senate, Pres. Nixon began a new search for a Supreme Court justice to fill a seat that has been vacant for nearly a year.

Nixon said his next nominee will be a conservative from outside the South. He will submit his new choice "in the very near future."

The Senate's 51-45 vote against confirmation of Judge G. Harrold Carswell was even more stunning—and stinging—than its refusal last November to confirm Judge Haynsworth.

It was a reluctant rejection.

The Senate, and particularly the bloc of moderate Republicans whose votes had been decisive in the defeat of the Haynsworth nomination, had not wanted a new confrontation with the President.

It was not easy to find a candidate who would run into more than token opposition in the Senate. But the White House succeeded.

Civil rights groups opposed his nomination and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany last January termed the appointment "a slap in the face of the nation's Negro citizens" and urged the Senate to reject it.

The AFL-CIO formally testified against the nomination and the federation's Executive Council termed the choice of Carswell "appalling" and a clear contradiction of Pres. Nixon's campaign pledge to look for Supreme Court justices of the caliber of the late Oliver Wendell Holmes and Louis D. Brandeis.

Nixon Plan Enacted:

Railroad Settlement Imposed on Unions

By Duane Emme

The 18-month-old dispute involving four shopcraft unions and the nation's railroads ended when Congress enacted Pres. Nixon's bill imposing a settlement.

The measure, which passed the Senate 88-3 and the House by a voice vote, became law in time to beat expiration of a congressionally-passed ban on strikes or lockouts in the dispute. Pres. Nixon signed it Apr. 10. The 37-day moratorium was to expire the next day.

The new law requires the 48,000 workers represented by the unions to accept a settlement ratified in December by the Machinists, Boilermakers and International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers but rejected by the Sheet Metal Workers.

The basis of that union's rejection was a rule permitting some crossing of craft jurisdiction lines. It had been agreed earlier that all four unions would have to accept the pact to make it effective.

Over the past three months there were a number of unsuccessful attempts to resolve the impasse through negotiations sponsored by the Labor Dept.

Spokesmen for the unions, in testimony before Congress, said the dispute could be quickly settled if railroad managements were forced to negotiate knowing that the government would not intervene.

The imposed settlement provides wage increases of 68 cents an hour in retroactive and future increments for about 40,000 workers over two years. About 8,000, in less-skilled jobs, will get total boosts that are slightly below that figure.

Chicago—Meat Cutter delegates representing 9,000 Swift & Co. employes in 28 states have approved a new contract offer providing wage increases of 82 cents an hour over 41 months tailored to anticipated increases in the cost of living.

The agreement tentatively endorsed by a conference of Swift locals here is subject to ratification by the full membership by Apr. 15. It takes effect five months in advance of the scheduled expiration date of current Meat Cutter contracts at 56 Swift locations.

The key feature of the new pact,

Senate Pares Down Jobless Insurance Bill

The Senate voted unanimous approval of a pared-down unemployment insurance bill, extending coverage to an additional four million workers and providing an additional 13 weeks of benefits during periods of high unemployment.

The legislation now goes to a House-Senate conference committee, to be reconciled with a bill the House passed last November.

In new coverage, the Senate bill protects 500,000 fewer workers than the House-passed legislation—and 1.3 million fewer persons than the Administration proposed last year.

The Senate did, however, improve on the House bill by extending coverage to more than 250,000 farm workers. The House-passed bill excludes farm workers entirely and the Administration had proposed coverage for 400,000 agricultural workers.

Neither the House bill, the Senate bill, nor the Administration proposal would establish federal minimum standards for the amount or duration of benefits—which had been strongly urged by the AFL-CIO.

An amendment by Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy (D-Minn.) to add federal benefit standards was beaten, 47-29.

For the most part, the Senate followed the recommendations of its Finance Committee on coverage. The committee had cut back the

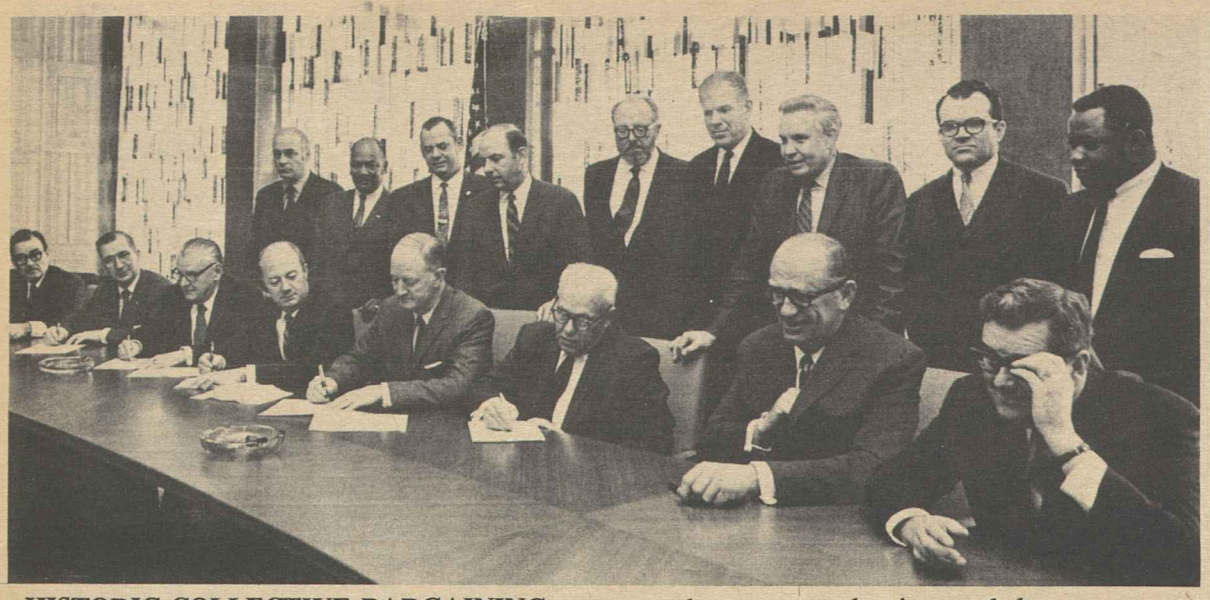
Court Calls on NLRB To Stiffen Its Penalties

A U.S. Court of Appeals in a decision of major significance directed the National Labor Relations Board to consider stiffening its penalties against an employer found guilty of "brazen refusal to bargain" with a union.



The appeals court for the District of Columbia enforced an NLRB bargaining order against Tiidee Products, Inc., a Dayton, O., maker of house trailer parts. At the same time it sent the case back to the labor board for further hearings on additional remedies requested by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

The remand makes it possible for the NLRB to reconsider its present policy of refusing to compensate employes for potential benefits lost while the employer battled their union in the courts. Until now, the board has refused to consider AFL-CIO appeals for such remedies against deliberate delays by a lawbreaking management.

Appeals Judges Harold Leventhal and Spottswood W. Robinson III ruled that Tiidee's refusal to bargain, after the union won an election 30 months ago, was a "clear and flagrant violation" of the law.

Management's objections to the election were "patently frivolous," they said, and violated the "express

6% Federal Pay Boost Approved by Congress

raise for most postal workers, on top of the 14 percent salary increase.

In a message to Congress, Pres. Nixon said the pay increases are necessary to provide "fair treatment" for government employes.

But he urged that as "insurance against inflation" Congress raise the first-class letter postage from 6 to 10 cents, with smaller increases in other categories of mail. He asked also for a speedup in payment of estate and gift taxes, which would bring in $1.5 billion in added reveenue on a one-time basis in the coming fiscal year.

The President's proposal for the sharp hike in letter postage ran into congressional criticism from both Democrats and Republicans. The Senate Democratic Policy Committee unanimously adopted a resolution opposing an increase in first class postal rates until users of bulk mail categories "pay their fair share of postal cost."

The historic direct negotiations over pay broke a legislative logjam that had tied up pay raise bills since last autumn.

All attempts to amend the retroactive pay bill in the Senate were soundly defeated; a proposal by Sen. Carl T. Curtis (R-Neb.) to exclude the 1.3 million classified employes from the raise was beaten, 77-8. Curtis also complained that the postal workers whose wildcat strikes had paved the way for direct negotiations should have been jailed.

But in the end, only Sen. Allen J. Ellender (D.-La.) cast a vote against the bill.

At Senate hearings on the 6 percent pay bill, the Postmaster General declared firmly:

"It is high time for these postal employes to catch up with workers in other parts of our economy, not only in terms of pay, but also in terms of working conditions and opportunities for advancement."

Blount argued for postal reform and said the lack of machinery to settle legitimate grievances was the cause of wildcat strikes.

Frustrations Explode

"The frustrations that have been building in the postal service for years finally exploded," he said, causing "one out of every five postal employes in the country" to walk off the job.

"I am aware of no evidence that outside agitators or subversive organizations of any kind played a major role in fomenting the walkout," Blount told the senators.

He added: "I am convinced, on the contrary, that what we witnessed last month was a spontaneous demonstration of the fact that many of our long-time postal employes are simply fed up to the teeth with a system that no longer works and is no longer capable of responding effectively to their legitimate aspirations."

The negotiations on the postal reorganization package and the second-stage increase began with the same team that worked out the overall agreement.

James C. Gildea, executive assistant to Meany, is the chief negotiator for the union side. His management counterpart is Deputy Postmaster Gen. E. T. Klassen, a veteran of many private industry bargaining sessions.

With basic agreement achieved, a subcommittee was assigned to put together the legislative language.

Under the provisions of the agreement, the 8 percent raise will be effective when the legislation is approved by Congress.

Air Line Pilots Win Ruling on 3-Man Crews

A decision that United Air Lines' B-737 jets must be manned by three pilots "evidently resolves the B-737 crew requirement issue on all airlines" having contracts with the Air Line Pilots, the union said.

The union commented after an arbitration board ruled that the third crew member constituted "a meaningful addition to safety" on a B-737 and should be continued.

ALPA has been engaged in a drive for three-member cockpit crews on the short-range jet starting before it was put in service by United in 1968. Other users of B-737s are Western, Wien, Consolidated, Frontier, Aloha and Piedmont.

The Air Transport Association, speaking for management, and some Federal Aviation Administration officials contended that the third pilot was not needed. Earlier, a special review board established by the government decided the three-man crew was essential, but it's decision was temporary.

Funds Urged To Aid Public Broadcast Unit

The Corporation for Public Broadcasting has proved "a wise investment in the public interest" and should continue to receive federal funds, the AFL-CIO said.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller urged a Senate Commerce subcommittee to approve a bill to continue federal grants through the 1973 fiscal year and authorize federal matching of non-federal contributions for public broadcasting.

He wrote Subcommittee Chairman John O. Pastore (D-R.I.) that the corporation, set up to encourage educational and non-profit community service programs, has been "a significant vehicle for improving the quality of radio and television broadcasting."

Its accomplishments, Biemiller said, "have exceeded our expectations" and justify continued support.

On Jurisdictional Disputes:

Unions, Contractors Improve Joint Board

The building trades signed an agreement with an association of 13 construction employer organizations to revive the National Joint Board for the Settlement of Jurisdictional Disputes.

Agreement came after months of negotiations by the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. and the Participating Contractors Employers' Associations. At issue were 10 amendments of the plan used in working out jurisdictional disputes on both national and local levels.

The amended plan, which became effective Apr. 3 and will continue through next Mar. 31, has been approved by the executive council of the BCTD.

The agreement is covered by Article X of the BCTD constitution which provides that methods of procedure approved by the council "shall be recognized as final and binding upon the department and upon all affiliated national and international unions and their affiliated local unions."

In a joint statement, the union and employer groups said:

"The National Joint Board is providing a private means for settling jurisdictional disputes amicably in the building and construction industry.

"It is a home-grown solution to labor problems which would otherwise load up the already over-taxed facilities of the National Labor Relations Board and the federal courts."

The statement further noted that the Joint Board is privately financed by the participants and its services are available to all contractors dealing with labor in the building and construction industry.

Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz praised the BCTD and the contractors for reaching the agreement, which was signed at the Labor Dept. Apr. 7.

"I am gratified to participate in an occasion that symbolizes this assumption of private responsibility by labor and management in the nation's vital building and construction industry," Shultz said.

The 13 member organizations in the PCEA represent more than 25,000 contractors who employ most of the 3.5 million organized craftsmen in the building and construction industry.

They include the National Constructors Association; National Electrical Contractors Association; Mechanical Contractors Association of America, Inc.; National Association of Reinforcing Steel Contractors; National Association of Miscellaneous, Ornamental & Architectural Products Contractors; National Erectors Association; Crane & Rigging Division of the Heavy Specialized Carriers Conference; Plumbing-Heating-Cooling Contractors Association; Painting & Decorating Contractors of America; Sheet Metal & Air Conditioning Contractors National Association; Insulation Distributor-Contractors National Association; Gypsum Drywall Contractors International, and the Glazing Contractors Labor Jurisdiction Committee.

The 10 amendments call for:

- Enlarging the board from four to eight members, plus an impartial chairman.
- Selection of members from four key areas of the industry: industrial, commercial, residential, and heavy and highway construction.
- Eligibility for membership on the appeals board to conform to requirements for membership on the Joint Board.
- Disputes to be investigated for previous actions, with decisions to be based on established trade practice and prevailing practice in the locality.
- Consideration of consumer interests in the settlements.
- Authorization for the board chairman to call on joint committees of unions most affected by a dispute to work toward settlement. The hearing panel is also authorized to "make national jurisdictional determinations of work operations not governed by decisions or agreements of record which shall be binding on all parties."
- Action by the board on protests against "any agreement, resolution or stipulation" that attempts to establish jurisdiction deviating from the spirit and intent of the agreement.
- Agreement by the employer associations and the unions to take all action legally within their power under board procedures.
- Freedom for a contractor to pursue other methods of settlement if a work stoppage runs more than 48 hours following notification of the board.
- A prohibition on representation on the board, the appeals board or a hearing panel of a union or contractor found in noncompliance.

Signatories representing labor were Pres. C. J. Haggerty and Sec.-Treas. Frank Bonadio of BCTD. Signing for the contractors were James Swan, chairman of the PCEA, and Joseph R. LaRocca, secretary of the employers' joint negotiating committee.

No Progress Sighted In Newspaper Talks

New York—Contract talks between newspaper publishers and 10 unions inched along without visible progress as 13,000 union members continued to work without new contracts.

Contracts of all 10 unions expired Mar. 30 and were extended on a day-to-day basis. All seek substantial improvement in wages, working conditions and health, welfare and pension benefits.

Strike authorization has been voted by the Newspaper Guild at the New York Post and by the Typographical Union, ITU Mailers, Stereotypers and Newspaper Deliverers at other papers. Thomas J. Murphy, the local Guild's executive vice president, said Post Guildsmen might walk off their jobs this weekend unless specific progress is made on key contract changes.

Negotiators for the Times, Post, Daily News and Long Island Press offered wage increases that the unions said would barely equal the rise in living costs since the last negotiations in 1967. Most of the unions rejected the proposal—16.5 percent over three years—but some turned their attention to non-wage issues while waiting for a pattern to emerge.

Mediator Theodore W. Kheel said at a press conference that he and his fellow mediators are "redoubling their efforts" to get agreements without a strike on or before Apr. 11.

The other panel members are Chairman Vincent D. McDonnell of the State Mediation Board and Regional Dir. Frank H. Brown of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

Kheel said Apr. 6 that publishers and the Typographical union are "miles apart" and warned of a possible shutdown unless the gap is closed. He said ITU Local 6 is holding daily chapel meetings at the Times, and indications are that the length of the meetings on company time will be extended day by day.

The major issue between the unions and management is money, he said—the amount of the increase.

The Guild bargains separately with individual newspapers. The nine craft unions negotiate with the publishers' association. Besides those mentioned, the other craft unions are the Pressmen, Paper Handlers, Machinists, Electricians and Photoengravers.

Dental Panel to Study National Health Care

Chicago—Dir. John F. Tomayko of the Steelworkers' pension and insurance department, is part of a task force formed by the American Dental Association to study national health programs.

Representatives of labor, management, consumers and public and private agencies are on the panel to design the association's position for the participation of dentists in national health care delivery programs.

Court Vacancy Continues:

Senate Rejection of Carswell Hands New Defeat to Nixon

Republicans joined with 38 Democrats to vote down the nomination. And among the Democratic opponents were four senators from the Southern states, including two who had voted for Haynsworth.

Senate Republican Leader Hugh Scott (Pa.), who voted for the Carswell nomination even though he had been widely reported as privately unhappy about it, had some advice for the White House immediately after the vote.

"It is of the utmost importance that the next nominee be of such quality as to warrant the widest possible support," Scott said. The President, he suggested, would do well to discuss the next appointment with people representing all segments of opinion, including senators.

"The majority of the Senate is anxious to back the President," Scott stressed. He expressed the hope that the vote would "serve as a prelude to the nomination of a great Supreme Court justice and as a lesson learned for the future."

By contrast, conservative Sen. Robert Dole (R-Kan.) said he thought Nixon should hold off a new nomination until after next November's election and make the turndown of Haynsworth and Carswell a key campaign issue.

Even though southern votes helped defeat Carswell, Nixon in effect charged the Senate with sectional bias for turning down his two nominees.

"I have reluctantly concluded it is not possible to get confirmation of any man who believes in the strict construction of the Constitution as I do if they happen to come from the South," Nixon told reporters.

Carswell, a Democrat turned Republican, was appointed a federal district judge in the Eisenhower Administration and advanced to the appellate court early in the Nixon Administration—even though civil rights groups had criticized his record and opposed his promotion.

A white supremacy speech he made as a candidate for the Georgia legislature many years ago was uncovered after his nomination to the Supreme Court, but the judge renounced his earlier views after the speech came to light. He admitted—after first denying—that he was an incorporator of a golf club shifted from city to private ownership to avoid court desegregation rulings. But he insisted he wasn't aware of any segregation issue, even though witnesses testified it was common knowledge and front-page news in the community.

Nevertheless, Administration leaders remained confident they had the votes to confirm Carswell.

He had no record of financial dealings that could raise the conflict of interest issue which proved decisive against Haynsworth. And both Scott and the assistant Senate Republican leader, Robert P. Griffin (Mich.), early in the game pledged their votes for confirmation.

As one unhappy Republican senator was quoted as saying in explaining why he felt obliged to support Carswell, "How can you fight a president of your own party twice in a row on a nomination?"

But there was a third group to be heard from—the nation's lawyers and especially the deans and faculties of the biggest, most prestigious law schools in the country.

The American Bar Association's judiciary committee had given a perfunctory "qualified" rating to Carswell. But leading lawyers, many of them Republicans, expressed their unhappiness in public statements and letters to the editors.

A committee of lawyers circulated a statement of opposition to Carswell, based on the record of reversals of his rulings as a judge and the study of his decisions. Deans of 23 law schools were among the 400 legal authorities who signed the statement charging that Carswell lacks "the legal or mental qualifications essential for service on the Supreme Court."

It was, ironically, a staunch Carswell supporter who helped swing public opinion strongly against confirmation.

Irked at complaints that Carswell was mediocre, Sen. Roman H. Hruska (R-Neb.) said in mid-March: "Even if he was mediocre, there are a lot of mediocre judges and people and lawyers. They are entitled to a little representation, aren't they, and a little chance? We can't have all Brandeises and Cardozos and Frankfurters and stuff like that there."

Many a senator quickly heard from outraged constituents that they didn't think much of Mr. Hruska's point of view. By the time Hruska tried to explain that he didn't really mean what he had said, the damage was done.

The vote count against Carswell continued to climb slowly. By mid-March, Scott conceded that "more than 30 senators" would vote against the nomination but he and the White House remained confident it would pass with votes to spare.

It was Sen. Edward W. Brooke, the moderate Republican from Massachusetts and the Senate's only Negro member, who took on the task of rounding up the dozen votes from the Republican side that anti-Carswell strategists were convinced were essential to defeat the nomination.

It couldn't be done, Republican leaders assured the White House. But when the roll was called, the senators who had privately told Brooke they would vote against confirmation kept their pledges.

A strategic move to send the nomination back to the Judiciary Committee failed, and at the same time succeeded.

Recommittal Idea

The original idea was that some senators who might be unwilling to vote against confirmation would support recommittal on the argument that new issues and charges had been raised since the Judiciary Committee had concluded its hearings. Two southern senators who had supported Haynsworth—J. W. Fulbright (D-Ark.) and William B. Spong, Jr. (D-Va.)—said they would vote for recommittal even though they hadn't decided how they would vote on confirmation. Both subsequently voted against confirmation.

But several senators opposed to Carswell and others who were still carried as undecided argued that recommittal would be ducking the issue and evading the Senate's responsibility.

The recommittal move failed, 52-44, and there was rejoicing at the White House. Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.), floor leader of the anti-Carswell bloc, said he thought there was still hope of defeating confirmation. But knowing the pressures that the White House can bring to bear to switch a key vote or two, no one could count with certainty the votes for rejection. And in case of a tie, Vice Pres. Spiro Agnew was prepared to vote for confirmation.

Long before the rollcall began, at 1 p.m. on Apr. 8, every inch of seats and standing room in the Senate galleries had been taken.

Twelve minutes later, the tally was completed. And Agnew, as he had done last October on the Haynsworth vote, announced in his capacity as presiding officer of the Senate that "the nomination is not agreed to."

At that the galleries burst into cheers and shouts, continuing despite the pounding of the gavel.

The Senate had voted its conscience—and it was a popular verdict.

FEMININE TOUCH of Candy Martin, first woman member of Operating Engineers Local 4E, is added to the man's world of a construction site in Boston where a 60-story office building is being erected. Walter Ryan, business manager of the local, watches Miss Martin take a reading on a level.

Roll Call Vote in Senate On Carswell Nomination

The Senate on Apr. 8 voted 51-45 to reject the nomination of G. Harrold Carswell to be a justice of the Supreme Court.

Labor strongly supported the position of the 38 Democrats and 13 Republicans who voted against confirmation. Voting for confirmation of Carswell were 28 Republicans and 17 Democrats.

New Meat Cutters' Pact Anticipates Living Costs

union negotiators said, is that it anticipates normal changes in living costs in advance and also permits subsequent adjustments if they become necessary to keep wages in line with market basket prices of consumer commodities.

Swift was the last big packer to accept this the pay-in-advance formula when it was introduced at Armour & Co. in 1967.

This year Swift management was more responsive to the union's approach and finally offered acceptable terms after nearly two months of exploratory talks by packinghouse department leaders.

The final company offer includes:

- Wage increases of 82 cents an hour effective as follows: 32 cents an hour as of Apr. 6, another 25 cents on Sept. 6, 1971, and a final 25 cents on Sept. 4, 1972.
- Cost-of-living reviews on Sept. 1, 1971, Sept. 1, 1972, and Aug. 1, 1973.
- An additional increase of 5 to 10 cents an hour for mechanical trades employes.

Wages of plant laborers will be raised to $3.90 an hour by the first-step increase and to nearly $4.50 by the final stage. Other classifications will be raised above those figures, said members of the negotiating committee headed by union Vice Pres. Glen Snyder and Packinghouse Dept. Co-director Jesse Prosten.

The contract also provides that in 1971 employes will receive two weeks vacation after two years of service instead of after three years as in the expiring contract.

Pension benefits will be raised from $5 a month to $6 for each year of credited service after Jan. 1, 1971, and to $6.50 a month the following year.

The present $300 maximum surgical schedule will rise to $500 as of Apr. 1, 1970, and other improvements in the hospital-medical-surgical plan are provided.

Several wage and benefit adjustments were negotiated for local unions in the South and Southwest.

The Meat Cutters and the Packinghouse Workers, since merged established what they called landmark agreements with U.S. packers in 1967. The contracts grew out of labor and management discussions under a joint Automation Committee arrangement. The talks led to contracts that endeavored to meet the needs of workers in an industry troubled by widespread automation and frequent job losses caused by plant closings. These are the contracts now due to expired.

SCME Wins Election in D.C. Suburb

Fairfax, Va.—The State, County & Municipal Employes won representation rights for nearly 1,900 blue collar workers employed by Fairfax County in an election conducted by the American Arbitration Association. The vote was 1,151 for SCME, 434 against.

The union began an organizing drive about a year ago. On the basis of signed membership applications, it won the consent of the county executive and the school board to a secret-ballot election. The next step, SCME said, is to submit contract proposals and prepare to bargain collectively with the government employer.

The new union represents maintenance, custodial and skilled trades employes of the suburban Washington county, its water and sanitation departments and its public school system.

What's Good for Uncle Sam

THE HISTORIC SIGNIFICANCE of the agreement between seven postal unions and the Post Office Dept. to establish a system of collective bargaining covering all phases of employment and wages and working conditions has been brushed aside by the mass media with their usual instinct to pass up substance for style.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said it loud and clear before a jammed press conference complete with television cameras, noting that the agreement provides for bargaining on every aspect that now "prevails in the private sector." He stressed:

"I think that this in itself is a tremendously significant forward step in the history of labor relations in this country. I think that this will not be lost on the people whose job it is to deal with public employes at the state, county and city level.

"I think this means that the federal government is taking the lead in solving this question of representation for public employes, and they're resolving it by the method we know best—collective bargaining. I think this is a very significant advance."

It is perhaps understandable that the announcement of a settlement and wage increase formulas would dominate the breaking stories. But what is involved is a breakthrough, a new benchmark in labor relations, a story not moving through the information channels.

OF COURSE, this is an old situation. In 1962 when Pres. John F. Kennedy announced an executive order to govern labor-management relations in the federal government, an order which in effect said to millions of government workers "it's okay to join a union," the media missed the story for months. One day they awoke to the fact that a nationwide election was being conducted among postal workers to determine which union, if any, they wanted to represent them.

Prior to the Kennedy order, labor relations in the federal government were confused, chaotic, almost non-existent and dominated by a combination of political patronage and a tangle of civil service regulations.

The Executive Order brought new strength and recognition to government unions—not only in the federal area but at the state and local level. But it was limited and soon in need of revision. A series of generally sound revisions was issued by Pres. Nixon earlier this year in a new Executive Order and the federal unions were studying the new regulations when the postal dispute broke wide open.

The historic agreement of April 2, 1970, when enacted into law, will set up a true and complete system of collective bargaining that is likely to have a widespread effect on other government agencies.

The 1962 executive order and its updated 1970 version may in due time be replaced by agreements in all or many agencies. For the postal agreement paves the way for millions of federal workers not only to join a union, but to bargain collectively with their employer on all issues.

And what's good enough for Uncle Sam ought to be good enough for every state, county and city.

A Word Edgewise:

Resources, Not Local Control, Termed Key to Better Schools

By John P. Roche

IF THE STOCK MARKET behaves in obscure ways, the eccentricities of the book market defy rational description. It has been surprising, for example, that Dean Acheson's "Present at the Creation" has stayed up on the best-seller list. It is a fascinating book, but hardly light reading like its neighbor, "The Peter Principle." On the other hand, books that are supposed to be guaranteed merchandise fall flat and clutter up the remainder stocks for years.

Unfortunately every year some first-rate volumes fall through the slats. They don't seem to get reviewed, picked up, talked about; they don't seem to make anybody's list.

Therefore, I would like to say a few words about two fine volumes that came out last year and merit a broad audience: Robert Bendiner's "The Politics of Schools" (Harper & Row) and Arnold C. Brackman's "The Communist Collapse in Indonesia" (Norton).

Both books labor under the same handicap: they appear on the surface to be extremely specific, rather scholarly studies. In fact, while each deals with a quite narrow topic, they provide broad insight into two major contemporary problems: the American school systems, and the Communist role in Southeast Asia.

Bendiner set out on a two-year grant from the Carnegie Corp. to explore the organization of American public education, both primary and secondary. His focus is that omnipresent entity—the school board. His findings, presented in a witty, urbane style, will depress just about all the true believers. (He suggests, for instance, that the school board selection system is substantively irrelevant: the same kind of people get elected as get appointed.)

His observations about the "anarchy of localism" will infuriate the upper-class constituents of Scarsdale and the passionate black advocates of "community control."

The problem with Bendiner is that he concentrates on education, not group therapy. He wants to improve the schools, not convert them into psychiatric wards.

From this point of view, decentralization is preposterous. Wealthy communities teach college courses in high school; poor communities are mired in the vicious circle of inadequate teaching for those who most need exceptional pedagogy.

As usual, the key problem is the allocation of resources. Bendiner believes that the existing structure is incompetent, that the federal government will not significantly move in, and that the best immediate hope is regional administration such as that pioneered in Nashville, Tenn. His analysis is worth careful scrutiny and extended debate.

Brackman has turned in a masterly case-study of the rise and fall of the Communist Party of Indonesia (PKI) in the last decade. A year or more ago it was suggested in this column that the Indonesian turn-around in 1965-66 was the most significant event in Asia since the fall of mainland China to the Communists.

Brackman shares this opinion and has done a model microanalysis of the failure of the Communist coup, the implications of this failure, and the relationship between the American decision to intervene in force in Viet Nam and even in Indonesia.

BRACKMAN DOES NOT line up flatly with those (myself included) who believe there was a direct connection between Viet Nam and Indonesia, but by the time he finishes examining the indirect connections, I think he comes out at about the same place. However, agree or disagree, it is a pleasure to read such a clear yet sophisticated analysis by an author who doesn't believe anybody's press releases.

And at a time when all we seem to hear about are alleged American "blunders," it is reassuring to read this chronicle of Communist incompetence and realize that the opposition is not 10 feet tall.

Finally, as one who opposed the American policy of appeasing Sukarno in the early '60s, I wish Brackman had spent a little more time on our own incompetence. There may be a lesson for the Middle East hidden in that sad tale.

TUC's Big Umbrella Plan:

British Unions Weigh Merger To Unite 2 Million Members

The following is excerpted from the March 1970 issue of the AFL-CIO Free Trade Union News published by the Dept. of International Affairs. The article, titled "Biggest Union Merger Moves Ahead in Britain," is by Hugh Chevins.

BRITAIN may soon have the largest and most powerful single trade union in the free world. If moves, now in progress, reach their goal, one body of craft, industrial and general organizations with a combined membership of nearly 2 million workers, will come into existence.

Skilled, semi-skilled and unskilled manual workers as well as white collar workers in 200 industries, would be enrolled under one labor umbrella. Among the industries likely to be covered are those of gas and electric power and water supply.

The National Union of General & Municipal Workers, with more than 800,000 members, led by Lord Cooper, the general secretary, is in the van of the project. So far, Lord Cooper has approached the Electrical, Electronics & Telecommunications Trades Union, Plumbing Trades Union (400,000 members), the Union of Shop, Distributive & Allied Workers (310,000), the National Union of Public Employes (300,000), the Clerical & Administrative Workers Union (86,000), the National Society of Metal Mechanics (45,000), the Chemical Workers Union (16,000), and the Union of Water Works Employes (4,000).

The talks, aimed at a merger with the EETU-PTU, called for brevity by its members the Flash and Flush Union, are the most advanced. Meanwhile the General & Municipal Workers' members have given their leaders the go-ahead.

In the case of the other unions, the General and Municipal Workers plan to try first to secure some form of closer working arrangements or what is known in Britain as "a transfer of engagements."

The GMW policy is of course in line with proposals made by the Trades Union Congress, under George Woodcock, the then general secretary, as long ago as 1962, when that year's congress agreed unanimously: "It is time the British trade union movement adapted its structure to modern conditions."

Since then, in nearly eight years, largely through mergers, the number of unions affiliated with the TUC has dropped from 182 to 155, in spite of 13 new affiliations. The original 182 unions have become 142, a drop of 22 percent. In addition, several non-affiliated unions have merged with TUC unions.

Many more mergers are under discussion. But progress is not fast enough, in the view of many responsible union leaders.

The free and democratic character of the unions itself creates obstacles. They are all autonomous bodies and the TUC cannot order them about. Every step must be taken by persuasion and consent. They argue over the respective merits of craft unionism, industrial unionism and general unionism. All the unions fall into one or other of these categories, and they find it hard to sacrifice any of their own cherished characters and traditions.

And, of course, officials have vested interests in the posts they already occupy. Amalgamation could, and probably would, mean changes in many cases in their ranking, if not pay.

When Lord Cooper reported recently to a special congress of his union on the progress of merger talks and took the delegates into his confidence, he had to answer many pertinent questions about the future. He seemed to satisfy those avid for more information and assurances. At any rate, he was unanimously given the go-ahead.

These are the kinds of questions which were posed: Would the regional structure of the union—the GMW is divided into 10 regions with considerable independence and powers—be destroyed? Were they taking over bankrupt unions? Would women, of whom the GMW has more than 200,000 in membership, become poor relatives? Would the interests of the large staff be damaged?

Lord Cooper's replies to all the questions were a series of emphatic "No's" and so the merger talks will proceed. And so they should.

THERE IS CURRENTLY far too much overlapping and duplication of union work, and only about half of Britain's male workers and one quarter of female workers are enrolled in unions. With mergers, unions' activities in the provision of new services for members, national policy-making, research, education, modern techniques in collective bargaining and especially in recruitment could be greatly intensified and improved.

At least on paper, there is recognition of the need for change. In addition to the talks started by the GMW, more than 40 unions have told the TUC that they are already engaged in moves towards amalgamation or closer working.

With this encouraging information in mind, the TUC general council has further stimulated and encouraged persistence in merger attempts. They have been helped by legislation which the government has put through at the instigation of the TUC, making legal requirements in union mergers easier. The big unions themselves have changed their structures and rules to make amalgamations less difficult.

A year or two ago, the big three unions established joint committees to draft schemes aimed at reaching identical members' dues, benefits and rules, joint presentation of pay and conditions claims, cooperation in research and education and a hundred and one other large and small advances. The GMW went so far as to tell the Royal Commission on Trade Unions & Employers' Associations that when they began the talks on closer working they had the possibility of ultimate amalgamation in mind.

But the joint committees seem to have made little progress towards closer working, let alone amalgamation. So the GMW is going ahead with its plans for mergers with other unions.

Whether the engineers and the transport workers, with a combined membership of nearly 3 million, will now move from the realms of kindred ideologies to a more formal and practical trade union link-up is a question which is arousing speculation among the British working class. To many, the prospect of the creation of such a colossal organization is frightening.

White House Support Sought:

Consumer Protection Pressed For Insurance Policyholders

WITH A STRONGER push from the White House, needed consumer protection could win congressional approval this year, the legislative representative for the Ladies' Garment Workers declared.

Creation of a Federal Insurance Guarantee Corp., fair credit reporting and establishment of an independent consumer agency are among the key issues that could be acted upon this year, "if the President were of a mind to push," said Evelyn Dubrow, as she appeared on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference.

Miss Dubrow stressed the growing need to protect insurance policyholders when insurance companies go broke. "Something like 135 property casualty insurance companies become insolvent every year," she said.

As a result, she noted more than a million consumers lose some $260 million in unpaid claims, unearned premiums, and assessments to pay claims against bankrupt insurance companies.

She explained that the Federal Insurance Guarantee Corp. proposed by Sen. Warren Magnuson (D-Wash.) would protect policyholders in much the same way that the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. now protects individual bank deposits.

MISS DUBROW said the FIGC would also help stem the "insurance blackout in the ghettos," which now makes it difficult, if not impossible, for residents of such areas to obtain the insurance protection they need.

The union lobbyist also made a strong plea for a federal law under which appliance warranties and guarantees can be enforced against the manufacturers who issue them.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

NEW FEDERALISM has become a favorite slogan of the Nixon Administration. The President has made a great point of using the phrase as a way of satisfying a great many "states righters" and without scaring off too many people who know that almost all of the problems that beset the country are national in scope.

Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz has made a valiant effort to bridge the gap between what he calls a "national sense" of how problems should be solved with a redistilling "of self-reliance on the part of individuals and strengthening the institutions of local and state governments and voluntary agencies."

In less complicated terms, the "New Federalism" has largely meant a broad and frequently vague statement of federal policy combined with the delegation of actual power and enforcement back to the states. This, of course, fits in perfectly with the Administration's "southern strategy."

Take any number of measures supported by the President.

● Sec. Shultz has cited the Nixon welfare proposals as an example of how the Administration would combine a "national sense of fairness" with encouragement to localities and states "to make their own decisions on the degree to which they want to help the less fortunate."

Critics, of course, point out that while the words "national fairness," may sound convincing, the hard fact is that state decisions simply mean that many states, notably in the South, will set their welfare standards as they have in the past, in line with their own prejudices and concepts of what is right and what is wrong.

THE RESULT will be a continuation of the grossly distorted scale of benefits that mark today's welfare program. Organized labor has repeatedly called for a federal welfare program that will wipe out state and local discrepancies.

● Revenue sharing: This has been one of the Administration's pet solutions for the difficulties of the states in raising adequate revenues for state services. Under the Nixon proposals federal revenues would be shared with state and local communities starting at a $500 million level and growing to $5 billion five years later. There would be virtually no federal control over the use to which these funds coud be put.

Skeptics see this as another example of acceptance of "states rights" to the point where nationally-collected revenues could be used by the states to cut their own taxes or to benefit special interests rather than the general welfare. Here again organized labor has strongly opposed giving states and local communities a free hand to dispense federal funds the way they want to.

● Civil Rights: Pres. Nixon had spoken of his determination to assure minority citizens of their rights. Yet, accompanying this high national purpose has been a whole series of actions that have fit neatly into "states rights" and the "southern strategy."

The Nixon maneuvering on extension of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 is an example of how a federal law designed to assure Negroes in the South of their voting rights can be manipulated to weaken those rights on the state level. Liberals have charged the Administration with seeking to sabotage the 1965 law in Congress.

Aid to education, meat inspection, health and safety legislation—all these areas have found the Administration speaking in federal terms yet bowing to "states rights" concepts. The President himself, has made no bones about what he really feels about his "fear of centralized domination," a fear that fits in conveniently with Republican conservatism and southern states rights.

Shultz, in a recent speech before a management conference at the University of Chicago summed up the philosophy as representing: "National fairness, local diversity."

The very words contain within themselves the contradictions that must inevitably be produced when national interest and need come into direct conflict with local prejudices the moment that economic and social interests clash.

NEEDED CONSUMER protections could win congressional approval this year if the White House would push harder for them, Legislative Rep. Evelyn Dubrow of the Ladies' Garment Workers, center, declared on Labor News Conference. Questioning her were Murray Seeger of the Los Angeles Times and Ruth Jordan of Press Associates, Inc. The AFL-CIO produced interview is aired Tuesdays on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

MENTAL ILLNESS affecting the younger people of the country will be examined in a television documentary on the NBC network Apr. 25. Here, a psychologist at Napa State Mental Hospital of California counsels two patients during the filming of the special program "Cry Help: An NBC White Paper on Mentally Disturbed Youth." The program will help mark the opening of Mental Health Month, observed annually in May.

Court Calls on NLRB To Stiffen Its Penalties

terms" of the consent agreement they had entered into with the union only 13 days before the election, to abide by the decision of the NLRB regional director.

The court, with Judge George E. MacKinnon concurring in part and dissenting in part, ordered the board to decide whether the extra remedies sought by the union are justified, and if not, to suggest alternate remedies so the employer cannot profit from his illegal conduct.

IUE Pres. Paul Jennings called the decision "a complete vindication of the concept of collective bargaining." It means, he said, that "no longer will anti-union employers enjoy the luxury" of profiting while breaking the law. He described the ruling as "a basic protection to workers who are fighting for their rights."

The IUE began organizing the Dayton firm in July 1967. The company consented to an election and the union won, 19-6, on Sept. 14, 1967. The next day, the court noted, the company began a series of temporary and permanent layoffs.

Production quotas of certain employes were increased, to a degree that one employe called "impossible" to reach. The IUE filed charges and the board upheld them, but failed to act on the union's request for special remedies. These called for pay raises and cost-of-living increases lost because of the employer's foot-dragging, reimbursement for dues and initiation fees it would have collected had the employer bargained in good faith and reached agreement, and relief in such areas as additional organizing costs.

The company's refusal to bargain, the appeals judges concluded, was a "clear and flagrant violation of the law" and its objections to the election it previously agreed to were "patently frivolous."

The judges affirmed the board's order that Tiidee must bargain with the union and revoke its layoffs, discharges and changes in production quotas. But they questioned the board's failure to use its powers more fully. They said "the board has not, on the record before us, provided a satisfactory justification for its order."

The "affirmative action" clause of the labor law, they said, is not a "mere charter of authority that the board has the option to exercise or ignore." It is, as the Supreme Court recently stated, a "broad command."

Effective redress for a broken law, they reasoned, should compensate the party wronged and withhold from the wrongdoer the fruits of its violation.

Judge Leventhal wrote: "Simply put, the present posture of the board encourages frivolous litigation not only before the board, but in the courts." He concluded:

"Damages can be awarded" by estimating the contract terms "that would have been in effect if the law had been complied with, even though the law-violating employer has not yet entered into a contract" with a union.

Action Urged On Fire Safety Commission

Pres. Nixon has been urged by the AFL-CIO to implement a 1968 law by appointing a 20-member commission to seek more effective fire prevention and control methods.

Federation Pres. George Meany, in a letter to Nixon, pointed out that the National Commission on Fire Prevention & Control and funds to finance it were authorized in the Fire Research & Safety Act of 1968.

Much of the impetus for passage of the law was provided by the federation and the Fire Fighters. Its objective is to reduce the mounting toll of deaths, injuries and property loss from fires.

The President, however, has not as yet named the commission, and Senate and House Appropriation Committees have refused to provide any of the $5 million authorized by the law until he does so.

"Meantime," Meany emphasized, "the loss of life and property from fire continues to rise while our knowledge and action in its control seems anything but preventative."

In urging the President to give the commission life, Meany said he was appealing on behalf of all AFL-CIO members "and especially the fire fighters of this nation who have their lives at stake on improved fire prevention."

"With this commission," Meany concluded "you can begin to insure that all Americans are receiving the maximum in fire prevention and control."

Conglomerate Opposed On Takeover Bid

Strong opposition to the proposed acquisition of the Fafnir Bearing Co. by the Textron conglomerate was voiced by Pres. I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers.

In a letter to the Federal Trade Commission, Abel noted that a proposed consent settlement involved the divestiture by Textron of the Parkersburg-Aetna Corp. of Chicago to clear the way for retention of the much larger Fafnir company which manufactures the same products.

"This move," Abel said, "is so inadequate as to constitute a cruel hoax upon the public."

Fafnir Bearing Co. is located in New Britain, Conn., while Textron has its corporate headquarters in Providence, R.I.

Abel further charged that the proposed consent settlement would constitute "an unhappy precedent" for another case pending before the FTC involving the merger of the Kennecott Copper Corp. and the Peabody Coal Corp.

Abel had previously protested the merger of the copper and coal companies noting that if "conglomerate merging of large corporations" results in "substantive change in the corporate system, it may well be that our labor policy will have to be revised."

"Questions involving industry-wide, company-wide, or even coalition bargaining, pale into insignificance in the face of conglomerate bargaining," he added.

"The proposed settlement in Textron-Fafnir would be an unmitigated disaster for the public, competition, and the integrity and reputation of the Commission," Abel wrote.

First Pact Covers Airline Instructors

Chicago—The first contract between the Air Line Employes and Eastern Airlines covering ground school instructors provides a top salary of $16,620 in the final year of a three-year agreement.

ALEA Pres. Victor J. Herbert said pay of $1,385 a month for the instructors "matches the degree of professionalism required to do the job." The group, which joined the union last July, also will get severance pay and improved pension and vacation programs.

ALEA represents 10,000 station agents, ticket and reservation agents and clerical employes of 10 airlines. It is a wing of the Air Line Pilots.

Pledges Drive for Rights:

Hemisphere Labor Hits Dictatorships

Cuernavaca, Mexico—Strong condemnations of Cuba's Communist regime and Latin America's totalitarian governments were voiced here by labor leaders throughout the Western Hemisphere.

The occasion was the seventh Continental Congress of ORIT (the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers), attended by 178 delegates and observers from affiliates in 27 nations.

Also attending were representatives of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and six international trade secretariats as well as visitors from European countries.

The delegates adopted a number of resolutions attacking Cuba's violations of the sovereignty of Latin American nations through its training and arming of Communist guerrillas for the avowed purpose of overthrowing governments.

A key action called upon peoples and governments of the Americas to maintain "democratic solidarity" in keeping Cuba out of the Organization of American States until there is a change in its government.

This change, the congress emphasized, must include "permission for workers to join free unions, suspension of executions and grants of freedom to hundreds of thousands of democratic leaders and workers that the Communist police keep in jails."

The congress condemned military governments that have established themselves in Latin America with no evidence of popular support and it pledged ORIT to determined efforts to bring democracy to the affected countries.

These regimes that "negate fundamental human rights" also have created political and economic instability, insecurity, unemployment and grave social crises—all to the detriment of labor, it said.

Other resolutions appealed for increased organizing activities by unions in the hemisphere, studies directed toward standardizing social security programs in Latin America, and closer cooperation between trade secretariats and ORIT.

The congress was officially opened at the Mexican Confederation of Labor's auditorium in Mexico City, where it was addressed by Pres. Gustavo Diaz Ordaz, and then moved to ORIT's Labor College here.

In his opening address, Diaz called upon ORIT "to be an instrument of social justice in Latin America through the solidarity of workers throughout the continent."

ORIT Sec.-Gen. Arturo Jauregui presented a gold medallion to Diaz bearing the inscription "Homage to President Diaz Ordaz from the Democratic Trade Union Movement, presented by ORIT."

Jauregui recalled the Mexican president's expressions and actions demonstrating "cooperation with and enthusiasm for" labor. Diaz has led his country to "first place among the Western nations in the effort toward social justice," Jauregui said.

The AFL-CIO was represented at the congress by Presidents Herman D. Kenin of the Musicians, Thomas W. Gleason of the Longshoremen and C. L. Dennis of the Railway & Airline Clerks; AFL-CIO Inter-American Rep. Andrew C. McLellan and Michael Boggs of the AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs; Joaquin F. Otero, director of international affairs for BRAC, and John C. Hall, Jr., a representative of the Theatrical Stage Employes.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers were elected titular members of ORIT's executive council. James A. Suffridge, president emeritus of the Retail Clerks, and McLellan were elected substitutes for Meany; and Dennis and Kenin were named substitutes for Beirne.

Canadian Unions Warn Of Recession Danger

Ottawa—The Canadian government's anti-inflation policies are increasing already high unemployment without curbing inflation, the Canadian Labor Congress charged here.

If these policies are continued, Canada is headed for a serious recession, CLC Pres. Donald MacDonald warned in labor's annual presentation to the government.

MacDonald made the presentation to Prime Minister Trudeau and most of his Cabinet members in a meeting room in Parliament filled to overflowing with trade unionists. The CLC president was accompanied by Executive Vice Pres. Joe Morris and Sec.-Treas. William Dodge.

The CLC attacked the Liberal Administration's tight money controls and attempts at securing voluntary wage restraint as "the wrong policies in the wrong place at the wrong time."

It noted that the latest figures show that 565,000 Canadians—or 6.5 percent of the labor force—are unemployed. This is the nation's highest unemployment in six years.

The government's Prices & Incomes Commission, the CLC declared, failed to meet its responsibility "to discover the facts, analyze the causes of inflation and inform the public and the government on how price stability might be achieved."

Instead, the report continued, it jumped to conclusions about inflation without a full investigation and attempted to impose voluntary wage and price controls.

MacDonald said voluntary restraints are ineffective and inequitable because they cannot be applied to all forms of income. What is needed, he said, are policies to free and stimulate the economy.

As for the high interest rate policies of the government and the Bank of Canada, MacDonald asserted, these only result in hardships for families, small businessmen and economically underdeveloped areas.

Canada's labor movement will continue to press for better living standards and bargaining agreements that boost wages, MacDonald declared.

In other areas, the presentation:

- Called for lifting the two percent per year limit on the cost-of-living escalator for old age pensions and for a guaranteed income for all.
- Charged that reports from the Corporations & Labor Returns Act are providing misleading and false information on unions that is being used by special interest groups to attack labor.

Nixon Plan Enacted:

Railroad Settlement Imposed on Unions

This is how the wage package breaks down:

All workers will get increases of 2 percent retroactive to Jan. 1, 1969; 3 percent retroactive to last July 1; and 10 cents an hour retroactive to last Sept. 1.

Journeymen will get an added 5 cents an hour retroactive to last July 1 and 7 cents retroactive to Feb. 19, 1970. This 7 cents was to have been effective when the contract was ratified. Nixon would have made it effective only when he signed the bill but a Senate amendment provided some retroactivity.

For 1970, all shopmen represented by the unions will get a 5 percent increase retroactive to Jan. 1, 4 cents an hour retroactive to Apr. 1 and another 4 cents on Aug. 1.

The settlement also provides for doubletime rates for shopmen for the seventh consecutive day worked, strengthening of the required 16-hour notice of reduction in force, and the controversial rule on crossing craft jurisdictional lines.

This says that "incidental" work at repair-work locations not designated as outlying points may be performed by workers from other crafts. "Incidental" is defined as not being a preponderant part of the total work involved in an assignment.

Under the settlement, a two-year moratorium will be applied to a 1964 agreement between the unions and the railroads on contracting out work, provided that the issue is settled in negotiations underway on the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad.

In the dispute, going back to the fall of 1968, the unions sought a 10 percent general increase and a separate boost of 20 cents an hour for skilled workers. The carriers offered only a 5 percent general pay raise and demanded numerous new restrictions on rules.

After attempts at mediation failed, the unions set a strike last Oct. 4 against seven railroads "to avoid a national emergency." The carriers retaliated by threatening to shut down all railroads.

A presidential emergency board delayed any strike or lockout for 60 days. It recommended a 5 percent general increase and 20 cents more for "more skilled" employes. Its skill definition would have applied to only about 25 percent of the workers.

After the December tentative pact fell through, the unions agreed to refrain from any strike—even though they were legally free to take such action—for more than a month.

In February, Judge John J. Sirica of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia restrained the unions from striking one railroad, the Union Pacific, and the managements from carrying out another threatened lockout on all railroads.

Judge Howard F. Corcoran of the same court extended the restraining order against the unions into an injunction but dropped any restraint on the carriers. The unions then declared that this "tortured logic" forced them to call a nationwide strike, and set it for Mar. 5.

At that point, Nixon sent his plan to Congress. The Senate Labor and House Commerce Committees held hearings, but instead of accepting the plan, they reported out the "moratorium" resolution. It was rushed through Congress and signed by Nixon.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany voiced the federation's opposition to the President's plan on grounds it was compulsion—forcing employes "to work under conditions which are not acceptable to them."

During the mortatorium period, further talks failed to settle the dispute. Vice Pres. William Winpisinger of the Machinists and Vice Pres. J. W. O'Brien of the Sheet Metal Workers both charged that railroad managements were unbending to all offers.

Finally, as the expiration date for the moratorium neared, both the Senate Labor and House Commerce Committees approved the Nixon proposal, both chambers passed it and the President signed it.

15% Hike Voted In Benefits For Rail Retirees

Legislation to provide a 15 percent increase in railroad retirement benefits and broaden the investing power of the railroad retirement account has passed the House, 379-0.

The measure, with benefit increases retroactive to Jan. 1, 1970, now goes to the Senate where railroad unions and the AFL-CIO are seeking quick approval.

For a railroad retirement beneficiary also receiving social security benefits, the 15 percent boost will be reduced by the amount of social security increase he received Jan. 1 under legislation passed by Congress last year.

The bill provides, however, that the offset will leave at least a $10-a-month railroad retirement increase in the case of employe annuities and $5 for spouses and survivors.

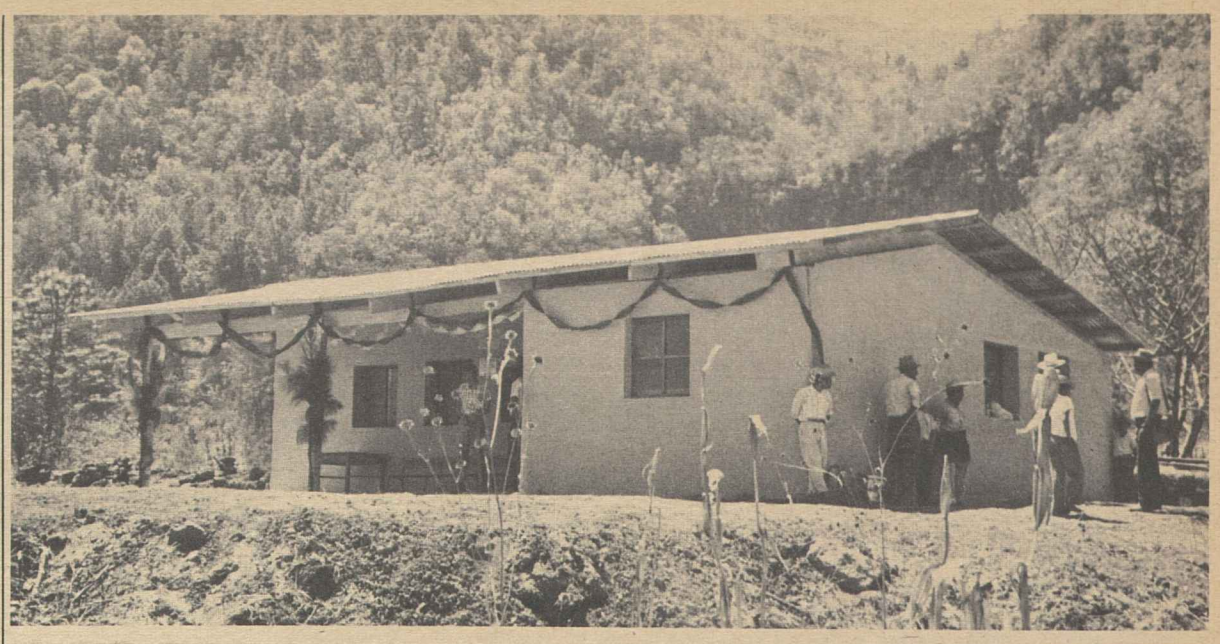
The bill contains a change in the method of investment of funds in the railroad retirement account by requiring the Treasury Dept. to reinvest such funds and sell low-interest obligations held by the account.

This reinvestment procedure, which would bring in a greater rate of interest on railroad retirement funds than is currently paid, was opposed by the Treasury Dept. because it feared setting a precedent for other trust funds it holds.



The bill also authorizes an overall study of the railroad retirement system and a report to Congress one year prior to June 30, 1972, the date of expiration of the benefit increase and the investment modification.

Shultz Fills Two Wage-Hour Posts

Labor Sec. George P. Shultz named two new directors in the department's Wage & Hour Division—Francis W. McGowan, first head of the division of equal pay and employment standards division, and James O. Hall, division of government contracts.

McGowan will be responsible for drawing up regulations and enforcing the child labor, equal pay and age discrimination laws. Hall will be in charge of administrative and enforcement policies under the public contracts, service contracts and Davis-Bacon government contracts laws.

McGowan has served with the Wage & Hour Division for 14 years, and Hall since 1941. Hall's work in wage-hour enforcement won him a "notable career" award in 1968.

NEW TWO-ROOM SCHOOL opens its doors at Caserio Estancita, Guatemala, as a part of an AFL-CIO and CARE program to increase sorely-needed classroom space in the country. This is the fifth school dedicated in Guatemala to the federation because of its CARE contributions. Several pupils, lower photo, finger a CARE package with the help of somebody's younger sister.

Labor's Support Spurs Program Of Bringing Culture to People

Making culture more democratic—accessible to all Americans—is the concern of many quarters of society. And the labor movement has the ability to further enhance this drive, writes Peter Spackman in the March issue of the American Federationist.

"When the labor movement, particularly local unions, works closely with the branches of the arts councils movement in states and communities, both are strengthened," Spackman observes.

At the national level, the two movements have shared a common goal in backing federal efforts for public support of leading cultural organizations and for innovative programs, he notes.

His article in the AFL-CIO's monthly magazine points out that organized labor has long been a supporter of national legislation for the advancement of the arts.

The tone was set by Samuel Gompers, who in 1896 said, "Leisure cultivates tastes for art, music, concerts, operas, the theater. . . . To continually raise the standards of life of the worker is in the highest degree sound economy."

The ability of man to reach out for the more beautiful things in life may contribute to his achieving other goals, declares Spackman, who is editor of Cultural Affairs, the magazine of the Associated Councils of the Arts.

He quotes Pres. Herman D. Kenin of the Musicians: "I believe there will be no end to material poverty until there is an end to spiritual poverty. . . . We will not clear and cleanse our congested, filthy slum cities until we have corrected the astigmatism that prevents so many from seeing and understanding the values of color and light and form."

The nation will never remove prejudice and injustice until more minds are opened to books, more eyes to the theater and dance and more ears to music, Kenin stresses.

Spackman says that the arts are in a similar position to that of education, where tuition pays only a portion of the real cost of educating a student.

The cost of the arts is continually rising. Yet artists are far from being overpaid, despite the highly publicized salaries of star performers. A professional dancer, Spackman reports, earns less than a stenographer, and a typical symphony musician is paid less than the average school teacher.

During the last 25 years, wages of professional performers increased an average of only 2.5 times, he points out, while teachers' salaries and manufacturing wages rose four times—or 70 percent faster.

A step toward correcting this situation came when Pres. Johnson in 1965 signed the act establishing the National Foundation on the Arts and the Humanities.

The active instruments of the Foundation have been two endowments, one for the arts and one for the humanities.

Although Congress has never appropriated more than about half the money authorized for the program, there has been signs of improvement, Spackman notes.

Grants have been made to individual artists through the endowment. Awards of $5,000 each have gone to 119 painters and sculptors and other grants have been made to composers and choreographers.

State arts councils also have been formed, with New York, North Carolina and Missouri leading the way. Now there are more than 600 community arts councils in addition to the state groups, and the movement is mushrooming, Spackman reports.

Labor and culture can form a natural alliance, he writes. "Labor and culture are both involved in daily life; labor produces works of commerce and culture produces works of art."

Jean Beaudry Named To Key CLC Post

Ottawa—Jean Beaudry 40, of Montreal, a Steelworkers' representative since 1954, has been named an executive vice president of the Canadian Labor Congress, filling a vacancy left by the death of Gerard Rancourt in January.

The CLC executive council also appointed William C. Y. McGregor, 51, a Railway & Airline Clerks' vice president, as a CLC general vice president. He succeeds Arthur R. Gibbons who left the post to become a mediator with the federal Dept. of Labor.

Measure Goes to Conference:

Senate Pares Down Jobless Benefits Bill

House bill by deleting coverage for small establishments with fewer than four employes.

However, the Senate did add to the House bill coverage for about one-fifth of the nation's farm workers—those employed on the 2 percent of the nation's farms that have at least eight workers on the payroll for 26 weeks of the year.

Farm worker coverage was extended still further when the full Senate took up the bill.

It approved, 42-36, a labor-supported amendment by Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.) to include at least some of the nation's migratory farm workers.

This was done by categorizing as employers, for the purpose of the legislation, the crew leaders who recruit groups of migrant workers and contract with the farmers for their services. Thus migrant crews would be covered even though they might not be employed at a single farm long enough to qualify for unemployment benefits.

The extended benefit provision of the legislation, similar to the House version, would take effect when the unemployment rate is at least 4.5 percent for three consecutive months.

When that trigger is reached, the period for which workers could receive benefits would be extended 50 percent, with a minimum of 13 additional weeks and a maximum of state and extended benefits totaling 39 weeks.

Half the money for the extended benefits would come from the federal government; the other half from state unemployment compensation funds.

To help finance the program, the minimum taxable wage base for unemployment compensation payments would be raised from $3,000 to $4,200.

The national extended benefits program won't go into effect until Jan. 1, 1972, under the pending legislation. However, any state may pass legislation enabling the program to take effect earlier. The federal government would pay half the cost, as in the national program.

For a single state to put the extended benefits program into effect, the following conditions must prevail: during any 13-week period the insured unemployment rate in the state is at least 4 percent and is also at least 20 percent higher than the unemployment rate for the corresponding weeks in the previous two years.

An amendment to provide full federal financing of the extended benefits during the interim period and raise the taxable wage base to $4,800 was rejected by the Senate, 45-30.

In other congressional developments:

● The Senate voted unanimous approval of a five-year extension of the Hill-Burton Hospital Construction Act, including new authorizations for federal grants, loans, loan guarantees and interest subsidies for various types of hospital facilities.

One of its new provisions is a $20-million-a-year program of direct federal grants to construct and modernize hospital emergency rooms and provide quicker transportation of accident victims and other emergency patients.

● House action on the new Family Assistance bill was put off until the week of Apr. 13 because the House Rules Committee failed to complete hearings on the legislation in time for earlier action.

Its passage under a no-amendment rule appears assured, however, with the Administration, the AFL-CIO, liberal Democrats and House Ways & Means Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) all supporting it.

The AFL-CIO and other groups have urged the Senate to further improve the legislation, which sets a federal minimum floor under welfare benefits and permits partial assistance to the "working poor"—families headed by a wage-earner making too little to rise above the poverty level.

The only organized opposition has come from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

COMMUNITY SERVICES of the labor movement were put in focus during the annual institute of the Central Labor Rehabilitation Council of New York at the Commodore Hotel. Here, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany addresses the luncheon meeting of the institute which investigated problems of the consumer and the health goals of labor for the Seventies.

Forum Slated On Bargaining For May 18-20

The Institute of Collective Bargaining & Group Relations will hold its second annual Collective Bargaining Forum in New York City on May 18-20.

Participants will include top officials of unions, management and government, along with a prestigious group of arbitrators, attorneys, university professors and other specialists in labor relations.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland will be among the speakers, and sessions will include such mixes of viewpoints as Paul Jennings, president of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, discussing the implications of the General Electric strike with Virgil B. Day, GE's vice president for industrial relations.

Kirkland is president of the institute; Deputy Postmaster Gen. E. T. Klassen, former American Can Co. president, is chairman of the board, and Theodore W. Kheel, the nationally prominent arbitrator, is adviser to the institute.

Meany Cites Basic Right To Quality Health Care

New York—The federal government "must accept its responsibility to provide health care to all people as a right," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared here.

Fulfillment of this responsibility, Meany emphasized, can only be met through enactment of a national health insurance program now before Congress.

Meany spoke at a luncheon at the annual institute of the Community Services Committee of the New York City Central Labor Council and answered questions at a press conference.

The growing crisis in health care was the main topic before this year's institute. The meeting also stressed the need for stronger consumer protection and labor's role in advancing health services and rehabilitation.

The national health insurance bill introduced by Rep. Martha W. Griffiths (D-Mich.) has the solid support of the AFL-CIO because it closely parallels a program that labor has advocated for a number of years, Meany said at the press conference.

While welcoming growing support for national health insurance from other groups, Meany said "this is one area where labor must take the lead" in line with its efforts "to help all the people of America."

This effort by organized labor on behalf of programs that are essential to the general welfare and not just the particular intreest of unions was the main theme of Meany's address to the luncheon attended by 1,500 labor and community leaders.

"The community service work of the AFL-CIO reflects the long time policy of American labor that American workers have an obligation as citizens that even comes before their obligation to the trade union movement," Meany said.

He cited labor's programs at the community level supporting demonstration arts projects, summer camps for youths, consumer projects and counseling, aid for needy families and numerous health plans.

Meany pointed to the cooperation labor gives the American Red Cross whenever there is a major catastrophe and the many hours given by union members throughout the nation in assisting various fund drives.

In Washington and state capitals, Meany noted, labor also presses for legisaltion to benefit the entire nation—consumer protection, anti-pollution measures, minimum wage legislation and civil rights bills.

"You cannot build a society where the great mass of people are denied a share from the cornucopia of plenty," Meany asserted. "You can't build a society when several million people do not receive enough money to pay their way."

He singled out the central labor council's program of training union counselors to aid workers and their families in solving their problems as a "fine example" of labor's role in the community.

Preesntation of certificates to the 254 members of the latest graduating class in the counselor program was a highlight of the luncheon

A second luncheon speaker, New York State Attorney General Louis Lefkowitz, called for stronger consumer protection and praised unions for their efforts on behalf of consumers.

"Just as a citizen has the right to clean water and air, the right to vote and the protection of civil rights, so has the consumer the right to go to a marketplace that is free from fraud," Lefkowitz stressed.

The luncheon was chaired by Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., president of the central labor council. Michael Sampson, chairman of its Community Services Committee, presented Meany with a plaque in recognition of his strong support for community programs.

The institute presented five awards for meritorious public service. They went to Morris Iushewitz, council secretary; Sec.-Treas. Arthur Harckham of Service Employes Local 32B; Stephen C. Vladeck, a labor attorney; Dr. Samuel S. Sverdlik, director of rehabilitation medicine at St. Vincent's Hospital here; and R. Brinkley Smithers, a New York philanthropist.

Keenan Criticizes Housing Report For Reliance on Mobile Homes

Pres. Nixon's proposal that mobile homes be used to help solve the nation's housing crisis has been denounced by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan.

Keenan, chairman of the federation's Housing Committee, declared, "We cannot accept this invitation to rootless, transient living as a national goal for the American family."

The reaction came after Nixon told Congress that the housing goal it set in the 1968 Housing & Urban Development Act—26 million new units between 1968 and 1978—can only be met by including production of mobile homes.

Emphasis on the use of mobile homes ran through the annual report submitted by the President under the Housing Act. The report allowed for 4 million mobile homes in the goal of 26 million new housing units.

Nixon conceded that "there was no specific allowance for mobile home production" by Congress when it passed the law. But, he contended, mobile homes now are making a "signficant contribution" to general housing supply.

He praised them as "the largest single source of acceptable new housing available at prices which moderate income families can afford."

The idea of more and more Americans living in mobile homes —or house trailers—has been promoted by the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development and given impetus by extending FHA-insured financing to cover them.

The plan, as advanced by HUD Sec. George Romney, is that the mobile homes would be installed permanently on land purchased for trailer parks.

Romney recently told a meeting of mobile home manufacturers, however, that the plan has a long way to go. "Your growth is still inhibited by the old image of the temporary, ugly, muddy, trailer-coach court of the 1930s," he said.

Keenan pointed out that "in a mobile home the family lacks a firm base necessary for the proper rearing of children and essential for the building of sound and stable communities."

"Clusters of these flimsy habitations would only become breeding grounds for the slums of the future," he added.

Furthermore, Keenan said, the mobile homes lack appeal to workers on permanent jobs because they must be located at a distance from towns and cities, thus "aggravating workers' problems in getting transportation to and from jobs."

Mobile homes, he asserted, can never fill the need for "the production of sound, durable houses in good, convenient neighborhoods."

Emphasis on their development, he concluded, "is an admission of the Administration's failure so far to develop a national housing program responsive to current housing needs."

Elsewhere in his report, Nixon noted that housing production "declined sharply" in the past year and over the last four years has been more than 1 million units short of the volume needed to keep pace with growing population and dwelling replacement needs.

Nixon conceded that tight money policies have contributed to a "grievously crippled housing industry." But he claimed the policies were needed to control inflation.

Nixon Bids Congress Okay Postal Bargaining Reforms

CONGRESSIONAL LEADERS join union and postal management officials at a meeting with Pres Nixon in the Cabinet Room of the White House marking completion of negotiations on postal reform legislation providing full collective bargaining rights and a pay raise. At the table, from left: Rep. Robert J. Corbett (R-Pa.), senior minority member of the House Post Office Committee; AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany; Senate Post Office Committee Chairman Gale W. McGee (D-Wyo.); Pres. Nixon; Sen. Hiram L. Fong (R-Hawaii), senior minority member of the Senate Post Office Committee; Chairman Thaddeus J. Dulski (D-N.Y.) of the House Post Office Committee, and Postmaster Gen. Winton M. Blount.

New Bill Includes Added 8% Boost

By David L. Perlman

Pres. Nixon called on Congress to vote "prompt" approval of a postal reorganization plan providing full collective bargaining rights and higher pay for the nation's 750,000 postal workers.

The plan itself was the product of precedent-setting negotiations between an AFL-CIO-led coalition of unions and the Post Office Dept.

Federation Pres. George Meany described the agreement as "one of the most significant events in the history of collective bargaining . . . proof positive that collective bargaining is viable and effective."

He told newsmen at the White House that "we in the AFL-CIO quite candidly see these negotiations as setting the stage for the future. We believe that collective bargaining can be—and should be—extended to all workers in the federal government."

Nixon told Congress the legislation drafted by the negotiators "in an atmosphere of good will and good faith on both sides" would:

- "Convert the Post Office Dept. into an independent establishment in the Executive Branch of the government, freed from direct political pressure and endowed with the means of building a truly superior mail service.
- "Provide a framework within which postal employes in all parts of the country can bargain collectively with postal management over pay and working conditions.
- "Increase the pay of postal employes by 8 percent, over and above the government-wide increase of 6 percent, and shorten the time required to reach the top pay step for most postal jobs."

The new legislation authorizes

Blackmun Is Chosen For High Court

Pres. Nixon submitted his third choice to fill a Supreme Court seat that has been vacant since last May, but not before he unleashed a bitter, politically explosive blast at the Senate.

Carrying out his announced intention to nominate a conservative from outside the South, Nixon named Appeals Court Judge Harry A. Blackmun of Minnesota.

Blackmun, 61, has been a close, lifelong friend of Chief Justice Warren E. Burger, also a Minnesotan. The White House said the Chief Justice had been consulted on the nomination.

There was no initial criticism of the Blackmun nomination, and some cautious approval. But few senators were willing to comment on the appointment before a thorough examination of Blackmun's record. In both the Haynsworth and Carswell nominations, several senators who initially issued perfunctory statements of praise ended

Grape Pickers' Vote Leads To New Contracts

Coachella, Calif.—An overwhelming vote by grape pickers in favor of the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee led two more table grape employers to sign their first union contracts.

That brings to five the number of growers who have broken away from the employer group refusing for five years to recognize or negotiate with the union led by Cesar Chavez, UFWOC director.

Unemployment Rate Rises to 4.4 Percent

By Duane Emme

The nation's jobless rate rose for the third consecutive month to reach 4.4 percent in March—its highest level in more than four and a half years, the government reported.

The March rate increase of two-tenths of 1 percent follows increases of three-tenths in February and four-tenths in January.

Labor Dept. figures show that the rise of nine-tenths of 1 percent for the first quarter of 1970 is the biggest three-month increase since the last quarter of 1960, a recession period.

On the jobs side, non-farm payroll employment of 70.3 million in March was virtually unchanged over the month after allowing for seasonal factors. Payroll jobs would have dropped except for the government's hiring of 90,000 temporary census takers.

The worsening unemployment picture reinforced the AFL-CIO's appeals for "an immediate change in national economic policy" to halt simultaneous inflation and slump.

In congressional testimony and speeches, federation spokesmen have urged that anti-inflation weapons be directed at specific problem areas—discontinuing the Administration's "blunderbuss attack." The AFL-CIO also called upon Congress to enact a program to create jobs in the public service.

Harold Goldstein, assistant commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, said a substantial rise in the labor force in March caused an increase in the unemployment rate even though there was a moderate gain in total employment.

The result was a seasonally adjusted increase of 230,000 between February and March in the number of persons seeking jobs and unable to find them. Total unem-

Meat Cutters Win Pact To End Iowa Beef Strike

Dakota City, Neb.—The Meat Cutters settled a 7.5-month strike against Iowa Beef Packers, Inc., the nation's largest beef producer, with a wage and fringe-benefit package valued at more than $1 an hour.

Union officers credited labor solidarity with helping 1,200 company employes win their first union contract after a punishing winter on windswept picket lines.

Members of the new union local voted to accept terms agreed to by union and management with the aid of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

Meat Cutters Pres. Thomas J. Lloyd and Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman said the settlement represents a substantial advance over the company's pre-strike offer of 30 cents an hour in wages.

Dakota City strikers will return to work as rapidly as possible, they said, with no loss of seniority.

The contract calls for wage increases of 58 cents an hour immediately; additional 15-cent hikes in each of two succeeding years, and a cost-of-living clause providing additional raises.

The living-cost clause goes into effect after a 2 percent rise in the consumer price index in one year, after which wages will go up by 1 cent for each CPI increase of four tenths of 1 percent.

The benefit package includes for the first time a sizable company contribution to a sick-pay program.

House Votes Reform Of Welfare System

The House approved a major reform of the nation's welfare system despite bitter opposition from hard-core conservatives and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

It sent to the Senate an Administration-sponsored family assistance bill designed to help needy families headed by persons making low wages as well as welfare families without a wage-earner.

While the federal benefit floor is short of labor's goals, the AFL-CIO had urged the House to pass the bill—and the Senate to build on it.

The bill had been expected to breeze through the House with little trouble. It was backed both by the Administration and by liberal Democrats. Its floor leader was the influential chairman of the House Ways & Means Committee, Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.).

But the conservative attack built up, with charges that the measure would add to the welfare rolls low-income families not now covered and the Chamber of Commerce complaint that it would be "a first step toward a guaranteed annual income."

It reached the House floor under a closed rule, allowing no amendments, but only after a surprisingly close 204-183 vote. Opponents wanted the chance to offer an amendment deleting all help to the working poor. And some liberals,

STUDY IN COMMUNITY ACTION and deeper involvement of union members in local affairs of Kokomo, Ind., is kicked off with a Steelworkers billboard advertising drive. Here, representatives of the six USWA locals in Kokomo line up at one of the billboard ads promoting project SPEAK—the Steelworkers Program of Education and Action in Kokomo.

N.Y. Newspaper Talks Seen at Critical Stage

New York—Contract negotiations between daily newspaper publishers and 10 unions were reported at the critical stage as the Typographical union rejected a new employer offer as insufficient.

Mediator Theodore W. Kheel said the new proposal—the publishers' second in the prolonged negotiations—was for three annual raises of 9, 7 and 7 percent for a three-year total of 24.8 percent compounded.

Pres. Bertram A. Powers of ITU Local 6 said his committee will continue bargaining in the hope of getting an offer that will give the printers a fairer share of the newspapers' expanding profits. The latest offer barely equals the rise in living costs since the 1967 contract was signed, he said.

Besides wages, union and management are deadlocked on three other important issues. Local 6 reported that management wants to eliminate a reproduction clause in the contract, wants the unrestricted right to automate composing rooms, and wants the unlimited use of "outside" typesetting tape without payment to the printers. The union, he said, is resisting these demands.

Current wages for printers here are $184.43 a week for day work, $193.06 for night duty.

The Times, Daily News, Post and Long Island Press have been negotiating for several weeks with the unions, which represent 13,000 employes. Besides the ITU, these are the Newspaper Guild, Pressmen, Stereotypers, Deliverers, ITU Mailers, Paper Handlers, Photoengravers, Machinists and Electricians.

The publishers negotiate jointly with the craft unions but meet separately with the Guild.

The Guild's chief negotiator said his committee will reject the offer if it is made to that union, but would consider a similar offer over a two-year period instead of three.

The president of Stereotypers Local 1 called the 24.79 percent offer "unrealistic, unreasonable and unacceptable."

The Pressmen applied the offer to their wage rates and came up with a figure of $45.75 a week over the three-year contract term—too low, they said.

Several unions voted strike authorization but set no deadline at the request of Kheel and two fellow mediators. The Guild announced plans to publish a strike newspaper if the dailies stop printing.

Factory Workers Feel Brunt of Jobless Rise

A continuing rise in the unemployment rate would have its heaviest impact on blue collar workers in manufacturing and on Negroes.

Service industries would be affected later should the slowdown in the economy continue.

These are the conclusions of Paul M. Ryscavage, economist in the Bureau of Labor Statistics, who writes in the Labor Dept.'s Monthly Labor Review.

Ryscavage, on the basis of past experience, said that a 1 percent increase in the unemployment rate from 3.7 percent to 4.7 would mean on the average, an increase of 1.4 percent in the jobless rate for teenagers, 1.2 percent for adult men and .08 percent for women.

Past statistics also show that Negroes would be the chief sufferers as compared with whites. For Negroes the increase in unemployment would be 1.8 percent—almost double that of the overall increase.

Negro men 20 and over would show a 2.6 percent increase in joblessness for a 1 percent rise in general unemployment.

Examining the occupational impact, Ryscavage found that for the increase of 1 percent in overall unemployment, blue collar workers would suffer an increase of 1.7 percent divided as follows: craftsmen and foremen, 1.3 percent; operatives 1.7 percent and nonfarm laborers 2.6 percent.

The increase for service workers would be .09 percent while the average for white collar workers would be only .04 percent. Farm workers would suffer the least—.02 percent.

Ryscavage also estimated that unemployment levels for blue-collar workers would rise numerically more than in other occupations.

Steelworkers Launch Civic Action Project

Kokomo, Ind.—A year-long experiment geared to increasing involvement of union members in community affairs was launched here by the Steelworkers.

Project SPEAK — Steelworkers Program of Education and Action in Kokomo — was described by USWA Pres. I. W. Abel as "an effort to explore ways in which union members can realize a greater measure of self-fulfillment through a deeper commitment in the community."

Kokomo was selected for the project because of its size and location, the union said. The city is a smaller type of industrial and trading center that is removed from the urban population clusters of the country. The 5,000 USWA members and their families account for about 20 percent of the city's total population.

Through a series of surveys, meetings and action programs, the union hopes to get an accurate assessment of community attitudes. The project is being coordinated by a 12-member committee of the city's six USWA locals and the union's District 30, along with assistance from the USWA education department.

Before launching the program, the union employed a billboard advertising campaign. At first only the word "SPEAK" appeared. Further details on the project were added to the outdoor signs later.

A series of community meetings and luncheons introduced the goals of the project to local leaders and organizations. The initial community reception to the program was highly favorable, the coordinating committee reported.

Service Employes Win Pact in Massachusetts

Worcester, Mass.—Service Employes won higher wages and an agency shop clause for 1,400 city employes to end a four-month dispute. The city signed a one-year agreement and an ordinance was passed authorizing SEIU Local 495 to serve as official representation agency for members.

The agency shop clause is the second of its kind in Massachusetts, where an enabling law has been approved by the House and is under consideration in the Senate. The union represents city employes in six departments.

Unemployment Rate Rises to 4.4 Percent

ployment for March was 3.7 million.

Goldstein said "it's difficult to understand why the labor force is increasing substantially when jobs are harder to get." But, he noted, economists advance several possible reasons for it:

Women may be coming into the labor force to find work because the cost of living continues to climb, or they may be seeking jobs in fear their husbands are going to lose theirs, or more men may be coming from the Armed Forces into the job market.

The overall March unemployment rate was a full percentage point higher than March 1969. Over the year, BLS said, the number of unemployed workers has risen by 1 million.

The government's latest figures make clear that the increasing unemployment prevails through all groups in the labor force. For example:

- The unemployment rate for adult women moved up from 4.1 to 4.5 percent over the month. The rate, at its highest mark in two years, has risen by about 1 percent since late in 1969.
- Although the March rate for adult men of 2.9 percent was up only slightly from February, it too has spurted upward by 1 percent since late last year.
- The jobless rate for teenagers, 13.9 percent was up five-tenths of 1 percent from February. This rate has risen by more than 1 percent over the year.
- Unemployment among white workers rose from 3.8 to 4.1 percent between February and March. For Negroes, the rise was only one-tenth of a percent to 7.1 percent. But both rates are axactly 1 percent above March 1969.
- The white collar workers' unemployment rate went from 2.3 to 2.7 percent, while the blue collar rate edged up from 5 to 5.2 percent. Both rates have risen by more than five-tenths of 1 percent since the beginning of 1970.
- The number of persons unemployed 15 weeks or longer totaled 692,000 in March, the highest level in nearly four years.
- Although the jobless rates in manufacturing (4.7 percent) and construction (8.1 percent) were unchanged in March, both had risen sharply in January and February. The rate in manufacturing was up 1.6 percent over the the year and the construction rate was up 2 percent from March 1969.

Manufacturing employment dropped by 55,000 in March, seasonally adjusted, despite a pickup in production in the auto industry after temporary cutbacks in February.

Employment declines of between 10,000-15,000 took place in stone, clay and glass; primary metals, electrical equipment; food; textiles, and apparels.

There were modest increases in jobs in transportation and public utilities; finance, insurance and real estate; services and government. There were declines in wholesale and retail trade and mining.

Manufacturing employment in March, at 19.6 million, was down by 301,000 jobs over the year. Allowing for seasonal adjustment, about 140,000 jobs have been lost since Jan. 1.

In another area, the Labor Dept. announced that the average workweek for rank-and-file workers remained unchanged in March at 37.4 hours, marking the third consecutive month at this level.

Average hours in the first quarter of 1970 for rank-and-file workers were at their lowest level since 1964. The factory workweek for the first three months of this year averaged well below any quarter in 1969.

Factory overtime declined for the third straight month in March. At an average of 3.1 hours, it was at its lowest point since July 1964, with the exception of April 1968 which was marked by civil disturbances in many cities.

Average weekly earnings before taxes increased 68 cents in March to $117.55. Compared with March 1969 these earnings were up 5.3 percent. BLS did not adjust the March earnings for cost-of-living changes but it noted that in February when the average weekly earnings were 6.1 percent higher over the year, they were actuallyy down two-tenths of 1 percent when adjusted for price increases.

United Aircraft Ordered To Yield Address List

The United Aircraft Corp. had no valid reason for refusing to give the Machinists lists of the names and addresses of more than 25,000 employes in six Connecticut plants, the National Labor Relations Board ruled. It ordered United to furnish the lists forthwith.

The decision was the latest in a series of NLRB findings against United in the aftermath of a 1960 strike by six Machinist lodges at plants in East Hartford, Manchester, Middletown, Southington and Windsor Locks, Conn.

The board ordered management to provide the locals with the home addresses of all the employes in the six bargaining units. It directed that in the future the big aircraft engine manufacturer must bargain with IAM District 91 and Lodges 700, 743, 1746 and 1746A on the manner and form in which home addresses will be furnished and the intervals at which they shall be brought up to date.

The board rejected all company arguments for refusing to provide up-to-date lists.

Management argued that it uses bulletin boards and the mails, and the unions could do the same. It said it has doubts about the unions' majority and that furnishing the lists would invade the privacy of employes.

The NLRB agreed with Trial Examiner Owsley Vose that none of the arguments hold water. Address information can no more be kept private than wage information, the examiner found. And none of the other communications methods, available to the IAM, "either singly or in combination, furnish an adequate means of reaching all unit employes," he said.

The examiner also noted that evidence of the union's majority status was given to the company in 1968 in the form of authorization cards signed by employes.

The decision was in line with previous findings by the board and the courts that a union cannot properly represent all the members of its bargaining unit unless it knows who they are and where they live.

Bill Adds 8% Pay Raise:

Nixon Bids Congress Okay Postal Bargaining Reforms

collective bargaining over wages, hours, grievance procedures, seniority rights, holidays, vacations, insurance, overtime, training, safety, promotions, demotions, transfers and other matters subject to collective bargaining in the private sector.

In response to a question at the news briefing, Postmaster Gen. Winton M. Blount said that a union shop for postal workers "is a bargainable issue."

Postal workers remain bound by the federal law prohibiting strikes of government employes. But the legislation provides for impartial, outside-the-government arbitration of all bargaining disputes.

It sets up this procedure in the event of failure to reach agreement at the bargaining table:

- Appointment of a fact-finding board would be the first step. Labor and management would each select one member from a list prepared by the director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service. Those two would select the third member.
- If, after a 90-day cooling off period, there were still no agreement, the impasse would be referred to final and binding arbitration. The three-member board would have one member each from labor and management and an impartial chairman selected by them.

Postal workers would remain under the Civil Service retirement system and the federal employes workmen's compensation law, and continue to be covered by the Veterans Preference Act.

Existing government fringe benefits would be retained as a floor, subject to improvement through collective bargaining.

In a major new step for the public sector, the new United States Postal Service would come under jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board.

Determination of national collective bargaining units, certification of unions and adjudication of unfair labor practice charges would be handled by the NLRB under procedures similar to those for the private sector of the economy.

As soon as the legislation is enacted by Congress, postal workers will receive an 8 percent increase.

They have already shared in the government-wide 6 percent salary increase, retroactive to Dec. 27, 1969, which was agreed to in the first stage of the negotiations last month. The legislation implementing it quickly passed the House and Senate and has been signed into law by the President.

Nixon, in his message to Congress, said the additional 8 percent raise for postal workers only is justified by:

- "The need to offset the limited opportunities for job advancement that most postal workers have traditionally faced.
- "The need to allow postal workers to share the benefits of the increases in efficiency and productivity that should be attainable under a properly reorganized postal system."

Also, on enactment, collective bargaining will begin over pay schedules so that the time it takes a worker to move from the starting rate to the top pay step will be reduced from 21 years to not more than eight years.

Meany described the present 21-year lag as "intolerable."

The agreement provides also that, promptly after enactment of the legislation, collective bargaining will be required on wages, hours and working conditions.

Contracts would have a minimum term of two years, with negotiations on a new agreement starting 90 days before the termination date of the existing contract.

Meany told newsmen that the legislation will give postal workers "a measure of economic justice which has been too long delayed."

The need for participation in setting the conditions of their employment through collective bargaining, he said, "is just as valid in public employment as it is elsewhere in labor-management relations."

Under the new reorganization, the Post Office Dept. would be transformed into the United States Postal Service.

A nine-member bipartisan commission, appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate for nine-year staggered terms, would choose the Postmaster General and replace him at will. The Postmaster General, who would not be a Cabinet member, would have full authority to manage the day-to-day operations of the postal service.

The commission would have authority to set postage rates, subject to veto by a two-thirds vote of either the House or Senate. The new agency would be empowered to raise up to $10 billion through bond issues for improvement and modernization of the postal service.

A partial government subsidy would be provided for the first years of operation, starting at 10 percent of the cost of postal operations and declining until 1977, when Congress would appropriate only reimbursement for revenue lost on mail carried for non-profit organizations and other reduced-rate categories set by law.

Pres. Nixon sent his formal message to Congress after meeting in the White House with Meany, Blount, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, the heads of the seven postal unions holding nationwide exclusive bargaining rights for their crafts, and congressional leaders including the House majority and minority leaders, and the chairman and ranking minority members of the House and Senate Post Office & Civil Service Committees.

After the meeting with the President, Blount told the White House press corps that the agreement was "a right historic day for the Post Office Dept." and marked "a major step in modernizing relations between the government and its employes."

He praised the leadership role of Meany, Kirkland and the postal union presidents in making possible the "first true collective bargaining for public employes."

During the historic negotiating sessions, Meany's executive assistant, James C. Gildea, served as chairman of the seven postal unions' negotiating committee and AFL-CIO staff experts helped draft the basic agreement into legislative language.

Meany said the AFL-CIO's lobbying efforts on behalf of the bill will be led by the federation's legislative director, Andrew J. Biemiller.

Along with the postal reorganization bill, Nixon sent to Congress a separate postal revenue proposal, modifying his earlier request for a raise in the price of a first class letter stamp from the present six cents to 10 cents.

Under the President's new proposal, the first class postage rate would go up only to eight cents, air mail postage would remain at 10 cents, second class mail (primarily newspapers and magazines) would be raised 50 percent, and third class mail (advertising material) would be increased by one-third.

Blount said the postage rate changes, which were not involved in the collective bargaining process, would be handled in a separate bill from the reorganization plan.

NEW UNION LABEL of the United Farm Workers is given to Sen. Harrison A. Above, Chairman Pete Velasco of UFWOC's defense committee presents a section of a grape box with the red-eagle label to Williams, chairman of the Senate Labor committee, at a Meat Cutters' conference in Chicago. # 2 More Grape Growers Sign Union Contracts

Cecil C. Larson, brothers who raise Coachella Valley grapes on adjoining farms. The three-year pacts are simliar to those signed early in April with other growers brought together by a committee of Catholic bishops and by federal mediators.

Because K. K. Larson had been stumping the country charging that farmworkers would repudiate the union if given a chance to vote, UFWOC arranged a special election at the Larson vineyards.

While pickets stayed on duty at ranch entrances, non-striking Larson employes cast ballots in a consent election. Their vote was so emphatic—152 for the union, 2 against—that the strikers did not even bother to mark their ballots.

The Larsons held their first meeting with Chavez and his negotiating committee two hours after the balloting Apr. 11. Talks continued that night, resumed on Sunday, and agreement was reached in midafternoon of Apr. 12.

The three-year contracts provide for a minimum hourly rate of $1.75 in the first year, reopening on wages and fringe benefits in the second and third years, and benefits similar to those signed earlier with grower Lionel Steinberg for himself and two allied growers.

It was agreed that during the coming harvest season fieldworkers will be paid 25 cents additional per box.

The employer will contribute 10 cents an hour per worker for health and welfare funds and 2 cents an hour into an economic development fund for workers displaced due to age or mechanization of the industry.

Most of the Larsons' 250-300 employes get a piecework rate instead of an hourly rate. The union estimates their probable earnings at $3 to $3.50 an hour.

Chavez left after the signing for UFWOC headquarters at Delano, Calif., where his home is, but planned to return here for negotiations over the weekend with other growers.

"There is much hope among the workers for better wages and decent conditions at other ranches," Chavez said.

Farm workers were aware, he said, that hostile growers have been repeating loudly the refrain that farm workers don't need a union, don't want a union and would, if asked, reject it out of hand.

"That kind of talk stopped last Saturday," Chavez said.

The new contract, like the others signed earlier this month, contains a provision that growers will not use "hard" pesticides to spray their fields. Farm workers and their children, who go into the fields with them, have been disabled and even killed by sprayed poisons.

Meat Cutters Win Pact To End Iowa Beef Strike

Improvements in hospitalization coverage also were made. Tool and clothing allowances were increased.

Iowa Beef agreed to contribute $3 more per month for sickness-and-accident benefits, and for hospital room charges of up to $39 a day this year.

It was agreed also that a year from now the union and management will review hospital room costs. If they exceed $39 a day, the benefits will be increased accordingly.

Lloyd and Gorman issued a statement saying "one of the most heartening things about the strike was the dramatic demonstration of support these gallant workers received from their fellow unionists."

Aid came not only from members of the Meat Cutters but "there was an outpouring from other unions, notably in the Midwest."

They added: "The help of the central labor bodies and the great caravans of labor unionists who came many miles, by car and truck, to bring supplies and spirit to the picket lines was a dramatic rebuttal to all who think labor has become apathetic."

The strike had the firm support of 1969 AFL-CIO convention delegates and the AFL-CIO Executive Council. The strike started last Aug. 24 after Iowa Beef Packers, a rapidly-growing and highly profitable corporation, insisted to the point of deadlock on a wage structure the union judged far below the standards of its competitors in the meat packing industry.

The council at its February meeting called on all union members to continue supporting the strike and boycott of Iowa Beef. It urged the federal government also to "vigorously police" the Mexican border against the recruiting of strikebreakers.

It accused management of engaging in "ruthless" strikebreaking, recruiting strikebreakers from as far away as Mexico, publishing propaganda that is "false and malicious," forcing workers in its other plants off the job, and filing multi-million-dollar suits against the union.

Settlement of the strike will mean the end of labor's consumer boycott.

Accord Terminates Iowa Beef Boycott

Settlement of the Meat Cutters' long strike against Iowa Beef Packers, Inc., automatically ends labor's campaign of refusal to buy company products, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in a letter to presidents of affiliated unions and labor central bodies.

"Please notify your members and your union publications," Meany wrote, "and convey to them my personal appreciation" for their help. He reported that union officers "asked me to express their gratitude to all union members who helped in this struggle."

ACWA Gains Wage Boosts At Xerox Plant

Rochester, N.Y.—More than 4,000 employes of Xerox Corp. will get wage increases averaging $1.04 an hour in a new three-year contract negotiated by Local 14A of the Clothing Workers' xerographic division.

The new pact provides an immediate general wage hike of 40 cents an hour, and additional raises of 8 percent next March and 7 percent a year later.

Journeymen in the skilled trades will get the general increases plus two more raises of 11.5 cents an hour in 1970 and 12.5 cents in 1971. Cleaners will get a special increase of 7 cents an hour.

Fringe benefits include one more paid holiday for a total of 11, an early retirement plan with insured benefits, four weeks' vacation after 12 years' service, improved maternity coverage, a Blue Cross provision for out-patient and first-aid care, increased major medical expense coverage, and better income protection for employes during extended disability.

MORE THAN 50 representatives of the international affairs departments of AFL-CIO unions were briefed in Washington on latest developments around the globe by Dir. Jay Lovestone of the AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs and members of his staff. The department is now planning for a conference of federation affiliates active in labor's various international trade secretariats.

Administration's Lobbying Tactics Prove Costly in Carswell Battle

Heavy-handed lobbying—to the point of outright misrepresentation—marked a last-ditch Administration effort to save the Carswell nomination.

Its chief effect, as it turned out, may have been to swing the vote of Sen. Margaret Chase Smith (R-Me.) against confirmation.

There have been reports of attempted pressures brought against other senators in an effort to switch their votes. But the documented evidence of clumsy political maneuvering over Mrs. Smith's vote will probably become a case history in how not to win friends and influence senators.

As is her custom, Mrs. Smith had refused to tell anyone how she would vote on the Carswell nomination—even though the Senate was so closely divided that her vote might have tipped the scales either way.

But on the day of the vote, White House lobbyists were calling senators who were considered on the fence to tell them that Mrs. Smith was going to support the nomination, thus ensuring confirmation. It was suggested that they would be well-advised to hop on the bandwagon also.

The chief White House lobbyist, Bryce Harlow, made at least one such call—to Sen. Marlow Cook (R-Ky.). Harlow assured Cook that the word had come from Mrs. Smith's office.

"When I learned of this," Mrs. Smith said, "I called Mr. Harlow, expressed my resentment to him and asked on what basis he was making this representation."

Harlow said a member of his staff had been so informed by Mrs. Smith's administrative assistant. But when confronted, the Harlow aide said he had gotten the information from the Vice President's office. And when that report was traced down, the claim was finally made that a receptionist in Agnew's office at the Capitol had heard it "from a man passing in the hall in front of the Vice President's office."

As a matter of fact, Mrs. Smith noted, the receptionist "emphatically denied" any such episode.

While Administration officials were peddling the story that Mrs. Smith was going to vote for confirmation, an even clumsier effort was made to get her to do so by implying that it was opponents of Carswell who were falsely claiming Mrs. Smith's support.

Just hours before the vote, a memo to the Maine senator was hand-delivered from Agnew's office, signed by the Vice President's administrative assistant.

It purported to relay an anonymous phone call exposing a plot by the "editorial staff" of the Baltimore Sun—one of the nation's most respected newspapers—to call Mrs. Smith's office "using the names of influential people" to urge her to vote against confirmation.

"You might want to double check the authenticity of any calls coming into your office," the memo suggested.

That report, too, turned out to be without basis. But added to the memo was a paragraph contending that the Carswell opponents were doing what the White House itself was guilty of—misrepresenting the Maine senator's position in an effort to influence votes. It read:

"In the event you missed it, according to the news, Sen. Hatfield has announced that both Sen. Smith and Sen. Marlow Cook will vote against confirmation of Judge Carswell."

Hatfield, an Oregon Republican, said the statement "was not even remotely true." Not only hadn't he claimed Mrs. Smith's vote against Carswell, but a check of all news stories relating to the confirmation battle showed that no one had ever quoted him as claiming it.

Hatfield said when he had told this to Mrs. Smith, she said with obvious reference to the White House maneuverings, "I believe you. I have confidence in your word because of the other things that have happened."

To top it all off, two days after the vote, Harlow repeated in a television interview the claim that Mrs. Smith's assistant was the source of the erroneous report that she would vote to confirm Carswell.

At that, the Maine senator took to the floor of the Senate to demand an apology from Harlow.

"I am shocked at the repeated irresponsibility of Mr. Harlow both before and after the vote," she told the Senate.

Harlow subsequently sent a letter of apology to Mrs. Smith, which she curtly acknowledged.

Jobless Rate For Negroes Dips in 1969

The unemployment rate for Negroes declined slightly across the nation last year but it still remained more than twice the jobless rate for whites, the Labor Dept. reported.

A report by the Bureau of Labor Statistics on the geographic aspects of unemployment also showed no improvement in the job picture for black workers in the nation's 20 largest central city areas.

On the national level, the Negro jobless rate dropped from 6.7 to 6.4 percent as an annual average between 1968 and 1969, while the white rate declined from 3.2 to 3.1 percent.

The main reason for the drop in the Negro rate, the report showed, a sharp decline was in the North Central region—from 8 percent in 1968 to 6.8 percent in 1969.

The BLS findings, based on Census Bureau data, showed only slight drops or unchanged rates for both whites and blacks in most other regions.

In the central cities of the 20 largest metropolitan areas—where more than 80 percent of the Negro workers are concentrated—their unemployment rate was 6.2 percent in 1969, unchanged over the year.

The rate for whites in these same central cities was 3.2 percent last year, a drop of two-tenths of 1 percent from 1968.

Blackmun Chosen For Supreme Court

up embarrassed by the subsequent disclosures.

The President's outburst against the Senate at a White House news conference, after he had met with Atty. Gen. John Mitchell, alienated Republicans as well as Democrats, a number of southerners as well as northeners.

The Senate "as presently constituted," Nixon claimed, won't confirm any southerner "who believes as I do in the strict construction of the Constitution."

The evidence of conflict of interest against Judge Haynsworth, the prejudiced statements and actions of Judge Carswell and the opposition of the nation's most prominent law school deans were dismissed by Nixon as "vicious assaults" on "distinguished jurists" who "had the misfortune of being born in the South."

Nixon's target embraced 20 of the Senate's 43 Republicans who had voted to reject either Haynsworth or Carswell or both. The entire Senate Republican leadership was in the group. So were four southern senators, who—in a political sense—had everything to lose and nothing to gain by voting their convictions and consciences against Carswell.

Nor were the relations between the White House and the Senate enhanced when the wife of Atty. Gen. John M. Mitchell made a post-midnight call to the Arkansas Gazette in Little Rock to denounce Sen. J. W. Fulbright (D-Ark.) for voting against Carswell.

Mrs. Mitchell, a native of Arkansas, told the paper, "I want you to crucify Fulbright."

There was even evidence that Nixon's blast at the Senate might backfire in at least some conservative southern circles.

A conservative syndicated columnist James J. Kilpatrick, said candidly that Carswell "was simply not all that hot." But there are in the South "men of impeccable reputation" who are conservative, strict constructionists, and who would not have any difficulty getting confirmed.

Vice Pres. Agnew and House Republican Leader Gerald R. Ford (Mich.), however, echoed the President's charges and heaped more political coals on the fire.

Agnew charged in a television interview that Carswell had been rejected after senators had been "snowed" by "the liberal media" and subjected to "almost incredible" pressures from labor and civil rights groups.

And Ford called for the impeachment of Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas. The latest attack on the 71-year-old justice is based on controversial views in his new book, Points of Rebellion. Ford noted that an excerpt from the book had appeared in a "shocking" magazine, Evergreen Review.

When the Haynsworth nomination was before the Senate, Ford had suggested that Douglas should be impeached if Haynsworth were not confirmed. But he denied that the move against Douglas is intended as revenge for the Senate's defeat of the two nominations.

Agnew did not openly call for impeachment of Douglas. Rather, he said in his television interview, that both Carswell and Haynsworth "have been denied seats on the bench for statements that are much less reprehensible than those made, in my opinion, by Justice Douglas."

Rival Resolutions

Ford threw his support behind a resolution scheduled to be introduced which would set up a special House committee to investigate Justice Douglas and report within 90 days. The intent of the resolution was to bypass the House Judiciary Committee.

However, a liberal Democrat, Rep. Andrew Jacobs, Jr. (Ind.), got the jump on Ford by introducing a standard impeachment resolution, thus ensuring that it would be considered by the Judiciary Committee.

Jacobs said he acted "in order that a proper and dignified inquiry into this matter might be held" in view of Ford's charges.

After all the hot political talk, the nomination of Blackmun came almost as an anti-climax.

He has been described as a mild-mannered, scholarly judge who has served on the Court of Appeals since 1959.

"I've been a nominal Republican all my life," he told newsmen, "but I haven't been active."

Newspaper Finds a Few Skeletons In Gurney's Campaign Fund Closet

St. Petersburg, Fla.—Sen. Edward J. Gurney (R-Fla.), trying to raise funds to knock unions out of politics, "appears to have some skeletons in his own campaign fund-raising closet," the St. Petersburg Times reported.

An article by Charles Stafford of the newspaper's Washington bureau cited a half dozen contributions received by Gurney for his 1968 campaign that he said exceeded the Florida Election Law limit of $1,000 per person or committee.

According to Stafford, Gurney's contributions came from business organizations, including the political arms of the American Medical Association and the National Association of Manufacturers.

Noting that "none of the contributions were from organized labor," Stafford speculated that this "perhaps explains Gurney's willingness to write a fund-raising letter for the National Right to Work Legal Defense & Education Foundation."

The reference was to letters Gurney has been writing since December to raise a "bare minimum" of $115,000 to finance a legal assault on the union shop, directed specifically at crippling labor's political activities.

The vehicle for the attack—so Gurney has been telling employers—is a court challenge to an agency shop negotiated by Teachers Local 231 in Detroit.

What he did not tell potential contributors, however, is that a Wayne County (Mich.) Circuit Court has dismissed the suit without trial, on a motion for summary judgment.

Judge Charles Kaufman found no basis for a charge that the agency shop violated Michigan law or was unconstitutional. Further, he held that the case did not even contain any issue on the political use of union funds.

The Times article listed contributions that Gurney received in excess of $1,000 from the following organizations:

Florida Medical Political Actions Committee, $4,000; United Congressional Appeal, Boca Raton, $2,500; Business-Industry Political Action Committee, New York, $5,000; Committee for Action, Bellevue, Wash., $1,500; Exchange Firms Campaign Committee, New York, $2,000; and the Washington, D.C., Political Action Campaign Committee, $15,500.

Although these "apparently illegal" contributions added up to $30,500, Stafford said, Gurney reported to the Secretary of the Senate that he received contributions of $22,125 and spent $21,230.

"Technically," the article continued, "that probably was correct. Federal law limits senators to expenditures of $25,000. But to get around it, they report only their personal receipts and contributions, while the bulk of the contributions are received and spent by a campaign committee."

Conference Maps Joint Program:

Ship Industry, Labor Study Cost Impact on Islands, Alaska

Maritime labor and management will join in drawing up a program to deal with any impact that shipping costs may be having on the economies of Hawaii, Alaska and Puerto Rico.

The assignment was given to the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. and the Transportation Institute, an industry-supported maritime research organization, by a two-day conference in Washington.

On hand were 425 representatives of the two states, the Puerto Rican commonwealth, and officials of the federal government, the shipping industry and maritime unions.

MTD Pres. Paul Hall, chairman of the meeting, said the department and the institute will begin a study immediately to learn what effect shipping costs have on the cost of living in the three areas.

Hall, who also is president of the Seafarers, emphasized that the study will be made in consultation with representatives of the three areas. Study findings and recommendations will be presented to a follow-up conference of government, industry and labor representatives.

The initial meeting, jointly sponsored by the MTD and the institute, heard addresses from government, labor and industry leaders and discussed the economic problems of Hawaii, Alaska and Puerto Rico arising from transportation costs.

Reports from panels covering the problems of the two states and the commonwealth emphasized that any program to relieve shipping costs on their cargoes from the U.S. mainland should not jeopardize the Jones Act.

The law requires that shipping from one American port to another must be carried in American-flag ships. Its purpose is to bolster the U.S. fleet against U.S. operators who sail under foreign flags to escape fair wages and safety rules.

Representatives of Alaska, Hawaii and Puerto Rico—along with other conference participants—called for legislation to provide federal aid in the construction of ships for the noncontiguous trade similar to subsidies now provided shipping used in foreign trade.

The panels also urged that operators in the non-contiguous trade be given the same right to establish tax deferred construction reserve funds now enjoyed by some operators in foreign trade.

All three panels praised the conference for bringing together the diverse groups concerned with transportation in the non-contiguous trade.

Chairmen of the panels were: Hawaii, David C. McClung, president of the Hawaii Senate; Alaska, Harold D. Strandberg, the state's commissioner of public works; Puerto Rico, Luis Guinot, Jr., administrator of the commonwealth's Washington office.

In opening the conference, Hall urged its participants to "look squarely in the eye" the economic problems of Hawaii, Alaska and Puerto Rico. Not to do so, he added, would be to "ignore the problems of our friends who live in these areas."

He called for a "common denominator" approach to solving any problems arising from shipping rates—"one which may not please everyone but one that will help a majority of those affected."

Other major speakers included Chairman Helen D. Bentley of the Federal Maritime Commission, Pres. Edwin M. Hood of the Shipbuilders Council of America, Gov. John A. Burns of Hawaii, Sen. Theodore F. Stevens (R-Alaska), Rep. Thomas M. Pelly (R-Wash.), and Jorge L. Cordova, resident commissioner of Puerto Rico.

Mrs. Bentley said a commission examination of the impact of rates to Hawaii on consumer prices found that the rates were not a major factor in the pricing of surveyed items. She said the size of the market for goods seemed to be a more important factor.

However, Mrs. Bentley conceded that there were other indications that transportation costs to Hawaii, Alaska and Puerto Rico have increased prices. "The hour is rapidly approaching for an answer to be found," she concluded.

Hood said that "the shipping problems of Alaska, Hawaii and Puerto Rico should not be solved to the detriment of American shipyard craftsmen . . . in the many industries that support our shipbuilding facilities."

He warned that any weakening of the Jones Act would adversely affect not only maritime employes but also employes of railroads, barges, pipelines and trucking companies.

Burns complimented labor and management for sponsoring the meeting. He said its subject is so vital to his state that the legislature recessed so that nine members of the Hawaii House could accompany him to Washington.

The governor contended that present federal regulations do not meet the state's present needs or its future as a trans-shipment center for Pacific trade. There is a primary need, he said, for adequate, continuous and competitive transportation between the islands that form Hawaii.

Sen. Stevens said previous discussion of the problems involved in transportation costs to Alaska has "generated a great deal of rhetoric, but very little action." He predicted the conference would be a "long overdue first step toward real action."

Stevens and Cordova contended that the Jones Act is resulting in higher shipping costs and prices. But Stevens pointed out the law is important to the nation's security. Pelly said any amending of the law would be "totally senseless" and there is "little mood in Congress to tamper with it."

LABOR AND MANAGEMENT in the maritime industry will jointly draw up a program to deal with any impact shipping costs may have on the economies of Hawaii, Alaska and Puerto Rico. Addressing a two-day Washington conference, which gave them the assignment, is Jorge L. Cordova, Puerto Rico's resident commissioner. Seated are AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. Pres. Paul Hall and O. William Moody, department administrator.

MARITIME LABOR, the shipping industry and government were represented at a Washington conference on shipping costs and their relation to the economies of Alaska, Hawaii and Puerto Rico. Pres. Paul Hall of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., a sponsor of the conference, talks with Rep. Patsy T. Mink (D-Hawaii) between sessions. The conferees agreed that economic problems must be met by a "common denominator" approach by labor and management.

Court Ruling Reinforces Women's Equal Pay Law

St. Louis—The right to equal pay for women performing essentially the same jobs as men was reinforced with an 8th Circuit Court of Appeals decision. This is the second major victory in three months for women workers, based on the Federal Equal Pay Act of 1963.

The unanimous decision reversed a 1968 district court ruling that had found no discrimination against women on the pay issue by the American Can Co.'s Dixie Products Division at Fort Smith, Ark.

The Labor Dept. brought the suit against the company in 1967 after the Wage & Hour Division discovered that women cup machine operators were being paid 20 cents less an hour than men for similar work.

Federal Wage & Hour Administrator Robert D. Moran said the appeals court decision could result in more than $100,000 in backpay for 60 women employes as well as boosting their wages 20 cents an hour.

The wage discrepancy was based on pay for women operators on the day and evening shifts compared with that of the men operators on the night shift. All operators perform the same tasks on all shifts, except that night shift operators load their machines with rolls of paper, while this function is done by "roll boys" or maintenance men during the AM-PM shifts.

Originally, the AM-PM shifts were limited to women and the night shift to men.

But in 1965, the company made an agreement with Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers Local 656, which the court said, "purported to abolish the wage differential based on sex for all positions in the plant."

The agreement opened the night shift to women and the day shift to men, but retained the differential between shifts.

On this basis, the district court found that the company ceased the wage discrimination against the women workers.

However, Circuit Judge Gerald W. Heaney ruled that the discrimination was not corrected. Although five men transferred to the day shifts, the requests of a few women to be transferred to the night shift were not granted by the company.

Judge Heaney based his decision on the Wheaton Glass Co. case where the 3rd Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia ruled in January that "equal work did not require that jobs be identical but only that they be substantially equal."

The Wheaton decision involved backpay liability of more than $250,000 for 260 women workers.

NLRB Cases Mount As Budget Is Slashed

The National Labor Relations Board, faced with a cut in its budget, reported a 6 percent increase in cases filed in the final three months of 1969, compared with the same quarter of 1968.

Nearly all the increase was due to unfair labor practice charges filed by workers, employers or unions in the usual ratio—35 percent against unions, 65 percent against employers.

The NLRB said its offices received 7,567 cases of all types last October through December, as against 7,110 cases for the same quarter of 1968.

Unfair practice charges totaled 4,763, up 11 percent over the year-ago quarter. Election petitions totaled 2,804, an increase of only four.

The report pointed out that "the NLRB does not initiate cases, it processes charges and petitions" brought by outside sources.

Pres. Nixon last January proposed a budget that would give the labor relations agency $465,000 less than it had last year, though its business continues to increase year by year. Such a reduction could mean that fewer workers will process more cases with longer delays.

For the quarter ended last Dec. 31, the NLRB general counsel issued 556 formal complaints to set cases for trial—an increase of more than 12 percent in a year's time. Trial examiners conducted 255 hearings, and numerous other charges were dismissed, withdrawn or settled voluntarily.

At year's end, 613 cases awaited decision by the five NLRB members, compared with 575 cases pending Oct. 1, 1969, and 631 cases a year ago. Of the 613 cases, more than 70 percent involved unfair labor practice charges.

At the end of last December, 10,115 cases of all kinds were awaiting disposition at all agency levels. That compares with 10,447 pending cases at the close of last September and 9,743 cases pending on Dec. 31, 1968.

The NLRB said it conducted 2,053 representation elections in the final three months of 1969. Eighty-nine percent of eligible employes voted. AFL-CIO unions won a majority of votes in 627 elections, lost in 619 elections. Unaffiliated unions won 473 elections, lost 452.

Vehicle for Justice

THERE ARE A FEW who seem to feel that the best thing to to do with the government is to dismantle and destroy it. They are the Weathermen and the rest of the "new anarchists." There are others who say they hate anarchy above all things, but who still work hard to reverse the progress we have made. They are the ones who want to dismantle parts of our government, to reverse government programs, wipe out selected government agencies and reduce the power of government to provide the greatest good for all of the people.

They are the ones who persist in attacking civil servants as time-serving bureaucrats who are overprotected, overpaid, underworked and underproductive. That picture is just as false as the one the far left seeks to paint.

Civil servants are among the hardest-working, most conscientious and most dedicated workers in the land. What hope we have of making our government work lies in the people whose responsibility it is to make it work.

If the government is going to do its share to create a better society, it must be able to hold and attract good employes. And to do that it must try, at least, to be an ideal employer. That is what it has not been, but that is what your unions are trying to help it to become.

The federal worker needs a decent income, sound job security, reasonable protection against the hazards of illness and old age, and a fighting chance to make some continuing progress for himself and his family. He has the responsibility to feed and house and clothe and educate his family, just as does any other worker, and he deserves no less than the same chance workers in private industry have to do all of these things.

The best way for government workers to realize these things is the way all other workers do it: through their unions. And the best mechanism for progress is the one unions know best: collective bargaining.

THESE 34 UNIONS (in the Government Employes Council) have worked patiently and effectively over the last quarter-century to make government jobs as worth-while as private jobs. It took 16 long years from the date of this council's establishment just to get the official recognition extended under Pres. Kennedy's Executive Order 10988. That did part of the job. Eight years later, under Pres. Nixon's Executive Order 11491, more progress was made toward solving some unfair labor practices and negotiating grievance procedures.

What was not achieved—until just the other day—was the basic right guaranteed by law since 1935 to all workers in private industry: the right to bargain collectively on every aspect of wages, hours and working conditions, and to have a voice in the economic, social and professional destiny of the workers involved.

That is the next step for the 34 unions represented here tonight. And we have made that first step in the historic negotiations with Postmaster Gen. Blount and his aides in the Post Office Dept.

What about the rest of the government workers? I think the answer is the same—collective bargaining on all issues that would normally be subject to collective bargaining in the private sector.

Collective bargaining has been the vehicle for justice for employes in the private sector for many years. We in the AFL-CIO think it is the sure route to progress for federal workers too.

Affluence Awaits Weathermen With Hoffman as Trial Judge

By John P. Roche

A STORY from Chicago reports that Judge Julius Hoffman has again drawn the short straw and has been assigned to the trial of the Weathermen. This may not be imminent—the 12 defendants have vanished—but there is a real danger that when they hear the good news, they will promptly appear in the courtroom.

After all, the "Chicago 7" are currently making a fortune from their versions of "Tales of Hoffman"—they seem to be speaking everywhere every night and pumping out memoirs by the ream—and the Weathermen might decide to permit the federal government to launch them into affluence.

I say this with some timidity—I don't want to spend the next 10 years in the pen for contempt of court—but Judge Hoffman just won't do for this kind of trial.

The 74-year-old jurist is not a "fascist," a "racist" or any other kind of malignant species—he is an honest, strong-minded old gentleman with an extremely short fuse. From the viewpoint of extremists who plan to turn a courtroom into a "revolutionary scene," he is the ideal man to have on the bench.

Those of us who have had to deal with the storm troopers of the New Left—or the Old Left, for that matter: when I was a Socialist in the late '30s, the Young Communists specialized in disrupting our "fascist" activities—must feel a considerable amount of sympathy for Judge Hoffman.

Trying to preside over a meeting which has been raided by organized disrupters is a searing experience. Hoffman had to live through it every working day for six months.

There is in fact no courteous way to silence a determined, willful disrupter. If a gathering is going to conduct any business, he has to be thrown out. In well-organized bodies, such as trade unions, this is handled effectively by "stewards" and justified as "participatory democracy."

(The Women's Liberation Movement might be interested in learning that in one union, most of the stewards are stalwart Amazons. The disrupter who has been bounced by a woman seldom wants to make a federal case out of it.)

However, the federal government (all governments, in fact) must observe more formal standards. Above all, the judge must realize that to engage in perfectly normal human behavior (like throwing a lawbook at someone who has called him an obscene name) is to play into the hands of the enemy.

HE MUST SIT THERE, make his rulings calmly, maintain order with impersonal severity, and treat the whole business as though it were an argument about a mortgage. A judge, in short, has no right to be a human being—he is simply the law incarnate.

Admittedly this is an appalling task, but it can be done. In 1949, I spent some time in Judge Harold Medina's courtroom on Foley Square in New York where the trial of the leaders of the Communist party was in process. The defendants jumped and whooped, the lawyers were on their feet most of the time yelling objections, picket lines were outside, and friends had packed the audience.

It could have been a Chicago, but it became the bore of the year: Medina simply didn't react. He sat there like a graven image, made his rulings, and outwaited the revolution.

There may not be a Medina in the District of Northern Illinois, but clearly Judge Hoffman should not have this assignment, if only on grounds of age and health. Let us hope a younger man with greater resources of patience can be found to replace him. Let the Weathermen blow. . . .

Wall Street Journal Report:

Government-Controlled Unions Crack Down on Soviet Workers

The following is excerpted from an article in the April 10 edition of the Wall Street Journal by Ray Vickers titled "Soviet Setback: Lagging Economy Puts Leaders, Workers Alike on the Spot in Russia."

LEONID I. BREZHNEV, the general secretary of the Comunist party, is making it clear that he regards last year's economic performance as a disaster. In a scathing report to the party, he complained of failure to meet production goals for coal, iron and steel, cement, chemicals, paper, petrochemicals and agriculture. In the farming sector, output of meat, milk and eggs has lagged particularly.

The report was a signal for Communist party officials throughout this vast nation to spread the word to enterprise managers and workers alike that a production speedup is expected. To drive the point home, every worker in the country is scheduled tomorrow to contribute a day's work without pay.

Officials are cracking down hard on absenteeism, always a problem here, and a campaign against drunkenness is gathering such force that vodka is becoming a dirty word—at least among the bureaucrats who are supposed to spotlight work losses due to drinking.

Housewives, pensioners and invalids are being encouraged to join the work force to add to the nearly 90 million workers now employed in industry and on state farms.

Though workers are exhorted to perform better for the good of the nation, moral suasion is being replaced by outright threats in many instances. Under new rules at one factory in Leningrad, for instance, a worker who is unjustifiably absent for even a single day will have his annual bonus reduced by 25 percent to 50 percent. Throughout the Leningrad area, plants are demoting poor workers to lower-paid jobs.

G. Popov, first secretary of the Leningrad city party committee, stresses the "urgent need" for stronger discipline and for a reduction in labor turnover. "Those people on whom methods of persuasion have no effect must be compelled in a principled manner, firmly and with the application of all means of public influence, moral and material pressure, to subordinate themselves to the will of the majority," he says.

In Moscow, according to the Soviet deputy minister of internal affairs, one enterprise has signed a new trade union contract that permits the penalizing of slackers by taking away their vacations.

Under similar circumstances in Western nations, trade unions could be expected to try to protect their members from management crackdowns. Here, however, trade unions serve the government.

Recently a special meeting of the all-union central council of trade unions recommended that violators of labor discipline, job changers, absentees and drunks should be dealt with sternly.

Trade union organizations were told to bring workers into line through such methods as "discussion at workers meetings, comrades courts, the deprivation of passes to sanatoriums and rest homes, the (loss) of holidays and places on housing lists, deprivation of bonuses and, as an extreme measure, expulsion from the union." Being kicked out of the union would drastically slash a worker's social benefits.

With housing scarce in the Soviet Union, the housing list can be a potent club over many workers. Those wanting better housing must place their names on long waiting lists. Recently the government gave trade unions a much stronger voice in determining the placement of names on lists. Now an eager worker may find himself rising on the list while the slacker finds his name remaining at the bottom.

To emphasize the need for a crackdown, Soviet newspapers and magazines are carrying stories about production snafus, improper planning, worker indifference and output bottlenecks.

One problem is padding of the labor force by plants. Managers like to have a reserve of workers who may sit around most of the time but are available if the plant encounters difficulty in meeting its quotas. Alexander Birman, a prominent Soviet economist, says the average electric light bulb plant in the USSR employs three to four times as many workers as a comparable American plant.

SUCH PADDING facilitates the practice known here as "storming." Plants typically work at a slow pace in the first part of the month, then accelerate operations in the last 10 days if that is necessary to meet the monthly quota.

To consumers, this means an added complication when shopping. One shopper searching for a television set in the big GUM department store in Moscow recently, for instance, spent most of his time looking at the labels on the backs of sets rather than trying out the sets themselves.

"You must be sure that anything you buy is produced in the first half of the month," he said, "so I always look for the date stamps." Like other Russians, he has learned from experience that goods produced early in the month are more likely to be well-made than items slapped together during the frantic days near the end of the month.

Inefficiency crops up in other ways, too. One government study showed that each year 10,000 railroad carloads of gravel are shipped almost 500 miles from Stavropol to Rostov-on-Don—while almost the same amount is being shipped annually from Rostov to Stavropol.

Every year 10 million tons of cement are lost due to poor storage, says one report criticizing the construction industry. In Moscow alone, 25 million bricks and 85,000 square meters of glass are "lost" on construction sites annually.

Some workers take bricks and glass home for odd jobs around their living quarters, officials say. Others go into business in a small way for themselves. Trud contends that the perpetrators of 60 percent of all thefts from state enterprises intend to sell the stolen goods and buy vodka.

Union Label Grapes Pushed As Follow-Up to First Pacts

THE SIGNING of union contracts with three California table grape ranches was hailed as a significant breakthrough by AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William L. Kircher, who called on shoppers to buy the union label grapes that will soon be on grocery shelves.

The contracts cover only a small portion of total table grape production but provide a "reasonable lead" for other growers in the industry, declared Kircher.

Kircher said the labor movement planned the following two-step consumer action to help the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee.

- Intensification of the nationwide boycott against grapes marketed by non-union growers.
- A campaign to help sell grapes produced by union workers.

The ranches that have signed contracts produce the first table grapes of the season, which should reach retail outlets about the first of June. "Each box packed by a unionized grower" will bear the UFWOC union label, he added.

Appearing on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Kircher praised the role of an ad hoc committee of Catholic bishops in helping shape the agreements covering about 12 percent of the table grapes produced in California's Coachella Valley.

He said the committee intends to seek permission from the National Conference of Catholic Bishops to continue its work, and that the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service has also "indicated to both the union and growers" its readiness to "assist in any negotiating process the parties could agree upon."

"Several growers, on an individual basis, have indicated to the union that they would like to talk informally, now that the ground has been broken" with the signing of the first contracts in the table grape industry, Kircher said.

THE AGE-OLD CHARGE that unions are a "conspiracy in restraint of trade" has been used by labor's opponents for more than 200 years and has long been rejected but it may well flame up again.

For years anti-labor members of Congress have tossed into the hoppers bills to place labor under the antitrust laws but, except in 1947 when the Taft-Hartley Act was passed, the proposals were soon forgotten.

In the latest move, the Supreme Court has agreed to open up the question of labor and the antitrust laws.

The court has agreed to review a 1950 agreement between the Mine Workers and the National Bituminous Coal Employers.

Under the terms of this agreement the union would not oppose automation of the mines provided that the operators give the workers a major wage raise and make a sizable increased payment to the UMW welfare fund.

The union agreed to demand comparable wage terms from other operators, not members of the association. The association operators agreed not to lease coal lands to non-union operators or to buy or sell coal from non-union mines.

The contention of the smaller operators, not members of the association and not party to the agreement, was that the contract amounted to a conspiracy between the large operators, who were members, and the UMW to suppress competition in the industry.

The Mine Workers, on the other hand, say that the agreement is legitimate collective bargaining, essential to protect the wage and working standards in the industry.

The Supreme Court has only agreed to review the issue which it had technically opened five years ago.

What is at stake is the latitude of collective bargaining—how far a union can go to protect the standards under which its members work. Of course, the courts have placed restrictions on this in the past in making secondary boycotts illegal, for example, but a decision that the coal agreement is a violation of the antitrust laws could be more sweeping.

Actually, in 1965 the Supreme Court heard an appeal of the smaller bituminous operators and was divided three ways. The case was remanded back to the circuit court which held that the 1950 pact did not violate the antitrust laws because the small operator did not show that the association and the union had engaged in a conspiracy with a "predatory interest."

The legal fight against unions was carried through the courts between 1806 and 1814 in Philadelphia, New York and Pittsburgh. The contention was that unions, in themselves, were a "conspiracy in restraint of trade" under an old English common law doctrine that combinations of workers to raise wages could be regarded as a conspiracy against the public.

EVENTUALLY WHEN UNIONS became lawful, union weapons such as strikes and boycotts were the subject of legal actions in the courts.

In 1890 the Sherman Antitrust Act was passed, directed at industry monopolistic and antitrust practices. However, the law was applied to unions so that it was necessary to enact the Clayton Antitrust Act in 1914.

This law stated that "the labor of a human is not a commodity or article of commerce" and that "no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States . . . in any case between an employer and employees . . . involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment, unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property, or to a property right . . . for which there is no adequate remedy at law. . . ."

Organized labor and its friends hailed the passage of this law. However, the congressional intent was undermined by conservative judicial interpretation. Much of this intent was restored by the Norris-LaGuardia Act in 1932 and the Wagner Act in 1935.

But efforts to saddle unions with the antitrust laws have never stopped. The Supreme Court will hear arguments on the coal case some time after the 1970-71 term opens in October.

Bicycle Makers Build Hazards In New Unconventional Models

By Sidney Margolius

BIKES ARE HAZARDOUS enough. Some 700 bike riders die every year in collisions with cars, in addition to the 34,000 reported non-fatal accidents many of which still cause serious injuries.

But bicycle manufacturers have added to the already-serious dangers with new models, such as those with small front wheels, low axles, long "banana" seats, and high wide handle bars. For example, doctors at the Children's Hospital in Cincinnati report increasing number of head and face injuries to children which they attribute to the popularity of this new type of bike.

One of the problems is that the long banana seat encourages children to ride double, and that's always dangerous. Rear fender decks also encourage riding double. Another problem is that the high handle bars make a bike harder to control.

The small front wheels also add to the danger by encouraging acrobatics, and here some manufacturers are doubly responsible. Their ads, too, encourage such unsafe use. Alan Cleveland, editor of Everybody's Money, the credit union magazine, charges that bike manufacturers sell bikes "by advertising the stunting aspects over and over. Then they give lip service to bike safety with a few lines tucked in the back of the maintenance booklet."

Another problem, Cleveland says, is that when a kid slides back on that long banana seat, he can lift the front wheel off the ground. Then he has no control at all over where the bike will go.

A study of bike hazards by the Cornell Aeronautical Laboratory for the National Commission on Product Safety found that while the highrise bike is more maneuverable it also is less stable at low speeds than conventional bikes. The small wheel must spin at a higher speed to provide the same gyroscopic stability.

R. S. Rice, of the Cornell Lab. also reported that other potential safety hazards include protuberances such as high handlebars, gear shift levers mounted on the frame, and seat backs. These can be bumped. They also make it harder for the rider to get free of the bike.

Bikes equipped with front wheel brakes can be stopped quicker than similar bikes equipped with coaster brakes. But in some situations, as when a kid stands upright on the pedals, hard front-wheel braking can lead to forward pitch-over. Hard rear-wheel braking is more easily handled.

Among the worst of new design features on bikes are gear shift levers and brake handles placed on the frame instead of the safer location on the handlebar.

Another feature which has been criticized is the steering wheel in place of ordinary handlebars. The conventional handlebars are believed to be safer to use.

ONE OF THE WORST examples of unnecessary neglect of safety in design of bikes is lack of reflective paint. James Ellers, a Memphis-Shelby county health officer, reported the death of a bike rider hit by a car one evening. The driver said he did not see the child until he was about 20 feet away.

Recently manufacturers have announced they will use reflective paint on bikes. It only took 100 years of bike manufacture to make that obvious decision.

At least make sure that your own children's bikes not only have front and rear reflectors but reflective tape or other reflecting materials on the side.

To give the manufacturers any possible credit, they report they have eliminated some potential defects in construction, and have adopted a wider pedal flat so that pedals can be tightened securely at home with a C-wrench.

Keeping a bike well maintained also is vital for safety. It is important to make sure the pedal is butted firmly against the crank. Loose handlebars, improper fit as the child grows, improper brake adjustment—all can produce potential safety problems.

Including Depreciation:

Car Mileage Costs Placed at 11.9 Cents

THE BIGGEST EXPENSE in running a car is the cost of depreciation and maintenance. The average American motorist also pays more for his garage, parking and tolls than he pays to maintain his share of the nation's highways through taxes.

The cost per mile of operating a car has just been released by the Federal Highway Administration of the Dept. of Transportation. The study shows it costs the average motorist 11.9 cents per mile to own and operate his car.

Depreciation accounts for 3.2 cents of the total; maintenance, accessories, parts and tires cost another 1.9 cents. Gas and oil cost 1.9 cents; insurance 1.7 cents; 1.8 cents goes for garage, parking and toll fees and 1.4 cents for state, federal and local taxes.

The study is based on a $3,185 car driven 100,000 miles over a 10-year life span. Few motorists drive a car for 10 years, but the department assumes that the average auto is sold or traded three or more times and is on the road that long.

The analysis involved a 1970, four-door sedan owned by a Baltimore family. Motorists in Boston, Washington, San Francisco or New York would have a higher per-mile cost; while those in Atlanta, Jacksonville or Fort Worth would pay less.

The proportionately low amount spent for taxes dashes the contention of the gasoline industry that the biggest part of the motorist's gas and oil bill goes for taxes.

IN MOST STATES, says the department, auto taxes are used entirely for highways.

Careful drivers who keep their cars in good operating condition pay less than those who ignore oil changes and lubrication jobs while indulging in tire-screeching stops and starts.

The cost per mile is higher in the earlier years of ownership because of depreciation, but the per-mile cost remains fairly constant over the 10 years because rising maintenance costs offset lower depreciation.

According to department figures it cost $11,890 over the 10 years to operate the studied car which broke down like this: $3,185—original cost; $1,733—7,200 gallons of gasoline; $543—replacement tires, oil; $1,722—insurance; $1,521—maintenance and repairs; $1,805—parking and tolls; $1,353—taxes. # Steady Diet of X-Rated Movies Swells Urge for Old Smoothies

By Jane Goodsell

WHAT EVER BECAME of the dashing, glamorous movie heroes of yore?

They don't seem to be around anymore.

Remember how debonair Fred Astaire used to look in top hat and tails?

And how devilishly clever Leslie Howard as The Scarlet Pimpernel was at outwitting his enemies and escaping from jails.

Time was when you could spot a hero instantly because he was Ray Milland being his usual suave self, or Clark Gable being manly and tough, or Gary Cooper playing Gary Cooper being strong and tight-lipped and brave.

But today's hero is likely to be somebody you never heard of playing a grade-school dropout without a job, with a tubercular cough, and in need of a shave.

Clearly, he's not the sort who'd know how to address a butler or how to rescue Fay Wray from the clutches of King Kong.

Because he's such a loser that he can't even order a cup of coffee and a sandwich without something going wrong.

Unlike Charles Boyer and Cary Grant who could sweep any female spectacularly off her feet,

Modern film protagonists look like men you wouldn't notice if you passed them on the street.

In fact, they are so natural and unglamorized that most of them look and act worse'n

The average, run-of-the-mill, maladjusted person.

They have two-day beards, nervous tics, bitten fingernails, insomnia and fits of depression,

Not to mention drug habits, unresolved Oedipal conflicts and chronic indigestion.

WHEN MYRNA LOY and William Powell played Nick and Nora Charles in the Thin Man series, their marriage was gay and sophisticated.

But nowadays, film couples are almost never happily mated.

Their emotional relationships (you can't call them romances) are super-realistic:

Either dreary and frustrating or violently sado-masochistic.

Nobody ever says anything amusing and witty.

Love is sex, boiled down to the nitty-gritty.

It's doubtless true that contemporary films are much more adult, significant, frank and true-to-life than those superficial movies they used to make way back when.

But I can't help thinking it would be fun to see a silly, insignificant movie like "My Man Godfrey" or "Bringing Up Baby" or "Flying Down to Rio" now and then.

Panel Urges State Laws:

Union Rights Asked For Public Employes

States, counties and cities should be required by law to bargain with unions representing their workers, a blue ribbon panel of labor relations experts declared.

A report by the Task Force on Labor Disputes in Public Employment stressed that union representation and written contracts are good for both management and workers. And while there are differences between the public and private sectors, workers everywhere have a "fundamental right" to union representation.

The task force was established by the 20th Century Fund, a prestigious research foundation.

Its report recommended that these principles be written into state or local laws dealing with labor relations in the public sector:

- Exclusive recognition of a union chosen by the majority in a bargaining unit.
- An obligation on the part of the public employer to negotiate with the union and to embody agreements in a written contract.
- Establishment of grievance machinery providing final adjudication of grievances by impartial arbitration.
- When an impasse develops at the bargaining table, first mediation and then a fact-finding process by an impartial panel would be utilized.
- "An agency independent of executive control and subject only to court review" would be created "to assure compliance with these provisions and to administer a code of public employe labor relations."

Panel members agreed to disagree on whether all strikes of public employes should be prohibited by law. They did agree, however, that police and fire fighters should not be permitted to strike and that strikes should be banned until the process of bargaining, mediation and fact-finding has been exhausted.

Task force members, listed alphabetically, were: Archibald Cox, Harvard law professor and former U.S. solictor general; Charles C. Killingsworth, chairman of Michigan State University's economics department and former president of the Industrial Relations Research Association; Joseph A. Loftus, special assistant to the Secretary of Labor and former New York Times labor reporter; John W. Macy, Jr., president of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting and former U.S. Civil Service Commission chairman; Cornell Law School Prof. Walter E. Oberer; William Simkin, former director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service; University of Pennsylvania Prof. George W. Taylor, former chairman of the National War Labor Board, and University of Wisconsin Chancellor H. Edwin Young. Saul Wallen, arbitrator and president of the New York Urban Coalition, served on the panel until his death last August.

The staff included Merlyn S. Pitzele, former chairman of the New York State Mediation Board, and Brown University Prof. Philip Taft, noted labor historian.

From one viewpoint, the task force's report merely states a number of broadly-accepted principles, including a conservative assertion of the limits on areas of contract agreement in the public sector as compared with the private sector.

But it steps out firmly in front of the recent report of the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations, whose recommendations were termed a backward step by public employe unions.

The commission, made up of local, state and federal officials, proposed merely that public employers "meet and confer" with unions. And it said state and local laws should bar strikes, prohibit agreement on a union shop, and spell out a long list of "management rights" that can't be bargained away.

The 20th Century Fund task force report cited "a rising and increasingly insistent demand by public employes in all sections of the country for the right to participate more effectively in decisions affecting their compensation and working conditions."

It termed collective bargaining machinery "essential" to all levels of government.

The report stressed the importance of minimizing the number of disputes that pose a strike threat and made this recommendation:

"Disputes should be subject to intense and continuing negotiations between the parties until all hope of agreement in that forum is exhausted. Then the techniques of mediation should be applied. And if that fails it should be followed by fact-finding that will recommend the terms on which the disagreeing parties should end their dispute."

British Teachers Union Affiliates with TUC

London—Britain's National Union of Teachers has voted 162,052 to 74,577 at its annual convention to affiliate with the Trades Union Congress. Affiliation makes the NUT the second largest white collar union in the TUC.

Although the union has affiliated for 318,000 members, about 243,000 of these are engaged in teaching. Other members include students and retired members.

In contrast to the all-male National Association of Schoolmasters, which joined TUC about two years ago, the NUT recruits members from both sexes.

GIVE-AND-TAKE BULL SESSION on trade union issues is conducted at a League for Industrial Democracy student institute at Morgantown, W. Va. Facing the students are William Du Chessi, left, legislative director of the Textile Workers Union of America, and Donald Slaiman, AFL-CIO civil rights director.

Campus Institute Brings Students In Tune with Labor's Social Goals

Morgantown, W. Va.—Organized labor's programs and policies tuned to its continuing drive for social progress were spelled out to more than 100 college students at a three-day institute here.

Participants came from the University of West Virginia, Glenville and Fairmont State Colleges and New York City area schools for the program set up by the League for Industrial Democracy, a labor-supported educational organization.

The efforts of labor to improve social conditions for all were described by Michael Harrington, chairman of the league and a noted author. Other key speakers pinpointed the labor programs in various sectors of the society.

Because of the response, the LID institute was viewed as a full-blown success, the league reported. One graduate student from the University of West Virginia commented: "A new appreciation of the trade union movement as a progressive social and political force replaces my rather stereotyped idea of unionism."

The attendance and enthusiasm, the league said, "convince us that there is a new openness among young people to the ideas and programs of the labor movement."

The drive for improving public education, particularly in the inner cities, was detailed by AFL-CIO Education Dir. Walter G. Davis. He said that efforts must be made to strengthen the Teacher Corps, which was being neglected by the Nixon Administration.

Dir. Donald R. Slaiman of the federation's Dept. of Civil Rights warned that inadequate enforcement of civil rights legislation by the Justice Dept. and the abandoning of integration efforts by some liberals could lead to the start of a counter-revolution in civil rights.

Slaiman also detailed the successful AFL-CIO campaigns that helped block the Senate confirmation of Judges Clement F. Haynsworth and G. Harrold Carswell to the Supreme Court.

Turning to political action, William Du Chessi, legislative director of the Textile Workers Union of America, chided those students and liberals who abandoned the Democratic presidential ticket in 1968. Their failure to support Hubert H. Humphrey had alienated many trade unionists from the traditional labor-liberal coalition and paved the way for a Republican victory, Du Chessi suggested.

He called on the students to help rebuild the labor-liberal-civil rights alliance as the best hope for political progress in the Seventies.

Pres. Claude Ramsay of the Mississippi AFL-CIO discussed the problems of labor in the South by exploring "the conspiracy to deny workers their legal right to organize into unions."

But because of a unified effort, the labor movement recently succeeded in killing a bill in the state legislature that would have outlawed public employe strikes. The measure provided for the immediate firing of a public employe for striking and severe restrictions on him if he were rehired.

Public attitudes on the rights of government workers are shifting toward the better, noted Jules Bernstein, associate general counsel of the Laborers.

Bernstein, who participated in the recent postal pay raise negotiations, said that "it is no longer considered treasonous for public employes to demand the same rights of collective bargaining that other workers enjoy."

However, the problems of unionists in the public sector became highly evident when a stand-in speaker appeared for Teachers Pres. David Selden.

Selden is serving a jail sentence for his participation in the successful AFT strike at Newark, N.J. Pinch-hit speaker John Schmid, director of AFT state federations, described the union's efforts in organizing secondary school teachers.

Ways & Means Hearings to Weigh Overhaul of Foreign Trade Laws

Proposals that add up to a complete overhaul of the nation's trade laws will be the subject of hearings before the House Ways & Means Committee early next month.

In one way or another, all of the measures deal with the deterioration of America's trade position and its adverse impact on U.S. industries and jobs.

The AFL-CIO has emphasized that a battery of new trade policies and mechanisms is needed to alleviate harsh effects on different groups of workers and provide an "orderly expansion of trade."

The trade issue drew added attention after House Ways & Means Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) introduced an omnibus bill that would include new import quotas for textiles and shoes.

These, however, are but two of the industries in which workers have been displaced by the sharp increase in imports—many of them the products of U.S. firms who have set up abroad to take advantage of wages as low as 15 cents an hour.

Scores of bills to establish import quotas in other industries and authorize the President to enter into trade agreements have been introduced in the House.

Among the products they would apply to are foodstuffs, steel, glass, electronics, ceramic tile, leather goods, meat and fish, bicycles, ball bearings, metal containers, as well as shoes and textiles.

The Administration also is sponsoring trade legislation. Its measure does not provide for any quotas, but would make modest revisions in the trade laws and methods of providing assistance to workers and industries affected by imports.

The AFL-CIO has emphasized that "an effective and workable mechanism" to aid workers who are harshly affected by imports must be adopted by Congress "as an integral part of the nation's trade policy."

The federation has called for revision of the Trade Expansion Act of 1962 to make it easier for workers to qualify for assistance, and specify clearly the objective of protecting jobs and labor standards.

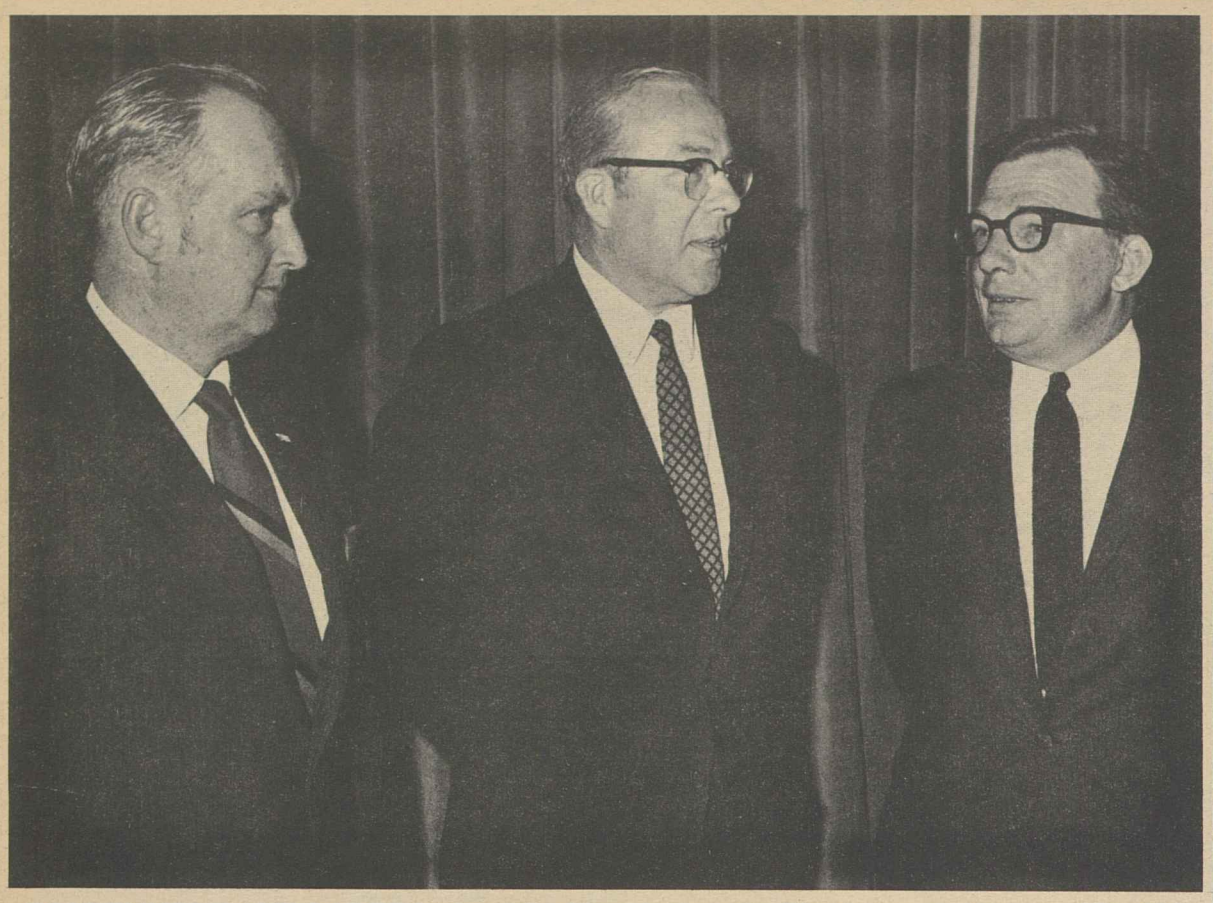
In other areas, the AFL-CIO seeks enforcement of laws that apply to unfair competition from abroad, such as anti-dumping measures; adequate labeling of foreign products and foreign-made components, and safeguards against tariff cutting.

Labor also has urged repeal of Section 807 of the Tariff Code which lets U.S. firms ship components to another nation, assemble them into the finished product there, and then ship the products back into the United States at a low tariff.



This loophole has become the basis for industries that are "exporting" U.S. jobs to Mexico, as well as exploiting workers in that country, the AFL-CIO has charged.

The U.S. runaways who are setting up plants there are able to reap huge profits on low wages and tariffs with no advantage to consumers, since they never lower prices, it has been pointed out.

Labor further wants the government to regulate U.S.-based multi-national companies spreading around the world.

The recent conference on trade sponsored by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. heard many speakers describe how these multinational firms juggle wages, prices, profits, dividends, exports and imports beyond the control of any nation.

These "are not trade relations among nations—they are company transactions," AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger declared. But by any name, he added, "they have been a major factor in U.S. trade deterioration."

For Government Employes:

Postal Pact Viewed As 'Breakthrough'

The AFL-CIO Government Employes Council celebrated its 25th anniversary at a banquet in Washington by looking back on a fruitful life and focusing on the prospects for further achievements and growth.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland told the organization that it has become a "vital asset" in society but "the progress you have made is only the beginning."

Kirkland emphasized that the "breakthrough" made in the recent agreement covering postal workers—an assurance of true collective bargaining—must be extended until it covers all government employes. (Excerpts, Page 6.)

Prospects ahead also appeared to be the dominant subject of conversation among 275 leaders in government unions, federal agencies and members of Congress who attended the dinner.

Pres. Nixon sent a message to the gathering commending the council on its important role and expressing appreciation "for the valuable contributions you are making to improve federal labor-management relations."

"As the council celebrates its 25th anniversary of service," Nixon said, "you can look back on a rewarding record of accomplishment which has realized more substantive changes in federal personnel policies than have occurred in any comparable period of our history. And you can take pride in having helped to bring these changes about."

GEC Chairman George J. Knaly described the founding of the council on Apr. 11, 1945, as an organization under the old AFL designated to coordinate the legislative activities of government employes' unions.

Then its 18 member unions represented about 250,000 workers in the federal government. Now its 34 affiliates represent more than 1 million classified, postal and wage board employes in the federal service.

"It can be said today, as at the time of its inception," Knaly observed, "that one of the basic purposes of the council is to serve as coordinating organization on federal employe legislation."

Knaly predicted that the organization and its member unions "will in the years just ahead become far more deeply involved in helping to better the life of government workers."

Kirkland reviewed the bargaining by representatives of government and labor that led to the agreement calling for a two-step wage boost for the nation's 700,000 postal workers and future collective bargaining on wages, hours and working conditions.

"I believe that the public wanted a solution that would give the postal workers a chance to resist being victimized, and that the public saw collective bargaining as the only solution that would stick," Kirkland declared.

As for the rest of the government employes, Kirkland continued, they also should be guaranteed the right to collective bargaining "on all issues that would normally be subject to collective bargaining in the private sector."

The AFL-CIO will work toward securing that right throughout the federal sector as "the sure route" to workers' progress, Kirkland concluded. "And with your help that great aim will surely be realized."

Handicapped Workers Exploited As Underpayments Rise Sharply

A sharp increase in illegal underpayment of wages to handicapped workers by so-called sheltered workshops was reported by the Labor Dept.'s Wage-Hour Division for the last half of 1969.

Investigations by compliance officers disclosed a doubling of the number of workers found underpaid and tripling of the amounts due, in comparison with the last half of 1968.

Federal Wage-Hour Administrator Robert D. Moran put the figures at $336,000 below the amounts actually due some 2,000 workshop clients.

The findings, Moran said, "clearly reveal the continuing need for vigilance by wage-hour enforcement officials to make sure that workshop clients receive proper wages" and to prevent such workshops from competing unfairly with regular industry.

He said the division will "work more closely with these workshops" in the future to make sure they comply with the law.

Sheltered workshop certificates are issued to permit payment to certain handicapped workers of minimum wage rates below those set by the Fair Labor Standards Act.

As of Dec. 20, 1969, there were 1,329 sheltered workshops certified by the Labor Dept. Approximately 65,000 handicapped workers were employed in the shops at the time they applied for certificates.

The increase in underpayments by sheltered workshops follows a pattern of rising violations of the federal wage-hour law generally.

Last year the AFL-CIO called on the Labor Dept. to increase its investigative staff by at least one third. No additional money for inspections was budgeted by either the Johnson or Nixon administrations, and the 1970-71 Nixon budget contains no request for additional funds for that purpose.

Last August Federation Pres. George Meany, citing the increase in employer violations, called on all state and city central labor bodies to set up committees to help assure the "effective enforcement of the minimum wage laws."

The 1967 AFL-CIO convention noted in a resolution that although wage standards of sheltered workshops are covered by the federal wage law, "this law permits payment of sub-minimum wages when the Wage-Hour Division of the U.S. Dept. of Labor grants permission to do so."

Such permission, the resolution observed, "has been widely sought and readily granted, in many instances resulting in undesirably low wages for sheltered shopworkers."

The convention declared that "sheltered workshops have a responsibility to the handicapped to give them more than work alone. They must provide work with wages consistent with self-respect and self-support."

Where shopworkers' wages are a "mere pittance," it continued, "the community will hold the abilities of sheltered shopworkers in low regard, at the same time giving the workshops an unhealthy reputation as sweatshops."

The convention voted to continue supporting sheltered workshop programs whenever they meet designated standards. The responsibility for setting and enforcing those standards, it said, "is the responsibility of the government agencies designated by law to assume that responsibility."

Atlanta Rejects Offers To End SCME Strike

Atlanta—A strike against city hall by the State, County & Municipal Employes has entered its second month as the union attempts to get a 10-cent-an-hour raise for 3,300 municipal workers.

More than 2,000 workers walked off their jobs Mar. 17 after negotiations broke down. With community support growing, marches backing the striking workers have been conducted almost daily.

Meanwhile, a series of wide-ranging proposals — including an offer by SCME to acquire a $500,000 loan for the city to cover the costs of the wage increase—were rejected or totally ignored by Mayor Sam Massell, the union said.

SCME is asking that the $4-a-week raise be retroactive to Jan. 19. The increase would be the third step of a wage package negotiated earlier on which the city reneged, the union said.

A number of confrontations have erupted in the past two weeks among strikers, police and workers who have refused to honor union picket lines.

About 125 striking union members and their supporters have been arrested in the month-long walkout. Decisions are pending on most cases.

However, five SCME members, including two international officials, received jail sentences. They had been arrested on a contempt of court charge of "interfering with working city employes" and failure to limit the number of pickets in their protests.

Judge Charles A. Wofford of the Fulton County Superior Court found all five guilty on the contempt charge.

Judge Wofford issued 20-day jail sentences to P. J. Ciampa of the SCME organizing staff; William Lucy executive assistant to SCME Pres. Jerry Wurf, and Nathaniel Osby, a member of SCME Local 1644. Pres. Claude Holt of Local 1644 and local member Joseph Leatherwood received 10-day jail sentences. All were released on bond.

The Southern Christian Leadership Conference has been building support in the Negro community of Atlanta for the strikers through rallies and candlelight marches. Most of the striking city workers are black.

George Davis Dies, A CWA Founder

George R. Davis, veteran member of the Communications Workers and first secretary-treasurer of the former National Association of Telephone Equipment Workers, died at 79 in Arlington, Va.

Davis helped bring his association into the groups that formed CWA in 1947, and attended many CWA assemblies as a national delegate from the Washington distributing house of the Western Electric Co. He was a company employe from 1922 to his retirement in 1955.

L. A. Teachers' Strike Protests Funds Slash

Los Angeles—Teachers walked picket lines in front of 600 public schools here in a strike for increased state support of local school systems.

The United Teachers of Los Angeles called on 22,000 union and non-union members to walk out in protest against continuing cutbacks in school funds over the last five years. They will stay out, despite a court order to return, until they get a fair settlement, UTLA leaders said.

UTLA came into existence Feb. 1 through a merger of Local 1021, AFL-CIO American Federation of Teachers, and the Association of Classroom Teachers, affiliated with the National Education Association. Both parent groups are supporting the strike.

AFT Dir. of Organization James E. Mundy said at the union's Washington, D.C., headquarters that several AFT staff representatives have been assigned to assist the striking teachers.

The merger is the first continuing amalgamation of two major teacher organizations. The strike, therefore, is considered a test of the UTLA's ability to unite 25,000 Los Angeles school employes over the one-year merger trial period.

There is no law in California barring teachers from striking, but Superior Court Judge Richard Schauer issued a temporary restraining order at the request of the Board of Education. UTLA Pres. Robert Ransom said the organization will contest the order on constitutional grounds.

Teachers say the schools are caught in a vise of increasing demands and decreasing public support. They object to 15-year-old textbooks, unpainted classrooms, growing class sizes and inadequate state support for schools.

The state now pays 28 percent of the cost of running Los Angeles schools. Ten years ago the state paid 50 percent, and school supporters are asking voters to restore the 50 percent formula in a statewide referendum June 1.

Gov. Ronald Reagan is "vigorously opposed," according to news reports. Property owners, too, have been defeating proposals for increased school support. The most recent such defeat was on Mar. 17, when Los Angeles voters turned down a temporary boost in school taxes.

Teacher protests also led to walkouts by AFT union locals in Minneapolis, Boston and Butte, Mont. Boston Local 66 staged a one-day walkout among 3,400 teachers for improved wages and conditions.

Butte Local 332 stayed out until school officials agreed that where qualifications of teaching applicants are relatively equal, Butte residents will be given preference in hiring.

Minneapolis Local 59 stayed on strike in a dispute over wages, class size, seniority, discipline, and more preparation periods for elementary school teachers. The union represents about 2,200 of the school district's 3,400 teachers.

House Votes Reform Of Welfare System

seeking an opportunity to improve the bill, joined in voting against a no-amendment procedure.

Appealing to his fellow-southerners to support the bill and oppose efforts to weaken it, Mills said 50 percent of poor working families are in the South and 70 percent are white.

With the procedural hurdle out of the way, the bill won easy final passage, 243-155.

The bill would replace the present program of Aid to Families with Dependent Children with a new system of family assistance allowances.

A family on welfare would receive a basic federal payment of $500 a year for each of the first two family members and $300 for each additional person—amounting to $1,600 a year for a family of four.

Persons of working age in the family, except for mothers of preschool children, would be required to register for jobs or training if available.

As an incentive for states to supplement the federal program, the federal government would pay 30 percent of additional benefits up to the current poverty level, which amounts to about $3,550 for a family of four.

Federal benefits would be gradually reduced if one or more members of the family had earnings from work. There would be no reduction for the first $720 a year of earnings and thereafter benefits would be cut 50 cents for each dollar earned.

Current public assistance programs have two major components —aid to families with dependent children (AFDC), and adult assistance programs for the aged, the blind and the disabled.

Both programs are administered by the states, or by localities under state supervision, with widely varying eligibility standards, benefit levels and work referral requirements.

For a family of four, AFDC benefits range from an average of $44 a month in Mississippi to $264 in New Jersey. Adult public assistance benefits average $40 a month in Mississippi to $160 for the blind in California.

About 1.7 million families—made up of 6.7 million individuals —receive AFDC payments. Another 3 million persons receive assistance under the programs for aged, blind and disabled.

The new bill provides a minimum payment of $110 a month for aged, blind and disabled persons who have no other income. It would raise the coverage under that program from 3 to 4 million.

The family assistance program would expand benefit coverage from less than 7 million persons currently to about 20 million persons. It defines a family as two or more people living together, at least one of whom is a dependent child.

Each member of a family able to work would be required to register for employment or training with their state employment service except for mothers of pre-school children, and mothers of older children where the father registers, and persons caring for an ill member of the household.

The bill requires that child care facilities be available for mothers taking training or jobs. It provides full federal funding of the cost of day care centers.

States whose payments under the present AFDC program are above the federal minimum in the new family assistance plan would be required to supplement the family assistance benefits up to the present state level or the poverty level, whichever is lower.

IUD Presses Atlanta On Fair Strike Accord

The executive committee of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. voiced "strong support of the municipal employes' strike in Atlanta," it was announced by IUD Pres. I. W. Abel.

The IUD called on the mayor of Atlanta "to proceed at once to work out a fair and equitable settlement of this dispute between the union and the city government."

In another action relating to the rejection of Judge Carswell for the Supreme Court, the IUD expressed "gratitude to the members of the Senate who withstood intense political pressure in order to preserve the constitutional rights of the Senate and to express their belief in high standards for appointments to the judiciary."

Strong support also was voted for a new occupational health and safety bill introduced by Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.) and a number of co-sponsors. Abel said the IUD would undertake a major campaign in support of the measure, which he described as "vitally necessary to protect the workers of America on the job from crippling disease and from preventable accidents."

In the wake of the IUD's Conference on "The Developng Crisis in International Trade," Abel appointed a new IUD Committee on International Trade, headed by Pres. Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

Other members of the group are Pres. George Fecteau of the United Shoe Workers, Vice Pres. Joseph Molony of the Steelworkers, Pres. Lester Null of the Potters, Pres. Charles Pillard of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Pres. William Pollock of the Textile Workers Union of America, Pres. Floyd Smith of the Machinists, Pres. Louis Stulberg of the Ladies' Garment Workers, Pres. Peter Bommarito of the Rubber Workers, Vice Pres. Howard Samuel of the Clothing Workers and Pres. Ralph Reiser of the Glass & Ceramic Workers.

Noting the forthcoming 25th anniversary, on June 26, of the signing of the charter of the United Nations, and of the "leading role" played by organized labor in the creation of the UN, the IUD called on affiliated unions to "reaffirm their faith and hope" in the United Nations. It called for labor participation in the celebration of the quarter-century anniversary to be sponsored by the United Nations Association of the United States.

Toy Workers Increase Per Capita Payments

Grossinger, N.Y.—A special convention of the Dolls, Toys, Playthings, Novelties & Allied Products union voted to raise monthly per capita payments by 15 cents per member and to give organizing efforts top priority in the decade ahead.

The delegates voted unanimously for a program of activity recommended by Pres. Louis Isaacson and made several changes in the union's constitution to make the program easier of accomplishment.

Isaacson reported that membership has risen to 32,000, an all-time high, and that other gains have been made in collective bargaining and organizing since the death of the late Pres. Harry O. Damino two years ago.

Among the changes were an increase in minimum monthly local union dues to $6, and the election of Vice Pres. Julius Isaacson to the new post of executive vice president.

The convention, with 302 delegates present from locals around the nation, adopted 27 resolutions calling for action in the legislative, political and economic fields.

One called for imposing mandatory quotas on toys and similar products to curb the sharp rise of imports from Japan, Taiwan, Hong Kong and other areas whose "coolie wage structure" has brought a "massive penetration of the American market and undermined the standards we have built up" over many years.

The delegates commended the AFL-CIO and its Maritime Trades Dept. for championing fair trade policies.

They urged full support for the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education of the AFL-CIO, an increase in the federal minimum wage to $2 an hour, improved unemployment insurance, and the defeat of U.S. Appeals Judge G. Harrold Carswell as a Supreme Court justice. The latter action was taken before the Senate rejected Carswell's nomination.

State Atty. Gen. Louis Lefkowitz outlined measures taken by his staff to protect New Yorkers from credit card abuses and victimization of consumers by fraud.

A memorial session of the convention eulogized the late Pres. Damino as the first order of union business.

Meany Endorses Cancer Crusade

Affiliates and union members were urged by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to take part in the 1970 crusade of the American Cancer Society, held annually in April.

"We want to do our part to help fight this disease," Meany said in his letter of endorsement to the Cancer Society national chairman, Fess Parker.

Meany pointed out that the fight against cancer is vital because 1.5 million Americans who were cured of the disease are living today—although, 100,000 cancer patients died last year. They might have been saved by earlier and better treatment, he said.

Trade Impact Qualifies 150 For Benefits

Another group of Steelworkers has been certified eligible for adjustment benefits under the Trade Expansion Act of 1962 as a result of losing jobs because of the rise in imports.

Certification was made by the Labor Dept. for approximately 150 workers who became unemployed on or after Jan. 18, 1969, at the Pinole Point, Calif., plant of the Bethlehem Steel Corp.

The department said its action follows a finding by the Tariff Commission that the employes lost their jobs because of increased imports of steel transmission towers and parts.

Fourth Certification

This marks the fourth instance in recent months in which the department has issued such certification for Steelworkers.

The three prior cases were announced last December and involved two plants of U.S. Steel Corp., in Los Angeles and Pittsburgh, and an Ambridge, Pa., plant of Armco Steel Corp. The U.S. Steel plants made steel transmission towers, the Armco plant made welded pipe.

Those certifications, making some 600 workers eligible for assistance, were the first of their kind, as was the commission's ruling that preceded the certifications.

Prior to that, the commission rejected all requests for relief under what AFL-CIO had charged was a narrow, overly rigid interpretation of the law.

Worker assistance under the law provides for cash readjustment allowances, testing, counseling, training and job placement, plus relocation if needed and desired.

Cash Allowances

The cash readjustment allowance for certified workers is equal to 65 percent of the worker's average weekly wage, not to exceed 65 percent of the national average weekly wage in manufacturing. This makes the maximum weekly benefit now $85.

Duration of payments is normally limited to 52 weeks, but up to 26 additional weeks may be allowed to permit workers to complete approved training courses. Up to 13 additional weeks are permitted for workers who were over 60 when separated from their jobs.

To be eligible for benefits, a worker must have been employed at the Pinole Point plant for six months of the year prior to his layoff and must have been gainfully employed for at least half of the previous three years.

Half-Loaf Bill:

House Votes Funds For Aid to Education

The House followed the cautious lead of its Appropriations Committee and voted a half-loaf bill to finance school and college aid programs for the fiscal year starting July 1.

The $4.1 billion appropriation is $319 million above the President's budget request—and about the same amount over this year's appropriation. But it is billions of dollars less than the amount Congress authorized to be spent just a few weeks ago, in a bill the President signed "with considerable reluctance" and a warning against congressional enactment of "this unrealistic level of appropriations."

As an example of the gap, the House bill provides $1.9 billion for all programs under the Elementary & Secondary Education Act—only 26 percent of the $7.2 billion authorized.

The House bill also includes a series of anti-civil rights amendments, intended to force the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare to accept so-called "freedom of choice" plans intended to perpetuate dual school systems.

Labor and education groups sought to rally support on the House floor for amendments both increasing the amount of the funds and knocking out the obstacles to school desegregation.

But liberal congressmen were absent when the votes were needed and all the efforts were beaten on non-record teller votes.

A final attempt to add $191 million to the bill—including $92 million for college aid programs and an additional $80 million for "impact" aid to schools attended by children of servicemen and federal employes—was beaten, 121-103.

The closest vote on a civil rights issue was the 101-87 defeat of an attempt to delete the freedom of choice provision.

Although the effort to knock it out supposedly had the support of the Administration, most Republicans joined southern Democrats to keep it in the bill.

At an earlier stage of the bill, efforts to add money to specific programs were stymied when sponsors of the amendments were ruled out of order because the clerk had read past those portions of the bill before they got the floor.

Before the House action, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller had informed congressmen of the AFL-CIO's "deep disappointment" in the "mischievous" anti-desegregation provisions. Their enactment, he warned, "could only encourage the small percentage of school officials and others who have refused to eliminate unconstitutional practices and racial discrimination in their school systems."

Biemiller noted that the Appropriations Committee "has been more responsive than in the past to education's critical financial needs."

The money bill now goes to the Senate, where efforts will be made to increase the amount of federal funds and drop the anti-civil rights provisions.

In other congressional action:

- The Senate voted 79-1 approval of a labor-backed bill making it illegal to send credit cards to anyone who has not applied for one.
- The House Labor Committee continued its consideration of occupational health and safety legislation. It has before it a labor-supported bill approved by a subcommittee under Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.) which would give the Labor Dept. the power both to set safety standards and to enforce them, subject to court review.

Committee Republicans moved to substitute an Administration bill that would establish an independent board to set the standards and otherwise limit federal powers. But the motion was beaten on a 20-14 party-line vote.

Rank-and-File Workers Spur Drive to Catch Up

New York—Rank-and-file workers are demanding sizable wage increases to recoup their losses from price increases, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany pointed out to businessmen here.

That is a lesson to be learned from current negotiations and labor unrest in many industries across the nation, Meany said at a luncheon meeting of the Commerce & Industry Association of New York.

Meany spoke mainly about labor's "greatest concern at the moment"—a disturbing picture of increasing inflation, increasing unemployment and a general breakdown in the economy.

The past two years, he noted, have witnessed a number of examples of union negotiators reaching tentative settlements in collective bargaining only to have the terms rejected by the members directly affected.

There are likely to be more such examples in the future, he warned, because they reflect the determination of union members to recoup what they have lost through inflation since their previous contracts were negotiated.

Coupled with the loss of workers' purchasing power as prices go up and up, Meany said, is the problem of a deepening business slump and rising unemployment.

"This is a phenomenon that very few of the economists contemplated or predicted, but this is what we really have," Meany said.

He charged that the slump combined with inflation is due to the Administration's "severe squeeze on the economy" and its promotion and encouragement of "the highest interest rates since the Civil War."

Two particular areas in which Administration policies have created hardships for workers and their families, he noted, are in housing—where most families have been priced out of the market—and in obtaining adequate medical care at skyrocketing costs.

The AFL-CIO president told the assembled business executives that labor is certain that the present inflation is "largely a profit inflation."

He cited figures showing that between 1960 and the first half of last year, after-tax corporate profits in the United States rose 93 percent while after-tax earnings of the average non-supervisory worker went up by only 34 percent.

Labor costs have gone up, Meany acknowledged, "but if you want to put first things first, then you have to look at the profits."

This is not the "classic inflation" of too few goods being chased by too much money, he said, but an inflation whose greatest beneficiaries "are the big banking corporations."

If the Administration continues to cling to policies that are causing simultaneous inflation and slump, the nation may soon reach a point where there will have to be new government controls applied, Meany said.

"I am not advocating it," he added, "I am merely saying that this is going to happen fairly soon unless there is a change in the overall picture."

The AFL-CIO has consistently made it clear, he stressed, that it will cooperate with controls if the President determines they are needed and if restraints are "equitably placed on all costs and income, including all prices, profits, dividends, rents and executive compensation, as well as wages."

"We are prepared to sacrifice as long as there is equality of sacrifice," he concluded.

3 Craft Unions Extend Pact on Prefab Houses

Three of the nation's largest craft unions—the Carpenters, the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers—have extended their landmark agreement for the factory production of modular and prefabricated housing into Hawaii and Alaska.

The Neidermeyer & Martin Co. of Portland, Ore., hopes to build more than 1,000 units in the outer islands of Hawaii and more than 300 units in Alaska bearing the Tri-Trades Union Label established by the three crafts.

When the unions signed their first factory-housing agreement with Prestige Structures, Inc., of Charlotte, Mich., late last year, Pres. Nixon and Sec. of Housing & Urban Development George Romney hailed it as a significant step forward to meet the increasingly desperate housing needs.

Because of the climate differences between Alaska and Hawaii, the Alaska housing will run about 25 percent higher and the cost range of the homes will be between $12,000 and $70,000, Edward Niedermeyer, president of the company, said.

Under the Tri-Trades Union Label agreement, when a unit leaves the plant it is accepted by the carpenters, plumbers and electricians wherever there is an organized union craft. At that point, where the home is delivered, it is installed and erected by local craftsmen at the prevailing wage rates of the craftsmen in that area.

Another important provision calls for the active employment and training of unskilled minority group members and unskilled workers.

Senate Adopts Spending Limit For TV-Radio Political Campaign

The Senate took a big first step to deflate the cost of political campaigns—and to prevent the candidate or party with the most money from blanketing the airwaves.

It approved, 58-27, a bill containing these key provisions:

- A ceiling on the amount of money any candidate for federal office can spend to buy television and radio time.
- A requirement that television and radio stations sell political campaign time at their lowest rate—the amount the stations charge to customers with long-term broadcasting contracts.
- Repeal of the equal time law for candidates for President and Vice President. This means that networks and individual stations could give free time in the public interest to major presidential candidates, without being obliged to give the same amount of time to every minor-party candidate.

The dollar ceiling on spending for broadcast time is set in the Senate bill at the higher of these alternatives: $20,000 or the number of votes cast for all candidates for that office in the preceding election multiplied by seven cents.

For most congressional elections, the $20,000 figure would apply. The ceiling for Senate contests would vary widely with the size of the state—nearly $490,000 in California and New York, but substantially less in most states. The spending limit would just apply to the purchase of the air time, not to the cost of preparing the film or producing the program.

The equal time provision of the Federal Communications Act had been suspended in the 1960 presidential campaign to make possible the series of Kennedy-Nixon televised debates.

Sen. John O. Pastore (D-R.I.), who sponsored the bill, told the Senate that the networks have promised to make prime time available to the major presidential candidates to use as they wish if the legislation is enacted. They will not insist on a debate formula, thus eliminating the controversy over whether an incumbent president should be required to debate his opponent.

Pastore estimated that the requirement that time be sold at a station's lowest rate would reduce costs by 30 to 50 percent.

"This is in the public interest," he told the Senate, "because the public is entitled to know the issues and the candidates."

With the Republican Party almost embarrassingly rich in resources and the Democratic National Committee struggling with a huge dollar debt from the last campaign, there were political overtones to the debate.

But while all 27 votes against the Pastore bill came from the GOP side of the aisle, 11 Republicans joined Democrats in voting for the bill.

Republican Sen. James B. Pearson (Kan.) said the bill "deserves passage on its merits and I would urge all those who feel financially secure at the moment to remember how quickly the tides of fortune can change."

He noted that the cost of all campaigns last year was estimated at $300 million, 50 percent higher than in 1964 and double the 1956 total.

Under the Pastore bill, presidential candidates in 1972 would be limited to about $5.1 million each for television and radio—in addition to whatever free time was provided.

In 1968, the winning Nixon-Agnew ticket spent about $12.6 million on radio and television while the Democratic Humphrey-Muskie ticket spent $6.1 million.

In 1964, however, it was the Democrats who outspent the Republicans in the presidential campaign.

NBC Network Reaches Pact With NABET

San Diego—The Broadcast Employes & Technicians reached agreement with the National Broadcasting Co. on terms of a new three-year agreement and sent it to membership referendum for acceptance or rejection by Apr. 27.

Terms of the pact will not be published until the votes are counted, NABET Vice Pres. George Maher said at the union's Washington office.

Negotiators initialed a tentative settlement in San Diego after postponing a union strike deadline at the request of Dir. J. Curtis Counts of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

The union represents 1,500 employes of NBC's coast-to-coast television and radio network. Major stations are in New York, Washington, Chicago, San Francisco and Hollywood, Calif.

Real Wages Cut Again by Price Jump

By Duane Emme

The buying power of workers' paychecks was below a year-ago levels again in March as the nation continued under its highest rate of inflation in nearly 20 years, the Labor Dept. reported.

The Consumer Price Index rose five-tenths of 1 percent to 133.2 percent of the 1957-59 average, meaning that goods and services worth $100 then cost $133.20 last month.

BLS computed the five-tenths of 1 percent price increase to a four-tenths increase seasonally adjusted. This compares with seasonally adjusted increases of five-tenths in February and four-tenths in January.

Leading the March index upward, the Bureau of Labor Statistics said, were sharp rises in mortgage interest rates for the second straight month and the largest monthly increase in medical care service in three and a half years.

As a whole, the March index was 6.1 percent higher than March 1969, making it the third straight month in which it has exceeded year-ago levels by more than 6 percent. In February it was up 6.3 percent; in January, 6.2 percent.

This is well above the rate of price increases last year when the index averaged 5.4 percent above the 1968 level. And last year's increase had been the highest since the Korean War year of 1951, when prices shot up 8 percent.

The gross average weekly earnings of production and non-supervisory workers were $117.55 in March, a gain of 68 cents from February and $5.88 over a year, BLS reported.

However, it added, after adjusting for price increases, gross earnings were up only slightly above a month ago and down 66 cents a week from March 1969.

Spendable earnings—average weekly pay after deduction of social security and federal income taxes—rose by 53 cents in March to $103.10 for the worker with three dependents. It was up 5.5 percent over the year.

Real spendable earnings—take-home pay expressed in 1957-59 dollars to reflect price changes—were virtually unchanged in March at $77.40 for the worker with three dependents.

These real earnings were down 1 cent over the month, 43 cents over the year and $1.83 from the record high in September 1968.

A BLS breakdown of price action showed that commodities have increased 4.9 percent over the year,

Meat Cutters Extend Pact To 2 Firms

Chicago—The Meat Cutters extended the benefits of their new 1970 packinghouse contract pattern to 18,000 employes of two more major companies, Armour & Co. and Wilson & Co.

Union Pres. Thomas J. Lloyd and Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman announced settlements with the two nationwide firms, subject to the approval of 9,000 Armour members in 33 locations and 9,000 Wilson members at 23 plants.

The economic improvements in both contracts are similar to those in a 41-month agreement which members at Swift & Co. plants in 28 states have just ratified.

They include general wage increases of 82 cents an hour spread across the contract term, cost-of-living reviews at yearly intervals, additional increases of 5 to 10 cents an hour for mechanical trades employes, and fringe-benefit improvements.

Vacations with pay were raised to two weeks after two years of service, instead of the present three years, and to three weeks after eight years instead of 10.

Pension benefits will be raised from $5 a month to $6 for each year of credited service as of next Jan. 1, and to $6.50 a month per year of service later.

The new agreements provide a higher schedule of payments for surgery, and other improvements in the hospitalization and medical care programs of the two companies.

Union and management negotiators agreed to narrow geographic differentials at Armour plants in Brownsville and Garland, Tex.,

Asks Action 'As Speedily As Possible'

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany asked Congress to write into law the postal reorganization and pay agreement negotiated by the seven unions holding nationwide exclusive bargaining rights for postal workers.

If the legislation is enacted, the 750,000 postal workers will receive an immediate 8 percent pay raise, a compression of the time required to move from the starting rate to the top salary bracket and —most importantly—full collective bargaining rights as part of a new United States Postal Service.

Meany told the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee that the legislation itself was evidence that "collective bargaining can and does work . . . between the government and its workers as well as between private employers and their workers."

He appeared before the committee on behalf of the AFL-CIO and all seven unions, including the unaffiliated Rural Letter Carriers.

The agreement embodied in the legislation, Meany said, is the product of "give-and-take on both sides of the collective bargaining table."

He urged that it be enacted by Congress "in its entirety as speedily as possible."

Meany also served notice to the committee that the AFL-CIO will seek similar collective bargaining rights for other groups of federal workers.

"In the very near future," he said, the AFL-CIO will be back "urging adoption of a measure that will insure genuine collective bar-

Labor Seeks Stiffer Air Pollution Curbs

Air pollution can and should be reduced by 50 percent over the next five years, the AFL-CIO said in congressional testimony urging a major expansion of federal pollution control programs.

Pollution is "a growing menace to public health" and to future generations of Americans, the federation told a Senate Public Works subcommittee.

George H. R. Taylor, an economist in the AFL-CIO's Dept. of Research, warned that present pollution control programs are "incapable of meeting the problem." The federal government's efforts "have been seriously curtailed by the lack of adequate funding."

Taylor backed a number of provisions of legislation introduced by Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.) as preferable to the Administration proposals.

The Muskie bill would authorize a steadily rising level of federal appropriations for air pollution control programs, from the $179 million ceiling set by the present law to $375 million for the 1972 fiscal year.

It would also broaden the scope of federal authority and provide stiffer maximum penalties for polluters.

The Administration bill would not commit the government to any level of expenditures, merely leaving it up to Congress to appropriate year-by-year "such sums as are necessary."

Taylor said the basic Clean Air Act of 1967 should be extended for a full five years, rather than the three years in the Muskie bill and the four years in the Administration proposal.

He suggested that as part of the five-year program, the federal government finance a $300 million research and development project aimed at producing a motor vehicle propulsion system that would be commercially feasible and eliminate the great bulk of the pollution from automobile engines. # Rubber Workers Strike Goodyear As Company Balks on New Terms

Akron—The Rubber Workers struck Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. plants in 15 cities when contracts expired without agreement on renewal.

While 23,000 employes picketed Goodyear facilities in 13 states, union committees continued negotiations on a day-to-day basis with three other members of the industry's Big Four—Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., the B. F. Goodrich Co. and Uniroyal Inc.

The Goodyear strike began after union bargainers, who had been authorized by members to call a strike, agreed that management had failed to make a meaningful effort to reach agreement in six weeks of contract talks.

Details of the company offer were not disclosed by either side. The union said management did include a wage increase in its proposal, but the company "package" was rejected mainly because of Goodyear's failure to make any offer on such issues as occupational health and safety improvements in rubber plants.

URW Pres. Peter Bommarito said the walkout resulted from the "unreasonable attitude" of Goodyear management in failing to meet the needs of its workers.

The company, he said, is "realizing the biggest profits" it has ever achieved but "is not willing to pass a fair measure of those profits along" to employes who made them possible.

The strike will continue, the union said, until Goodyear makes acceptable proposals in line with the economic facts.

Talks conducted in Cincinnati with the company were suspended temporarily. Other union committees met with Uniroyal management in Columbus, with Goodrich in the same Ohio city and with Firestone representatives in Cleveland.

Goodyear has major plants in Akron, North Chicago, Los Angeles and other cities. It has employes at other locations in Alabama, California, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, Massachusetts, Michi-

Carswell Quits Court to Seek Seat in Senate

By David L. Perlman

Political shock waves from the Senate rejection of the Supreme Court nomination of G. Harrold Carswell are being felt in both Florida and Washington.

In a surprise move, Carswell resigned as a judge of the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals and said he will seek the Republican nomination for the Senate. Florida's senior U.S. senator, Democrat Spessard L. Holland, is not running for re-election this year.

Carswell emerged as the hand-picked candidate of the state's two top Republican office-holders, Gov. Claude R. Kirk, Jr., and Sen. Edward J. Gurney.

But he will have to fight for the GOP nomination against Kirk's ents for new processes developed through government-financed research should remain with the federal government, Taylor declared.

Taylor said the new legislation should direct the Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare to set air quality and emission standards "applying to all areas of the country," with federal enforcement unless states in air quality control regions set more stringent standards and provide adequate enforcement.

The AFL-CIO testimony also endorsed a section of the Administration bill giving the government the right to make spot assembly line checks of automobile manufacturing plants to determine whether federal emissions standards are being met.

Taylor said the 1967 clean air legislation now in effect was weakened from the start because it was "the victim of political compromise under the massive pressures of big industry and of the various states."

In addition, its programs "were further weakened by being subjected to the budgetary axe under both administrations."

Present technology can reduce "nearly all sources of manmade pollution from 50 to nearly 100 percent," Taylor insisted. He stressed that "the main roadblocks to an effective abatement program are political," not technological.

The American people, he told the Senate panel, are demanding that these roadblocks "be torn aside . . . now."

TWENTY-FIVE-YEAR union membership badge and certificate are presented to Buckminster Fuller, noted architect, engineer and philosopher by Pres. Floyd E. Smith, left, of the Machinists. Fuller joined IAM Lodge 733 at Wichita, Kan., during World War II days and has remained a member ever since. Among his achievements is the geodesic dome built to house U.S. exhibits at Montreal's Expo 70. Fuller also pioneered in the development of modular prefabricated housing.

Striking City Workers Win Atlanta Settlement

Atlanta—Striking city employes won their long fight for a third-step wage increase and voted at a packed meeting to return to their jobs in Atlanta's sanitation, construction and parks departments.

More than 2,300 members of State, County & Municipal Employes Local 1644 stayed out 37 days until the city changed its mind about their raise—4.3 percent, or $4 a week, due May 1.

The walkout started Mar. 17 when Mayor Sam Massell reneged on paying the final installment of a wage package negotiated earlier by the union. While SCME tried to negotiate a settlement of the dispute, the mayor fired 1,600 workers and rounded up city jail prisoners and private haulers to collect garbage and rubbish.

The strikers, led by SCME Pres. Jerry Wurf, marched to City Hall Apr. 1 to show Massell their take-home pay stubs ranging from $60 to $70.

The strike-settling agreement calls for wage increases of 10 cents an hour; reclassification of 553 workers, effective May 4, to give them an additional raise; and overtime pay while the workers tackle the cleanup job.

Terms of the agreement were read at a closed meeting in the Morris Brown College gymnasium by William Lucy, executive assistant to Wurf. After debate, Jesse Epps of SCME recommended acceptance, and the vote was strongly in favor of ending the walkout, the union said.

The settlement terms include a promise from the city to reinstate all strikers without prejudice, drop all charges and permit all employes to work on overtime assignment. During the strike, some 130 workers were jailed on various charges of unlawful picketing.

Most of the city workers involved in the dispute are being paid $1.96 an hour. Some get $2.13.

Supreme Court Rejects Final Boulwarism Plea

The Supreme Court slammed the last door in the face of the General Electric Co.'s pattern of refusal to bargain when it turned down a GE appeal for rehearing of an earlier decision.

The court action leaves standing a ruling that GE was guilty of refusing to bargain with the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers when it made a one-offer, take-it-or-leave-it proposal to the IUE in 1960 that left a strike as the union's only alternative.

The National Labor Relations Board ruled in 1964 that the system of bargaining worked out for GE by Lemuel Boulware, one of its vice presidents, violated its obligation under the federal labor law to bargain in good faith.

The heart of the Boulware system was this: the company reviewed the existing wage structure, decided what is "fair," offered it to the union and then campaigned in each plant and local community for its offer, and "took a strike" if necessary to win its point.

In so doing it acted as if the union played no real role in determining contract terms, the NLRB found.

The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, New York City, upheld the NLRB finding and the Supreme Court refused GE's petition for review last February. GE asked for a rehearing with the argument that the NLRB's jurisdiction in refusal-to-bargain cases had been limited by the high court's H. K. Porter Co. decision. The court now has rejected that argument.

The court also refused employer petitions for review of NLRB rulings in these cases:

- Daniel Construction Co. and the Plumbers. The NLRB won a decision from the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals at Richmond, Va., that the employer must furnish an election list of eligible workers in a unit of employes scattered over six Southern states.
- Cone Mills Corp. and the Textile Workers Union of America. The 4th Circuit Court of Appeals upheld a South Carolina district court order for a name-and-address list under the NLRB's Excelsior Co. rule.

Cone appealed, citing employe claims that the list would subject them to "harassment" by union solicitors. The claim was rejected by the district court, which noted the employes had other "completely adequate" remedies at law against any harassment.

- Staub Cleaners and Local 39 of the Laundry & Dry Cleaning International Union. Management asked for review of a 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals order compelling it to bargain on contract terms. It cited the "snail-like pace" of the NLRB in the 1963 case but the appeals judges upheld the order.

Boilermakers' Berg Ill; Buoy Acting President

Pres. Russell K. Berg of the Boilermakers has named Harold J. Buoy as the union's acting president.

Berg suffered a stroke Apr. 5 and designated Buoy to assume his duties during the convalescent period.

Buoy has been on the Boilermakers' staff since 1950 and assistant to the president since 1962. He is also coordinator of the union's Legislative Education-Action Program, known as LEAP.

Government Employes Win Three D.C. Votes

The American Federation of Government Employes has won bargaining rights for 650 federal workers in three representation elections in the Washington, D.C., metropolitan area.

The biggest unit, made up of 569 employes of the Small Business Administration, voted for AFGE by a 10-1 margin, the union reported.

In the same three-day period, AFGE locals also won smaller units at the Armed Forces Office of Information and the Army Regional Dental Activity.

Seeks Senate Nomination:

Carswell Leaves Court for Politics

arch-foe in Florida Republican politics, Rep. William C. Cramer.

Cramer, an eight-term congressman, told newsmen he decided to seek the Senate nomination last summer after Pres. Nixon called him to the White House and said: "Bill, the Senate needs you, the country needs you, the people need you—now, run."

Carswell said he entered the Senate race to further "conservative government" and out of "the same sense of service and duty to principle" which he claimed marked his judicial career. His only previous try for public office was an unsuccessful campaign for the Democratic nomination for the state legislature in his native Georgia. The chief legacy of that contest was the white supremacy speech he made which became a major factor in blocking his confirmation to the Supreme Court.

Before Carswell abandoned the judiciary for politics, both Democratic and Republican office-holders had expressed indignation at his rejection by the Senate.

Cramer, himself, had joined in the consolation tributes to Carswell and the Democratic-controlled Florida Senate unanimously adopted a resolution hailing Carswell's "inestimable worth to his community, state and nation as exemplified by his impeccable record as a citizen, attorney and jurist."

A presidential spokesman said there has been no "White House involvement" in Carswell's decision to enter politics.

However, Sen. Gurney claimed that Carswell's candidacy had the support of Harry Dent, Pres. Nixon's political adviser and "southern strategy" specialist.

On another front, related to the Senate turndown of the Carswell and Haynsworth nominations, House Republican Leader Gerald R. Ford found himself outmaneuvered in his retaliatory call for the impeachment of Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas.

Ford had sought to have a special committee of three Democrats and three Republicans set up to consider whether formal impeachment proceedings should be brought against Douglas, whom he accused of advocating "hippy-yippie-style revolution."

But the Judiciary Committee, acting on the basis of a formal impeachment resolution, set up a five-member subcommittee to hold an inquiry into charges against Douglas.

Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.), chairman of the full committee, will head the panel of three Democrats and two Republicans. The committee's ranking Republican, Rep. William M. McCulloch of Ohio will serve on the subcommittee.

Celler said the investigation will be "neither a whitewash nor a witchhunt."

Several Republican moderates have sharply criticized Ford's impeachment demand as politically motivated and an attack on the independence of the judiciary.

Douglas, 71, has written and spoken prolifically on controversial issues since he was named to the court in 1939 by Franklin D. Roosevelt. Back in 1950, the Texas House of Representatives passed a resolution calling for his impeachment after he voted in a court decision to give the federal government title to Texas tidelands. And in 1966, five congressmen introduced a resolution asking for an investigation of his "moral character."

Only one Supreme Court justice—Samuel Chase in 1804—has ever been impeached by the House, the equivalent of an indictment in a court case. Chase, however, was acquitted by the Senate, which is the trial body in the impeachment procedure.

Meanwhile, Pres. Nixon's third nominee for the vacant Supreme Court seat prepared to face the scrutiny of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Court of Appeals Judge Harry A. Blackmun of Minnesota, anticipating close questioning by the committee on conflict of interest issues, made public details of small stock holdings in companies involved in litigation before his court. And he conceded that "in retrospect" he should not have retained a directorship in a hotel chain when he went on the bench. He said he resigned in 1963,

He characterized his judicial philosophy as akin to that of the late Justice Felix Frankfurter, who became a strong advocate of judicial restraint on the Supreme Court despite his liberal reputation before he was named to the court.

William Birthright Dies, Led Barbers 33 Years

Indianapolis—President-emeritus William C. Birthright of the Barbers died here at 82 and was paid final tribute by his fellow trade unionists for a lifetime of service to labor.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland said in messages of sympathy to his wife Birdie and to Barbers Pres. Joseph N. DePaola that Birthright's years of leadership in the Barbers union "brought innumerable changes to better the life of workers."

"He served the whole trade union movement as a vice president of the AFL-CIO, and his honesty and integrity were known to his colleagues. Please accept our heartfelt condolences."

Birthright retired in 1963 after 33 years as a top officer of his union and 23 years of combined service as a vice president of the AFL-CIO and one of its predecessor organizations, the AFL.

He was a prime mover before the AFL-CIO merger in the southern organizing campaign in the textile industry, helped form an early political action committee, and was active in Labor's League for Political Education and COPE.

Born in Helena, Ark., Birthright became a barber at 17 and joined the union not long after in Nashville, Tenn. He served as president, vice president and secretary-treasurer of Barbers Local 35. He became secretary of the Nashville Central Labor Union, served as secretary of the Tennessee Federation of Labor for 15 years, and was an AFL organizer from 1918 through 1920.

He was first elected to the Barbers national executive board in 1924, won office as secretary-treasurer in 1930 and became the first holder of the combined office of president and secretary-treasurer in 1936.

Birthright became an AFL Executive Council member in 1940. He was named president emeritus of his union on retirement seven years ago.

Rubber Union Strike Closes Goodyear

gan, Ohio, Nebraska, Tennessee, Vermont and Virginia.

The expired Goodyear agreement was achieved in 1967 after an 11-day strike. Three-month strikes were conducted against other members of the Big Four.

Delegates from 500 URW local unions in the United States and Canada met in Cleveland last February and voted for a 1970 economic policy with these major priorities: a substantial wage boost, an escalator clause tied to changes in the cost of living, a sizable hike in pension benefits hitched to the consumer price index, and major emphasis on occupational health and safety.

The February policy conference set its sights on a "greater measure of dignity, equity and security" for 212,000 employes of a profitable industry.

"Clear and comprehensive language," the conferees said, "must be incorporated in the agreements to protect employes against . . . toxic chemicals, compounds, and related work hazards."

It pointed out that this will require Big Four managements to join the union in "establishing adequate means to inspect, evaluate and correct harmful, potentially life-destroying conditions" throughout the industry.

One union aim this year is an escalator clause based on changes in the Consumer Price Index of the U.S. Dept of Labor, plus general wage hikes at specified intervals during the term of any contract running for more than one year.

Another is a major wage increase for skilled trades employes. Other objectives are adequate raises for production workers and elimination of all interplant or intraplant wage differentials based on geographic location or type of product.

Pension benefits tied to living costs should go not only to future retirees but also to workers already retired, the URW has been telling company negotiators.

Other aims are for total health care, improved hospitalization coverage and other services. The union seeks a ban on contracting-out of work that should be performed by company employes; more skilled trades apprenticeships; improved severance, pension and insurance pay in plant closings, and improvement of the URW's supplemental unemployment benefit program.

Federal Pay Floor Of $6,000 Asked

The American Federation of Government Employes has called for a $6,000-a-year minimum wage for all federal workers to eliminate "stark poverty."

AFGE Pres. John F. Griner said the union's executive council voted to urge Congress to apply a $6,000 pay floor to both white collar and blue collar federal workers and to employes of related government activities, such as military post exchanges and commissaries.

The council also called on Congress to approve "true comparability" of government pay with private industry rates by July 1 and a reduction of the length of time required for white collar employes to reach the top pay bracket.

RUBBER WORKERS, attending their union's legislative institute in Washington, hear Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) at a luncheon session. The institute gives local URW members and leaders a first-hand look at their government in action.

Farm Workers Win Improved Pact For Gallo Winery Grape Pickers

Delano, Calif.—The AFL-CIO Farm Workers won improved contract terms from Gallo Wines in the first of a series of 1970 negotiations with wine grape growers.

Management of E. & J. Gallo Winery, a major vintner whose main office is at Modesto, Calif., signed a new three-year agreement with a workers' committee headed by UFWOC Vice Pres. Dolores Huerta.

Gallo was one of nearly a dozen vintners to recognize the union after it won elections in 1967, and to negotiate new contracts with it.

The renewal contract calls for wage increases averaging 25 cents an hour this year for the general labor group, and two additional yearly raises of 10 cents an hour; increased vacation pay, two additional paid holidays, and a company contribution of $20,000 a year into the union's Economic Development Fund.

UFWOC pioneered in establishing a development fund to meet emergency needs of its members, including housing, education and medical care for needy families.

Under the contract, workers assigned to pick grapes will get pay hikes of 35 cents an hour, plus two 10 percent annual raises to bring them from $3.40 an hour to $4.53 by 1972. Minimum rates for newly hired workers were raised from $2 an hour to $2.20.

The vacation pay formula was improved by reducing the number of hours of work required for entitlement to vacation. Employes will get 2 percent of their wages as a vacation pay bonus after one year of service and 4 percent after two years.

Mrs. Huerta said Gallo has increased its vineyard acreage by nearly 100 percent since the 1967 contract was signed.

It has a largely stable work force as contrasted with some growers who have a large turnover of workers. The firm employs about 135 full-time workers, a figure that may climb to 250 during the peak harvest season.

Company vineyards are concentrated in Merced, Fresno and Stanislaus counties.

The union has asked for negotiations next with Schenley, Almaden and Christian Brothers, parties to agreements signed in 1966 and 1967.

On the table grape front, UFWOC is continuing its efforts to arrange elections at properties of growers who have for five years continued to resist union elections. Five growers split away from the table grape group recently and agreed to contract terms after the union demonstrated that their workers want UFWOC to represent them.

The most dramatic switchover came last week after Kelvin K. Larson, Coachella Valley grower who has been stumping the country against the union, agreed to a vote supervised by two clergymen. When employes of Larson and his brother Cecil voted for the union, 152 to 2, the Larsons started negotiations that led to the brothers' first union contract.

The break in the anti-union front came a year after AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany urged the Catholic bishops of the United States to help settle the long dispute. The bishops named a committee of five churchmen who succeeded in bringing both sides together. In consequence, the first union label table grapes are due on U.S. markets about June 1.

Free Labor Institute Graduates Two Classes of Latin Unionists

A double graduation marked the conclusion of two courses conducted simultaneously by the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

Twenty-three Latin American trade unionists completed the six-week sessions in Advanced Union Education and Advanced Collective Bargaining. Students from 13 Latin countries received their diplomas from Ernest S. Lee, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs, who acted in behalf of Pres. George Meany.

Lee praised the graduates for their choice of a career that was "not easy or financially rewarding" but "one of the most exciting" a person could have.

The excitement comes, he said, from never lacking for "places to go, people to see . . . and a good argument . . . a fight." But the chief reward is "doing for people what cannot be replaced by billions of dollars, pesos or pesetas . . . lifting by the bootstraps people who must endure unreasonable hardships."

Speaking for the class, Raul Angel Ferreyra of Argentina described an increasing loss of liberties in Latin America saying, "The seriousness of the social, economic and political problems affecting our peoples calls for immediate action . . . there is no longer time for cool calculations or lukewarm accommodations."

Ferreyra said that Samuel Gompers' words "We want more," taught Latin trade unionists that "the satisfactions of the working man are not only obtained with wages" or "benefits spelled out in the collective agreement," but must take into account "social legislation" and the "administration of the laws."

Noting that "permanent and continuous evolution" are essential to democracy and a free labor movement, he urged his fellow unionists to be "active participants in the process of change," adding "We must start the journey at once."

Under Sec. of Labor James D. Hodgson, addressing the graduates, emphasized the cooperation between government and labor in this country saying, "Freedom from state dominion is essential" to a free trade union movement.

A short-time appraisal of labor-management relations here might be misleading because of the "arena of almost unending conflict" in which we operate, he said. But by bringing these conflicts to the bargaining table we are invariably able to hammer out settlements in which "the worker benefits, the employer benefits and the nation benefits," Hodgson said.

The workers' benefits were further explored by Elliot Bredhoff, counsel for the Steelworkers and the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., who told the post-graduation luncheon audience:

"We, as part of the organized economy, can approach lifetime security by a combination of the laws of the United States—both state and federal—and benefits we have built up through collective bargaining agreements."

Ecuadorian labor leader Vicente Franco made a presentation, on behalf of the graduating class of three small trees planted on the AIFLD Front Royal, Va., campus. "The seeds were taken from our own hearts to symbolize peace, work and liberty—three goals we'll be fighting for forever," he said.

Guests at the ceremonies included Norman Carignan, vice-president, W. R. Grace Company; George P. Delaney, James M. Shea and Lawrence Heilman from the State Dept.; Charles Stewart, Labor Dept.; Y. Kido and H. Yamamoto, representatives of the Japan Postal Workers Union; Ralph Wright, International Labor Organization, and AFL-CIO Education Dir. Walter Davis.

Attending from Washington's diplomatic corps were Luis Tomas Sanvitti, Argentina; Arturo de las Casas, Colombia; Judet Hasburn, Dominican Republic, and Walter Landry, for Joseph Jova, ambassador to the Organization of American States.

where supplemental increases will be given to bring employes closer to the national industry standard on wages. Differentials also will be narrowed at Wilson plants in Monmouth, Ill., and San Angelo, Tex.

The agreements came some five months in advance of scheduled contract expiration dates. They incorporate expected increases in living costs, and contain reopening provisions to allow negotiations on wages if prices continue to rise, the union said.

Union Label Show Slated May 22-27

The Union-Industries Show—the annual exhibition of union-made products and services — will appropriately celebrate its 25th anniversary next month in one of the nation's most historic cities.

The point was made by Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. in announcing that plans for the show at The Rivergate in New Orleans, May 22-27.

More than 300 exhibits will be featured and over $100,000 worth of gifts, prizes and souvenirs will be given away to the public.

Ad Campaign Decries Jailing Of Teachers

The American Federation of Teachers turned to newspaper advertising in its campaign against the jailing of public employes for picketing in labor disputes, and called on AFT local unions to "adopt" arrested pickets with a pledge to pay their fines and salary losses.

Court "injunctions do not improve our schools," the union said in paid advertising messages. The ads appeared in the New York Times, Los Angeles Times, Philadelphia Bulletin, Detroit Free Press, Washington Post, Boston Globe, Minneapolis Star Journal, Chicago Tribune and Providence Journal-Bulletin.

AFT Pres. David Selden and Vice Pres. Betty Rufalo of the Newark Federation of Teachers are serving contempt of court sentences in the Essex County, N.J., Penitentiary. More than 90 other union members are scheduled to be jailed after the school year ends, and fines of $80,000 have been levied. The fines and jail sentences were imposed on the unionists for picketing during a strike that won major gains for 3,000 Newark public school teachers.

Early this month, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany asked New Jersey Gov. William T. Cahill to free Selden and other union members. He declared that injunctions and punitive contempt sentences "have no place in decent labor relations."

The (Not So) Good Earth

IF THE ENERGY and enthusiasm that marked the activities and celebrations of "Earth Day" can be sustained on a year-round basis and tied directly and meaningfully to the 1970 elections it will all have been worthwhile. If the faddists, the "freaks" and stuntmen and promoters take hold, it will all add up to another futile exercise in glib confrontation.

The American trade union movement has been deeply involved in what is now known as the "environmental" problem for a long time back when it was called a clean streams campaign before evolving into water pollution, air pollution and all of the other factors that have brought a new awareness of the current conditions of American life.

In the 1950s labor was calling on Congress for legislation to help clean up the waterways and to meet the growing danger of fouled and dirty air, of land erosion and despoilage.

Last October, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany gave these problems major attention in his report to the federation's convention. Here are some of the things he said:

"Generally, we regard the air we breathe and thrive in as a free gift of nature, available to all at no cost. This isn't true. Dirty air costs money—in fact, dirty air costs the average American family nearly $230 a year.

"Yet, the average expenditure for the control of air pollution amounts to less than 20 cents per person, per year.

"The dangers of dirty air are all too obvious in cities everywhere. Congress has recognized the problem since 1963, but federal funds have been too limited and state and local concern too lax to get beyond the pilot project and research stages.

"What is needed to combat atmospheric poison is a comprehensive and integrated federal, regional, state and local air pollution control program.

"Just as the air we breathe is dangerous, so is the water many Americans drink and in which they bathe and swim.

"Currently, 95 million Americans drink water which is below federal health standards.

"Some 64 million Americans use waste treatment facilities which are inadequate and spread poison and germs in rivers, streams, lakes and underground reservoirs.

"INDUSTRY DUMPS life-destroying chemicals and wastes into the waters people must depend upon to live clean and healthy lives.

"Necessary to meet the danger of short water supply are stepped up salt water conversion and reclaimed and re-use programs.

"Necessary to stem the tide of pollution are industrial oil and chemical pollution-control programs; accelerated construction of modern waste treatment plants and facilities in hundreds of communities; and federal authority to establish and enforce clean and healthful water standards throughout the United States.

"Many of the dangers that exist in America today are man-made and they must be solved by man. They can no longer be ignored or given only half-hearted attention.

"For a temporary period of time, we can exist as the richest nation on earth, surrounded by social dangers and poisonous elements, treating them in a piecemeal way.

"But in America, it was intended that people should live full and rich lives in a healthy and wholesome environment.

"In order to fulfill this promise of life, we Americans will have to unite in a common purpose toward this goal."

Survival of Private Colleges Depends on Public Subsidies

By John P. Roche

RECENT EVENTS at Boston College, where students have been on strike against a further increase in tuition costs, highlight the appalling squeeze that confronts private colleges and universities in this inflationary period. The trustees at Boston College have pointed out that they are already some millions in the red and the additional funds are necessary for survival. The students, who also feel the pinch in completely personal ways, have now suggested that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts pick up the tab.

The cost of attending a private college is, for one of my generation, astronomic. A friend whose daughter attends Brandeis shocked me out of my shoes when he said that he figures four years would cost $20,000 all told—and the girl would not have a car, which almost automatically puts her in the academic proletariat. Tuition and fees alone would reach over $10,000. Checking around a bit, I learned this was par for the college course these days.

But a little research on the institutional side indicated that, in terms of outlay, the costs of education to parents were minimal. Indeed, if students paid their proper freight, tuition would be about $6,000 a year, not the present $2,400. To put it differently, we lose about $4,000 a head, over $8 million a year—a gap which has to be largely filled by fund-raising.

Management consultants, operating in an academic vacuum, could probably save a lot of money. The graduate school, for example, is a monumental loser. Few graduate students pay a nickel toward their education. Yet a good graduate school is essential to the reputation of a university: it draws top faculty, which in turn brings in excellent students, who in turn eventually go forth to fill basic social needs for teachers, scientists, etc.

On a different level, the management consultant could doubtless find a number of university departments that do not "pay their way." Given the current student ethos, dominated by romantic anti-intellectualism, these tend to be in the sciences.

Since professors of physics rarely ask students for their existential reaction to Heisenberg's uncertainty principle, the young wander off to sectors where their creativity is better appreciated. So what do you do? Abolish the physics department? The question itself is preposterous.

No, you can trim a little here and there, but the fundamental problem is structural. Private universities, with possibly one or two affluent exceptions, are all up against the wall. They have to compete with well-funded state institutions on a resource base that is constantly dwindling—particularly since the major foundations left for the frontiers of social innovation, abandoning colleges and universities to their own devices.

THE ONLY ANSWER is public funding. New York State is already providing subsidization to private institutions, and the precedent is worthy of imitation elsewhere. Ideally the federal government should set up a national scholarship program patterned on the GI Bill, which has the advantage of giving students free choice and avoiding divisive issues of the separation of church and state.

The logic of this aid is simple: private universities and colleges are making a significant contribution to the common good. Moreover, as the impact of the closing of parochial schools demonstrates, private institutions ease the burden on state-supported schools.

It would be simpler and more efficient to maintain private colleges than to set up a new batch of state schools to absorb the student population.

For the time being we shall all stumble along. It will probably take the bankruptcy of a distinguished private college to dramatize the issue—there are half a dozen on the ropes right now.

Programs Tuned to Needs of All Held Key to Combatting Racism

The following is excerpted from The Yardstick column by Msgr. George G. Higgins, director, Division of Urban Life, U.S. Catholic Conference, titled "The Kerner Report and the Silent Majority."

ALMOST TWO YEARS have elapsed since the report of the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders—the so-called Kerner Report—was made public. The report was extensively and rather dramatically covered by all of the news media—more so perhaps than any similar document published in this generation. In retrospect, however, I think it would be fair to say that, in spite of all the publicity it received, the Kerner Report never really caught on.

To the contrary, it might even be argued that it was counter-productive in the sense that, instead of winning the public over to the cause of interracial justice, as the Commission on Civil Disorders obviously hoped that it would, it had the opposite effect of turning many people off and making it easier for them to rationalize their indifference to the plight of the black minority (and of other minority groups as well) and their opposition to needed reforms in the American socio-economic system.

One can only make an educated guess as to why the Kerner Report boomeranged, so to speak, as I am inclined to think it did. My own guess is that many people who probably never read or heard more than a garbled summary of its contents resented and still resent its most widely publicized conclusion, namely, that "white racism is essentially responsible for the explosive mixture which has been accumulating in our cities since the end of World War II."

For my own part, I am inclined to think that this statement is substantially correct.

The trouble is, however, that the Commission on Civil Disorders failed to define what it meant by "white racism," with the result, as Anthony Downs has suggested in a remarkable follow-up document recently issued by the U.S. Civil Rights Commission, that many whites felt that they were being unfairly accused of a sin that they were not conscious of ever having committed. (Racism in America and How to Combat It.)

Downs says that "perhaps the best definition of racism is an operational one. This means that it must be based upon the way people actually behave, rather than upon logical consistency or purely scientific ideas.

"Therefore, racism may be viewed as any attitude, action, or institutional structure which subordinates a person or group because of his or their color.

"Even though 'race' and 'color' refer to two different kinds of human characteristics, in America it is the visibility of skin color—and of other physical traits associated with particular colors or groups—that marks individuals as 'targets' for subordination by members of the white majority. This is true of Negroes, Puerto Ricans, Mexican-Americans, Japanese-Americans, Chinese-Americans, and American Indians.

"Specifically, white racism subordinates members of all these other groups primarily because they are not white in color, even though some are technically considered to be members of the 'white race' and even view themselves as 'whites.' "

DOWNS'S STUDY is too long to be summarized in this column but, if I had to single out for special attention just one of Downs's recommendations or basic strategies for combatting racism, I would be inclined to choose this one:

"Develop legislative and other programs which simultaneously provide benefits for significant parts of the white majority and for deprived or other members of nonwhite minority groups, so it will be in the immediate self-interest of the former to support programs which aid the latter."

He points out that this strategy seems especially significant now because of the apparent discontent of the so-called "silent majority" composed of low-middle-income and middle-income whites.

"Recent political developments," he says, "indicate that millions of these white Americans believe public programs in the past few years have unduly focused upon the problems of ethnic minority groups and the poor. Regardless of whether or not this belief is accurate, it constitutes a significant political force. Moreover, it is extremely relevant to whether or not Congress can be persuaded to adopt legislation with significant anti-racist impacts."

In putting forth this recommendation, Downs hastens to add that "any program which redistributes income to poor people must cause a net loss to some other group.

"The only group with enough total income to support a meaningful redistribution of this kind is the middle-income majority. So no program can cause net redistribution favoring all of the lowest-income group and all of the middle-income group simultaneously."

Those in the upper reaches of the middle-income group will have to learn to live with this proposition as an inescapable fact of life.

What Downs is telling us is that we cannot expect to eliminate the evil effects of white racism at bargain rates—or, to change the metaphor, that we cannot hope to have our cake and eat it too.

That's admittedly a hard saying, but unless the more affluent citizens of the United States can learn to swallow it gracefully, there is no hope of our being able to solve the urban-racial crisis.

Balanced Foreign Trade Policy Pinned to Tighter Import Curbs

FULL ENFORCEMENT of "anti-dumping laws" and ending concessions to nations with "unfair or unreasonable barriers" to U.S. trade would help stem the decline of this nation's position in world markets, the AFL-CIO's top economist declared.

Since World War II, the United States has lost "big chunks of production to imports," while its share of exports into the expanding world marketplace has dwindled, said Dir. Nat Goldfinger of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research.

Much of the "deterioration," he said, can be traced to nations with "managed national economies" which "directly or indirectly subsidize their exports," and shield their own markets with stiff restrictions against imports.

The labor economist observed that "imports of manufactured goods have been flooding the American markets" with the result that "by 1969, the United States was a net importer" of steel, autos, textiles, clothing footwear and glass. For example, he noted, "the entire rapid expansion of shoe sales in the United States in the decade of the 1960s was absorbed by imports."

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Goldfinger said that the "internationalization of technology" and the "very rapid growth . . . of U.S.-based, multi-national corporations" have added to the foreign trade difficulties.

"U.S. COMPANIES now operate some 8,000 to 9,000 subsidiaries in foreign countries, using American machinery, American know-how and American technology . . . exporting American jobs and displacing U.S. production," he asserted.

"We are not for shutting off foreign trade," he stressed, but "there has to be a sharp shift" of American trade posture and policy to make it clear to other nations that "trade is a two-way street." He said there should also be "import quota restrictions to stop this sudden flooding of American markets with various products."

Goldfinger was questioned by Hobart Rowen of the Washington Post and Frank Swoboda of Business Week magazine. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs program is broadcast Tuesdays over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

By Press Associates, Inc.

BACK IN THE 1950s a prime source of concern for the labor movement was the monthly report of the U.S. Dept. of Labor on employment and unemployment.

During the 1960s, jobs were generally going up and unemployment going down, so the concern disappeared rather quickly.

But now, once more, labor economists are watching the monthly report on employment and what they see—even though they predicted what would happen—reminds them too much of the 1950s to be ignored.

During the last three months the unemployment rate which had been largely steady all during 1969 has shot up almost 1 percent to bring the jobless level up from 3.3 percent in March of 1969 to 4.4 percent in March of 1970.

The rate isn't as high as during the Eisenhower administrations when it registered 5.5 percent and even higher for brief periods. But it has all the earmarks of the "tight money" days that gave us three recessions in eight years between 1953 and 1961.

In numbers the picture is equally depressing. A year ago there were 2.7 million Americans out of work. Today there are 3.7 million. Manufacturing employment is down 340,000 over the year. Hard hit industries include automobile, aircraft, ordinance and construction—all high wage, skilled and relatively skilled groups.

While economists may discuss the statistics and debate their meaning at great length, there are many indications that the downward job trend resulting from the Nixon Administration's anti-inflationary policies is having a direct influence on working people.

One of the major reasons for the increase in the unemployment rate is the fact that a great many Americans who were not in the labor market for one reason or another are now a part of it. During the past three months almost 900,000 men, women and teenagers who had not been looking for jobs, now are on the job hunt without much success.

Why the sudden surge?

Government economists concede that they are not sure, but they are willing to hazard a number of possible explanations. One is that women are looking for jobs because the rising cost of living necessitates extra family income. Another is that a husband or major breadwinner in the family has lost his job and remaining family members are trying to make up the wage deficit. A third is that returning veterans looking for civilian work are numerous enough to make an impact on the over-all statistics.

In any event, unemployment is no longer a statistical game, but a very human and personal one.

Furthermore, any sizable increase in future unemployment is likely to be felt on the welfare rolls of such cities as New York and Detroit. Already the New York State Commissioner of Social Services has predicted that rising unemployment will increase relief costs throughout the United States.

ONE OF THE TRAGEDIES of the unemployment picture during the 1950s was the number of workers whose unemployment benefits ran out after 26 weeks: In this respect this year's March figures are ominous. When the year began there were 133,000 workers who had been out of a job for 27 weeks or longer (seasonally adjusted). During March the number had climbed to 182,000.

The Senate recently approved an unemployment compensation bill extending coverage for an additional 13 weeks during periods of high unemployment.

The rate was set at 4.5 percent lasting for three months, a rate that is only a hair's breadth over today's 4.4 percent. It is important that this extension be retained in the final bill.

The Administration so far has resisted the labor contention that the government must become the employer of last resort should unemployment become more serious. It would do well to re-examine its position should the present unemployment spiral continue.

THE UNITED STATES should fully enforce its anti-dumping laws and end concessions to nations with unfair or unreasonable trade barriers to help stem the decline of this country's position in world markets, said AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger, center. He was interviewed by Hobart Rowen, left, of the Washington Post and Frank Swoboda of Business Week magazine on Labor News Conference. The AFL-CIO produced interview is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual Radio.

A NEW LOOK came to one of the world's oldest nations with the dedication of this modern, $350,000 headquarters for the Confederation of Ethiopian Labor Unions (CELU) in Addis Ababa. Construction funds were furnished by the African-American Labor Center. CELU opened its seventh congress in the new building's auditorium the day following dedication.

Ethiopian Unions Open New Center In Air of Afro-American Goodwill

Addis Ababa—A modern, new headquarters for the Confederation of Ethiopian Labor Unions (CELU) was described by two AFL-CIO representatives as a monument to the friendship between African and American trade unions.

The description came from AFL-CIO Vice Presidents James A. Suffridge and Hunter P. Wharton who participated in dedication ceremonies for the three-story, $350,000 building.

It was financed by the African-American Labor Center on land donated by Emperor Haile Selassie. The emperor officially dedicated the structure.

On hand were some 300 dignitaries from the royal family, Ethiopia's government, the diplomatic corps, leaders of CELU and many representatives of free labor movements around the globe.

Expressing pleasure at the opening of the headquarters, the emperor complimented CELU on its maturity, initiative and perseverance and thanked the AALC for making the building possible.

The emperor stressed that unions, in voluntary cooperation with management, are a key to overcoming ignorance and poverty in Ethiopia and strengthening its economy.

Speaking at the dedication, Suffridge praised the progress made by the seven-year-old federation in achieving better conditions for its members.

"We are not merely inaugurating the opening of a complex of stone and mortar," Suffridge declared, "but a symbol of the modern development of Africa, and especially the labor movement of this great continent."

The unions of Ethiopia, he continued, although recent in a country that is thousands of years old, "have been in the forefront for not only the improvement and advancement of their own members, but also for the creation and development of an independent African economy."

The new headquarters, Suffridge said, stands for the proposition that a free society cannot exist without strong, free unions just as unions cannot survive without a free society.

CELU Pres. Beyene Solomon gave a brief history of the Ethiopian labor movement, which now numbers 50,000 members. He thanked the AALC for financing construction of the building and other labor movements for contributions to it.

Gifts to CELU came from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, which provided books for a library and furniture; the International Labor Organization, which donated a labor library; and the British government, which supplied a public address system and office equipment.

Less than twelve hours after the headquarters was dedicated, it became the site of CELU's seventh annual congress, with Wharton addressing the opening session.

In extending greetings from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Wharton said, "The honor which you give us here is reciprocated by the good will, respect and cooperation which you command within the American labor movement."

Wharton, president of the Operating Engineers, departed from his text to point out that the new building was one any journeyman could be proud of. He congratulated the architect, builder and the craftsmen on their product.

Irving Brown, AALC executive director, was another speaker at the Congress. He emphasized the achievements made by Ethiopian unions and said the new headquarters stands as one of the most up-to-date, fully equipped labor centers in Africa.

Fight For Tax Reform Pushed in Pennsylvania

Pittsburgh—The 11th annual convention of the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO rallied all state labor unions to a finish fight for reform of the state's tax structure.

Michael Johnson, executive vice president, called Pennsylvania a tax haven for the wealthy and a tax trap for middle-income families.

Declaring that such families are in revolt against the heavy tax burden imposed on them by the state, Johnson said "We want to close the loopholes. We want to eliminate local taxes on wages. We want to end sales taxes on all items not for commercial use, with no taxes on any item under $1."

Johnson said labor also wants higher tax exemptions to make for a fairer distribution of the tax burden. That burden now falls most heavily on those least able to pay, he said.

"Pennsylvania is a high-tax state for 75 percent of its people because of built-in inequities," he declared. "The tax yield is low, putting Pennsylvania 32nd among the states. The result is fewer services to the people, a system that adversely affects most workers and their families."

The convention reaffirmed its historic position of neutrality in the upcoming state primary election. It adopted an executive council recommendation to give affiliates freedom of action but forbid use of the state federation's name in any possible endorsement.

Al Barkan, national COPE director, in addressing the delegates, stressed the critical nature of the 1970 congressional and state elections. Barkan warned that "the pipe lines are filled with anti-labor legislation and our only hope is for a friendly Congress." He added: "We've got to save our friends in the House in the 1970 election."

Other speakers included Gov. Raymond P. Shafer (R); U.S. Sen. Richard S. Schweiker (R); Al Rojas, State Farm Workers Organizing Committee; Peace Corps Dir. Joseph Blatchford; Labor & Industry Sec. Clifford L. Jones; State Senators Robert Gerhart and Fred Hobbs.

Rojas drew applause when he reported that contracts had been signed with three table grape growers in California. He announced there would be an organized protest in Washington May 1, 2 and 3 against the government's continued purchase of non-union grapes for the armed forces. The State AFL-CIO executive council, before the convention, had presented a check for $1,000 to the Farm Workers.

Harry Boyer was re-elected president for another four years, as were Johnson as executive vice president, Harry Block as secretary, and Earl Bohr as treasurer.

Textile Workers Win At Alabama Plant

Opelika, Ala.—Employes of Opelika Manufacturing Co. chose the Textile Workers Union of America to represent them in a representation election conducted by the National Labor Relations Board. The vote was TWUA 349, no union 314, with 30 challenged ballots and two void ballots.

TWUA said the victory was its 10th in the South in the past six months for a total of 4,700 additional members.

Asks Draft Reforms:

Nixon Orders End Of Job Deferments

Pres. Nixon issued an executive order ending immediately occupational and farm deferments from the military draft and asked Congress for authority to eliminate deferments for undergraduate college students.

At the same time, the President endorsed the recommendation of a special presidential commission that the draft should be ended entirely and replaced with an all-volunteer army. He proposed further military pay increases to make such a voluntary force more attractive.

Nixon announced his actions in a message to Congress.

In issuing his executive order, he said, "It is my judgment, and that of the National Security Council, that future occupational, agricultural and student deferments are no longer dictated by the national interest."

The order does not apply to those holding occupational or farm deferments prior to Apr. 23 and it does not cover those who may be granted such deferments from applications filed prior to that date.

The order also eliminates all future paternity deferments, except in those cases where a local draft board determines that extreme hardship would result. Existing paternity deferments will be allowed to continue.

Although the Military Selective Service Act permits the President to grant or remove occupational, farm and paternity deferments, he requires congressional approval to eliminate student deferments.

At present the law allows young men attending college a four-year deferment from military service until they graduate or reach their 24th birthday, whichever is earlier, provided they maintain adequate grades.

If congressional approval is voted, Nixon said he would "immediately issue" an order ending deferments for young men in four-year colleges, junior colleges, and apprentice and technical training programs, except those enrolled prior to Apr. 23.

If called for service after he enters school, a student would be permitted to finish his current semester or term before starting service. Those in apprentice or training programs could continue them "until some appropriate breaking point in their program." College students enrolled in ROTC or other military programs could postpone active duty until completion of their programs.

Nixon also asked Congress to permit the draft to be run on a national basis with a single national call by lottery numbers replacing the present system of local calls by individual draft boards.

The present system, Nixon said, is unfair because a man with a high draft number may be called by one local board while a man with a lower number in a different draft board is not called.

He supported the "basic conclusion" of the Commission on an All-Volunteer Armed Force, headed by former Defense Sec. Thomas S. Gates, that the nation's interests would be better served by an all-volunteer force than one mixing volunteers and draftees.

"I agree that we should move toward ending the draft," Nixon stated. "From now on, the objective of this Administration is to reduce draft calls to zero, subject to the overriding consideration of national security."

But conscription cannot be ended immediately, he said, and the existing draft authority, which expires July 1, 1971, will probably have to be extended.

An important factor in determining when the draft can be ended, he said, is the necessity of meeting military commitments in Viet Nam and elsewhere.

"It also depends," he added, "on the degree to which the combination of military pay increases and enhanced benefits will attract and hold enough volunteers to maintain necessary forces, the attitude of young people toward military service and the availability of jobs in the labor market."

Nixon noted that as a first step toward making military service more appealing, members of the armed forces are included in the 6 percent across-the-board pay increases for federal employes enacted by Congress.

Further, he proposed that Congress approve a 20 percent pay increase for enlisted men with less than two years service, effective Jan. 1, 1971.

Rising Prices in March Erode Real Earnings

while services have risen by 8.1 percent. Among individual items, "household services less rent" showed the greatest increase—10.7 percent.

Dr. Joel Popkin, assistant BLS commissioner, said that approximately 70 percent of the CPI advance in March resulted from increases in the consumer service sector of the index.

He estimated that a big increase in home mortgage interest rates accounted for 28 percent of the overall index rise. Other services associated with housing—property taxes, repair services and telephone, water and sewerage services—also went up.

Prices of medical care services rose by a full 1 percent in March to post their largest monthly increase since September 1966. The climb, BLS said, was "mostly because of increases for doctors' fees and hospital room rates."

Food prices, which usually drop in March, went up slightly. BLS indicated the food index would have risen more except for a significant drop in egg prices.

Other nondurable goods were up slightly more than usual but by considerably less than in February. Apparel prices rose, but more slowly, and gasoline prices dropped.

Prices of consumer durable goods, usually unchanged between February and March, rose by four-tenths of 1 percent. Houses, furniture, appliances and recreational equipment were higher. New and used cars declined.

Of approximately 44,000 workers who will receive cost-of-living wage hikes based on the March CPI, about 13,000 in interstate transit will receive boosts of 3 cents an hour and 9,700 in the aircraft and aerospace industry will get a 2.5 percent pay rise.

The other workers, employed by airlines, mail order firms and a wide variety of other industries, will receive wage increases ranging from 2 to 9 cents an hour.

Criticism from All Sides:

Press Profits Mount As Credibility Slips

Criticism of newspapers is mounting, but so are their profit margins.

Despite their entrenched position—or maybe because of it—newspapers are becoming the growing target of attacks, writes Ellis T. Baker in the American Federationist magazine.

The criticism, and at times hostility, comes from all sides. Even newspaper employes are joining in criticizing the policies of their own industry, Baker observes.

Newspapers are big business, ranking as the 10th largest industry in the country. And with an expected 5 percent increase in total revenues this year, they are expected to gross more than $7 billion.

Meanwhile, people are beginning to lose trust in the press. "Poll after poll tells us that the credibility of newspapers with the reading public is disturbingly low, and if anything, getting lower," Baker reports.

And as the credibility of newspapers has slipped during the past 10 years, a rising confidence has been developing in television, he says.

Baker, who is director of administrative operations for the Newspaper Guild, notes that the voice of protest comes from many quarters:

"The Left considers the press the 'Establishment;' the Right considers it 'left;' the blacks consider it 'white;' the Silent Majority considers it indifferent to the problems of the man in the middle."

The monopoly position of most newspapers, coupled with their power to grant or deny news and advertising space, is also being questioned, the article points out.

"It is argued," Baker writes, "that constitutional guarantees of freedom of the press should be construed to include freedom of access to the press, especially in advertising columns" as the number of newspapers dwindles.

There is newspaper competition today in only 3 percent of the nation's cities having daily newspapers. This compares with 5 percent 10 years ago and 10 percent 25 years ago, Baker points out.

While competition has declined, chain ownership of newspapers has been on the upswing. "Today more than 55 percent of the newspapers sold in the United States . . . are chain-owned," the article notes.

Meanwhile, newspapers have increased their ownership of radio and television stations. Baker refers to a study by the Federal Communications Commission that showed newspapers in 1967 owned more than one-third of the 97 TV stations in the country's top 25 market areas.

Unions, over the years, have had their difficulties with a fair presentation of their positions in the daily press. Baker stresses:

"No union man need be told of the problems of credibility, coverage or access. He learned about them long ago, the hard way, and faces them daily. During the recent nationwide General Electric strike . . . papers in a number of cities refused to accept a union advertisement."

And more newspapermen than like to admit it, Baker reports, concede that even Vice Pres. Spiro T. Agnew, in his attacks on the press, said a number of right things for the wrong reasons.

Monopoly in the newspaper industry not only discourages innovation and eliminates competition, but it also raises advertising rates without commensurate increases in wages for the employes, Baker observes.

Attempts to check the monopolistic drive of many publishers and news chains through national legislation have been unsuccessful thus far.

The so-called Newspaper Preservation bill was passed by the Senate in January and sent to the House. It would grant newspapers jointly published by more than one owner immunity from antitrust laws that prohibit price fixing, profit pooling and market splitting.

The bill cleared the Senate despite the opposition of most small and independent newspapers in addition to many large ones, including the New York Times, Washington Post and the Wall Street Journal.

Newspaper unions and the AFL-CIO are continuing their efforts to persuade the House to reject the measure, the author points out.

Newspapers, he notes, have never been in a healthier financial position. Their revenue from advertising alone is almost as great as that of television, radio and magazines combined.

"They have their problems," he declares, "many of them of their own making."

OFFICERS AND MEMBERS of the United Shoe Workers and the Boot & Shoe Workers—numbering more than 400—are shown with members of Congress at the Capitol, where the unionists urged quotas on shoe imports to halt the destruction of U.S. shoe workers' jobs. The unions also picketed the White House and Washington stores to call attention to their plight.

Teachers Fight Exploitation of School Aides

New York—Artificial distinctions in bargaining rights between public employes and workers in the private sector were sharply criticized by the president of the largest local of the Teachers at a trade union luncheon here.

Albert Shanker, who heads the 65,000-member New York local, said so-called public emergencies used to justify outlawing of strikes by government workers are mostly "political emergencies" since they represent "inconvenience" but not a real "danger to health and safety."

The program was one of a union-oriented series sponsored by the League for Industrial Democracy and the New School for Social Research.

Shanker told the group about his union's efforts to negotiate an end to the exploitation of thousands of "paraprofessionals" in the New York school system—teachers' aides, mostly Negro and Puerto Rican women, who are paid poverty wages of $1,700 to $2,400 a year.

The paraprofessional program is financed by government grants and Shanker charged that some education officials view the aides as "pawns in an experiment, not as workers with rights."

With encouragement from the union, Shanker said, 20 percent of the teacher aides are enrolled in college courses.

"There will arise from this group," Shanker predicted, "hundreds and eventually thousands of black and Puerto Rican teachers in the school system who will not only have a college education but practical experience in working with children."

Shoe Workers' Unions Push Drive on Imports

Nearly 400 officers and members of shoe unions from more than a dozen states converged on Washington to urge a limit on imported shoes which are destroying American shoe workers' jobs.

The unionists were led in peaceful protests by Pres. George O. Fecteau of the United Shoe Workers and Pres. John Mara of the Boot & Shoe Workers.

In weeks to come, the shoe unions announced, they will stage local rallies to support their drive for quotas on shoe imports in Boston, New York, Chicago, St. Louis, Los Angeles and other cities.

"We are not attempting to build up huge outpourings of people," Fecteau said. "But we intend to have representative groups of workers enlist support to preserve the American shoe industry and the jobs of its workers."

Fecteau said that imports of non-rubber footwear—much of it made by American firms that have fled to cheap wage areas—rose from 26.5 million pairs to 200 million pairs between 1960 and 1969.

The union's estimates, he pointed out, indicate that the 200 million pairs imported last year amounted to the loss of 65,000 job opportunities for American workers.

In Washington, representatives of the unions picketed the White House and downtown stores, seeking Pres. Nixon's support of quotas on the one hand and consumer rejection of imported shoes on the other.

They also pleaded their case to members of Congress at a meeting set up by Rep. James A. Burke (D-Mass.). He is one of a number of lawmakers backing legislation to establish import quotas on shoes.

Mara told the meeting that runaway shoe manufacturers maintain profits for themselves while wiping out jobs in the United States. "The job picture for our workers is very bad," he declared.

Warning that the U.S. shoe industry is going the way of the baseball glove industry, Mara said: "Today, you cannot buy a baseball glove made in the United States. They are all being made overseas."

Burke also emphasized that the nation's shoe industry faces extinction. "All we are asking is to have a reasonable portion of the domestic trade," he said. "Imports have flooded the market with cheap shoes made by people who work for less than 14 cents an hour."

Senate Move Seen to Rectify Welfare Bill

A move to restore job safeguards to the Family Assistance bill is expected in the Senate—to rectify a last-minute change the House made in the welfare reform legislation before passing the bill.

The original bill, as sent to the floor by the House Ways & Means Committee, provided that welfare recipients be required to take "suitable" job training or employment if available, or be dropped from the benefit rolls.

The determination of suitability was to be made by the Secretary of Labor, taking into consideration such factors as health and safety, physical fitness for the job, prior training and experience, former earnings and the distance of available work or training.

But before final passage, the bill was technically recommitted to delete both the term "suitable" and most of the specific standards laid down for the guidance of the Secretary of Labor.

The move was considered at the time as a parliamentary means of preventing opponents of the legislation from offering more destructive amendments that would have drastically weakened the bill. Nevertheless, welfare experts consider the changes damaging and opening up the possibility of using welfare rolls to exploit workers.

The recommittal amendment substituted for the stricken language a general provision declaring that a person receiving family assistance benefits does not have to take a job or training "if the individual has the demonstrated capacity, through other available training or employment opportunities, of securing work that would better enable him to achieve self-sufficiency."

Merged Council Receives Charter

San Diego—The new San Diego-Imperial Counties Labor Council, formed by the merger of two formerly separate county central bodies, received a charter of affiliation signed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at a ceremony here.

Federation Regional Dir. Daniel V. Flanagan presented the charter to Pres. Arnold L. Henderson, a member of Carpenters Local 1296, and council Sec.-Treas. R. R. Richardson. Flanagan said the new council has affiliates across Southern California from the Pacific Ocean to the Arizona border.

Sec.-Treas. Richard Gibbons of the former Imperial Valley council is a member of the merged council's executive board.

The 200 guests at the presentation included students at a Navy anti-submarine school here who had asked to witness a labor meeting, and military officers of six foreign nations.

Ship Radio Officers' Convention Stresses Inter-Union Cooperation

San Francisco—The way to inter-union talks aimed at closer unity among licensed ship officers' unions was opened by the ninth convention of the American Radio Association here.

Delegates unanimously authorized the ARA national council "to take all steps" toward closer cooperation among licensed officers' unions and toward "establishment of licensed officer unity that will provide strength, security and dignity for all ship officers."

Earlier, the convention heard a suggestion from Jesse Calhoon, national president of the Marine Engineers, that MEBA would welcome talks looking toward closer cooperation between the two unions.

The convention action noted that the value of officer unity had been demonstrated in recent negotiations where it had cleared the way for each of the participating officer groups to meet its own needs.

Maritime disunity, it added, had also been found to produce "nothing good and much that is harmful for all concerned."

ARA Pres. W. R. Steinberg told the delegates he strongly favored talks aimed at promoting cooperation. He suggested the possibility of extending unity talks to include other ship officers' unions, though that eventuality was probably some distance down the road.

The delegates approved a series of resolutions calling for the strengthening of the U.S. flag merchant fleet. The policy statements called for:

- Inclusion of passenger vessels in the Nixon Administration's maritime program.
- Increased support for modernizing the merchant fleet.
- Maintenance of the existing parity principle, both in ship construction and ship operation, to enable the American merchant marine and shipyards to compete against foreign operators.

Another resolution proposed creation of a new cabinet-level Dept. of the Oceans which would encompass the merchant marine, all ocean exploration, research, development, and promotion of marine and maritime sciences.

Prompt Action Urged:

Meany Calls on Congress To Enact Full Postal Plan

gaining for all aspects of employment for all civilian workers of the federal government.

"We think this bill is only a beginning. We are convinced that other federal employes also must have the right to economic self-determination and to the democracy of the collective bargaining table."

The postal precedent, Meany suggested, is "paving the way for a new day in federal employer-employe relationship—a good day, too long delayed."

Meany joined Postmaster Gen. Winton M. Blount in predicting that the reorganization legislation "will achieve an efficient, adequate postal service for the American people."

He described the legislation in these terms:

"This bill insures long overdue economic justice to postal workers. It guarantees them the right to participate, through collective bargaining, in the determination of all of the conditions—financial and otherwise—which govern their employment.

"It provides for an immediate wage increase of 8 percent and for wage schedules that compress the time it takes a worker to reach the top of his grade from an intolerable 21 years to a realistic eight—or fewer—years.

"It makes use of the National Labor Relations Board for the conduct of representation elections and for adjudication of unfair labor practice cases. It establishes a sensible mechanism for resolving any impasse in negotiations, which takes into consideration the special nature of employment in the federal field."

And, Meany stressed, the postal service would still remain a part of the federal establishment "and fulfill the government's obligation to deliver the mail."

Meany sharply challenged criticism that only the seven unions which won exclusive bargaining rights in nationwide elections were involved in the negotiation of the agreement.

The seven unions won the right to sit at the bargaining table in "free and fair elections conducted by the government," he said.

As for the organizations that lost out in their bid to represent the workers at the national level, they have no more claim to participate in the bargaining than the defeated opponents of the congressmen sitting on the committee would have to pass on legislation.

After the initial bargaining process, Meany noted, the agreement provides that any organization can challenge the majority status of a recognized union, just as is done in private industry.

For the postal service, Meany emphasized, representation must continue on a national basis. "Fragmentation of the union representation would never be permitted, nor should it."

A byproduct of congressional approval of the negotiated agreement will be a clear message to lower level postal officials, Meany said.

Some of the problems of the postal service, he declared, have come from those who "considered supervision to be akin to dictatorship" and treated workers "more as serfs than as free Americans."

He said the bargaining process will aid "in achieving the efficient postal service that we all want."

Meany said the postal management negotiators had "brought to the collective bargaining table that absolutely essential ingredient to sound negotiations—good faith."

Prompt approval by Congress, he stressed, "will be beneficial to the public, the postal service and the workers involved."

In reply to questions from committee members, Meany made these points:

● While federal employes are barred by law from striking, there will inevitably be strikes in the public sector if workers "don't get a fair deal."

The idea of the collective bargaining procedures written into the legislation, he stressed, "is to prevent strikes" by providing an alternative means of meeting the workers' needs.

● The question of area wage differentials for postal workers can be put on the bargaining table by either unions or management under the new legislation. It is strictly up to the workers and their unions whether to negotiate differentials or retain nationwide pay scales.

● Postal workers would be treated exactly as are workers in private industry on the question of a union shop. It would be—and should be—an issue open to negotiation.

● While the unions did not negotiate every detail of the postal reorganization plan with management, such as the procedure for congressional veto of rate changes, "we like the basic approach of the bill." Its aim is to improve the postal service, Meany said, "and I would be in favor of improvement in the postal service even if I had nothing to do with labor—just as a citizen."

● While having "no antipathy" towards the postal organizations which do not have national exclusive recognition, Meany sees "no possible way to negotiate except on a national basis" with the Post Office. Otherwise "you would have absolute chaos," he said.

6-Month Mark Posted In Economic Slowdown

Another sign of the current economic slowdown appeared with the Commerce Dept.'s announcement that the nation's real gross national product declined for the second consecutive quarter.

The real GNP is the total output of goods and services measured by the department's economists and then adjusted for price increases in terms of 1958 dollars.

The total output, in current prices, rose by $8.2 billion in the first three months of 1970 to an annual rate of $960.4 billion. But, adjusted for price changes, the GNP showed a decline of $2.9 billion to $726.9 billion.

In January, the department reported that real output dropped "fractionally" between the third and fourth quarters of 1969. That decline was about one-fourth as great as the latest one.

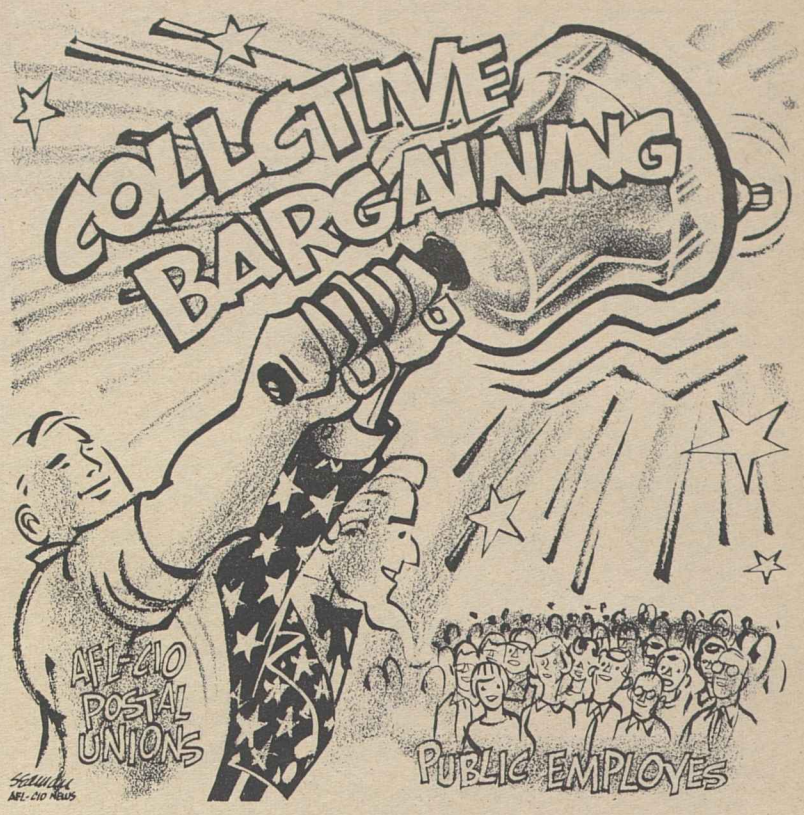
The drop in the real GNP for the first quarter was attributed mainly to a sharp reduction in business inventory accumulation, which fell by almost $5 billion compared to a $3 billion decrease in the fourth quarter of 1969.

In another area, the department reported that residential construction activity declined by $1.5 billion in the first quarter, "lengthening the slump in homebuilding to a full year."



Government spending also fell, with purchases of goods and services reduced by $2 billion in the first three months. Most of the dropoff was in military spending.

The department cited other sectors in which there was a pickup in the first quarter—disposable personal income, consumer spending, business investment in plant and equipment and state and local government purchases.

GOOD FAITH BARGAINING led to union-management agreement on postal legislation, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told House Post Office Committee. With him are Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller and presidents of all seven postal unions holding national bargaining rights.

Antitrust Law Coverage Urged on Nuclear Plants

Requiring operators of commercial nuclear facilities to be subject to the nation's antitrust laws is a "long overdue" action, the AFL-CIO told the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy.

Such a requirement, Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller declared, is in accord with labor's long-time view "that natural resources owned by the people should be protected by law and policy from being monopolized."

Biemiller's statement, setting forth the AFL-CIO's views on several bills in Congress, was presented by George Taylor, an economist with the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research.

The bills would amend the Atomic Energy Act to direct the Atomic Energy Commission to make a finding of practical value for nuclear power reactors and other nuclear facilities being used for commercial purposes.

In addition, when such a finding is made on a proposed license for a commercial nuclear operation, it would be reported to the Justice Dept. for an evaluation of its possible antitrust implications.

As the law now stands, the AEC issues licenses on the basis that they are for research and demonstration purposes, thus exempting them from antitrust coverage.

The proposed legislation, Biemiller said, "will erase the fiction that utilities selling power and energy generated by nuclear power reactors for many years are still in the research and development stage."

The proposal also would strengthen the policies of the law "in carrying out the mandate of Congress to make a maximum contribution to the general welfare, and foster a free, competitive nuclear industry," he added.

In giving the AFL-CIO's general support of the legislation, Biemiller also urged that it provide guidelines to enable small utilities to participate in the ownership of a privately-owned electric utility nuclear facility.

He also suggested that there be provisions for later antitrust action after a license is issued if the Justice Dept. finds it is necessary, and that hearings on license applications allow other parties to raise antitrust issues if they so choose.

Further, the AFL-CIO urged that the applicant for a commercial license be required to furnish the department with all relevant data it needs to make an antitrust evaluation.

Such legislation, Biemiller concluded, will promote competition among all types of utilities "to the ultimate benefit of the people of the United States whose resource the atom is and who are entitled to a just share of its benefits."

ORIT Pledges Struggle for Union Rights

A May Day message to workers in the hemisphere from the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT) pledged a continuing struggle for higher wages and better working conditions.

The message, signed by ORIT Sec.-Gen. Arturo Jauregui, also stressed the need for just labor laws, agrarian reform, educational opportunities for workers and their families, meaningful social security and the right to strike.

Jauregui denounced "ignominious tyrannies and dictatorial regimes" in the hemisphere which are making millions of workers the victims of subjugation and exploitation.

"Whatever may be the characteristics of a dictatorship that acts to the detriment of the rights of the workers and of the people in general," the message declared, "we shall denounce and fight it until we succeed in abolishing it."

Slump in Economy Stirs New Concern

Signs Point To Further Slowdown

By Duane Emme

From Wall Street to the White House, economists in and out of government are showing increased concern over the slumping national economy.

New government reports showed a decline in the key economic indicators during March—and Wall Street reacted with a sharp drop in stock prices to the lowest levels since 1963.

This came on top of the climbing unemployment rate, which has moved up a full point over the year to 4.4 percent, adding 1 million workers to the jobless rolls since March 1969.

The Commerce Dept. index, based on a composite of economic indicators, fell by one-tenth of 1 percent in March. But economists warned that the slight decline points to a further slackening of the economy in the months ahead.

New orders for durable goods declined 1.9 percent from February; contracts and orders for plants and equipment dropped a sharp 9.8 percent, and new housing construction permits were down 1.8 percent.

Of the individual indicators, only one pointed to any likely pickup in economic growth. The average workweek in manufacturing moved up three-tenths of one hour to 40.2 hours in March. But the workweek was still down from 1969 levels.

On the unfavorable "up" side were average weekly filings for state unemployment insurance, which rose by 4.8 percent between February and March, and the ratio of prices to unit labor costs in manufacturing, up by one-tenth of 1 percent.

The Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics announced that total factory "accessions," which include

To Guarantee Benefits:

Pension Payment Safeguards Urged

Federal legislation is needed to guarantee that workers will receive the pensions they have earned and that their unions have negotiated, Pres. I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers told a House Labor subcommittee.

Abel stressed that pension rights are a form of deferred wages and said the obligation to pay agreed-on pension benefits should be as firmly established as the obligation to pay direct wages.

He told the subcommittee, headed by Rep. John H. Dent (D-Pa.), that the Steelworkers endorse the position taken by the AFL-CIO at earlier hearings on pension legislation. The federation last December called for compulsory pension plan insurance covering all unfunded liabilities of a program. It urged federal standards for funding and vesting of single-employer plans, while recommending that multi-employer plans be excluded because there would be no threat to benefits if a single participating employer went out of business.

Abel said his union, with 1 million members covered by negotiated pension plans, considers vesting, full funding and federal pension insurance "essential" to the protection of worker rights.

As an example of the problems faced in assuring workers against loss of earned pension benefits, Abel cited a pension agreement the Steelworkers negotiated in 1950 with an apparently prosperous company employing 13,000 union members.

The company fell on hard times, and by mid-1960 employment had shrunk to less than 6,000. It was subsequently sold twice, the last time to a subsidiary of a conglomerate.

Then the properties of the old corporation were divided into seven separate corporations and the pension fund—which had $13 million in assets—was split into seven funds.

One of the corporations had only 14 employes, another corporation was assigned 65 employes and 260 pensions. One of the plants was again sold, and a portion of the pension funds and liabilities transferred along with it. And last year, the largest of the plants was permanently closed. It had once employed 9,000 workers; at the time of closing, it had 625 employes of whom 453 were entitled to immediate pensions and 104 to deferred pensions to begin when they reached the age of 65.

While there was $7 million remaining in the pension fund, the obligations for continuing benefits to former employes were estimated at more than $25 million.

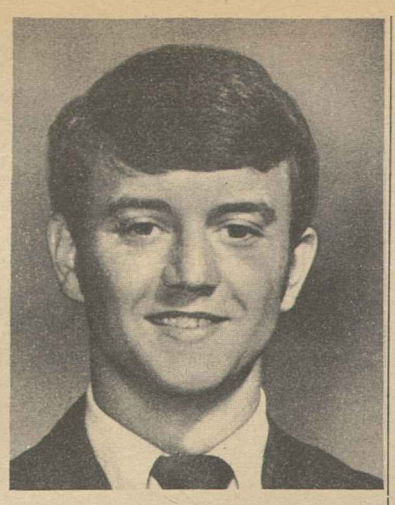
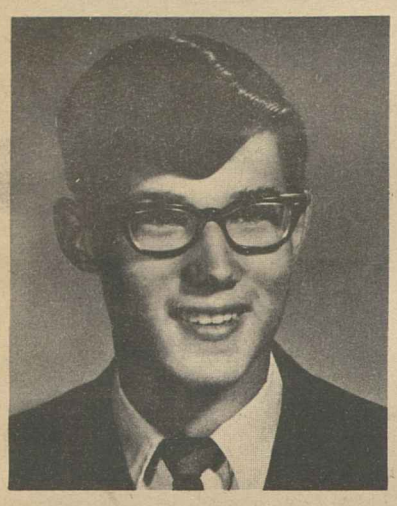
The conglomerate contended that the pension claims could only be made on the assets of the defunct subsidiary which, Abel noted, consisted "of a plant which could operate only at a loss and for which there was no purchaser in sight."

The Steelworkers, he told the subcommittee, were able to negotiate a commitment for the conglomerate to assume responsibility for the payment of all pensions due the former workers, but had to give up other benefits in exchange during the negotiations.



And, he stressed, while the conglomerate's finances appear secure, no one can be certain what the future will bring.



Abel said his union supports legislation to assure "fiduciary honesty and full and open reporting of the operation of pension plans."

But he stressed that the "essen-

SCHOLARSHIP WINNERS qualifying for four years of college study financed by $6,000 grants each from the AFL-CIO are from left, top, Rhonda M. Rochon, Houston, Tex., and Michael L. ## Six Students Awarded AFL-CIO Scholarships

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany announced the winners of six college scholarships awarded by the federation under the National Merit Scholarship Program. Each provides up to $6,000 in financial assistance over four years for study at the college chosen by the student.

The 1970 winners, notified of their selection by Meany, are:

Darrell Banks of New York City; Eugene Daszko of Chicago; Robert Dugwyler, Jr., of Tacoma, Wash.; Michael Martin of Georgetown, S.C.; Patrick Nolan of Grass Valley, Calif., and Rhonda Rochon of Houston, Tex.

In his letter of congratulations to the winners, Meany said:

"Since its very beginning, organized labor has supported the establishment and improvement of the American system of universal free public education. The challenges of the world in which we are living are so great that today we believe that free public education should be extended beyond high school to include higher education.

"The AFL-CIO looks forward to the day when all young people will have the opportunity to develop to the fullest measure of their capacity, regardless of their financial status. In the meantime, while striving to achieve this goal, the AFL-CIO is happy to demonstrate its interest in widening educational opportunities through these annual scholarship awards."

The winners are selected each year on the basis of high school records, evaluation by teachers and the results of competitive tests given by the non-profit National Merit Scholarship Corp.

Two winners are chosen in each of three zones into which the country is divided. Five of this year's winners have parents who are members of AFL-CIO unions.

The awards are good for enrollment in any accredited college or university the winner may choose, and for study in any sub-

The failure of the United States to ratify the Genocide Convention of the United Nations "is a costly anachronism that should be eliminated without delay."

This was the thrust of testimony by Prof. Richard N. Gardner of Columbia University, speaking on behalf of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Human Rights and Genocide Treaties before a Senate Foreign Relations subcommittee.

"Our 20-year-old failure to ratify the Genocide Convention is probably our most dramatic omission in the area of human rights treaty law—and the one that is most incomprehensible to our own people and to the people in other countries," he said.

Nixon Stand on 18-Year-Olds Poses Threat to Voting Rights Extension

By David L. Perlman

The most successful civil rights law ever enacted may be scrapped next July if the House bows to Pres. Nixon on the issue of lowering the voting age to 18.

That's the fear of civil rights groups, and of both Democratic and Republican congressmen who have led the drive to extend the 1965 Voting Rights Act for an additional five years.

The law, which made it possible for some 800,000 previously disenfranchised southern Negroes to register and vote, is due to expire this summer.

The only certain way to make sure that it doesn't is for the House to accept without change Senate amendments to a bill continuing federal protection of voting rights.

One of these amendments would lower the voting age to 18, starting next year. The Senate wrote the 18-year-old vote into the bill by an overwhelming 64-17 margin, and the House had been expected to go along.

If it doesn't, the legislation must go to a House-Senate conference committee and then be returned to both the House and Senate for a final passage vote.

That's the big rub, in the opinion of the bipartisan civil rights coalition.

Apart from the risk of deadlock in the conference committee, civil rights supporters see a very real threat of a southern filibuster aimed at preventing final action on the legislation.

They believe that there would have been a filibuster when the bill was before the Senate early in March except for one lucky break.

The next item on the agenda,

Labor Warns Against Easing Of Meat Law

Consumers would be the losers if Congress weakened the federal meat inspection law, the Meat Cutters and the AFL-CIO told a Senate committee.

Arnold Mayer, legislative representative of the Meat Cutters, testified in opposition to a bill that would allow state-inspected meat to be shipped and sold in interstate commerce.

His testimony was endorsed as the AFL-CIO's position in a letter from Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller to the Senate Agriculture Committee.

Present law requires federal inspection of all meat that crosses state lines. A 1967 law requires that state inspection of meat that does not cross state lines meet federal inspection standards. But only three states have thus far met that requirement. Forty-six states were given extensions of time and the federal government has taken over the inspection program in one state.

Mayer said his union, which represents workers in the meatpacking and processing industry, is not satisfied with the progress to date in improving state meat inspection.

He said the present law should be given more time to operate. But if any changes are to be made, the Meat Cutters and consumer groups strongly support bringing all inspection under the federal program rather than creating a loophole in the existing law.

An entirely federal inspection program, he said, "would provide stronger consumer protection. It would provide greater uniformity in enforcement. And it would be cheaper than the total state and federal cost under the present system of state and federal programs," he testified.

Biemiller, in his letter to Committee Chairman Allen J. Ellender (D-La.), noted that the labor movement had urged extension of federal meat inspection to all meat sold in the United States when the 1967 legislation was being considered by Congress.

'Better Break' Urged For Disabled Veterans

The returning disabled veteran from Viet Nam deserves a "better break," starting with far-improved therapy and rehabilitation services at the Veterans Administration hospitals across the country, the AFL-CIO declared.

Speaking for Federation Pres. George Meany, Public Relations Dir. Albert J. Zack said at a luncheon during the annual meeting of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped that more manpower, services and funds are needed at the VA hospitals.

After the end of World War II, VA hospitals were doing a first-rate job, Zack said. But today, they are not getting the job done because they lack adequate staff and resources.

The nation has the obligation to do all it can for the young men it sends to fight the battles in Viet Nam, he stressed. They must be given the best of services to prepare them for a fruitful life when they return, he added.

VA hospitals need the additional help of volunteers, he noted, but their prime need is increased federal funds that would allow for enlarged hospital staffs and improved services.

Zack spoke at an AFL-CIO-sponsored luncheon honoring winners of the essay contest for high school students held annually by the President's committee.

The theme of this year's contest was "The Disabled Veteran as a Manpower Resource in My Community." About 30,000 high school juniors and seniors took part in state and local competitions.

First place winners from each state were brought to Washington for the two-day conference with transportation and expenses paid by AFL-CIO state federations. The operation was directed by Stanton Smith, coordinator of AFL-CIO state and city central bodies.

Five national winners were selected from the 48 winning entries that represented 46 states, the District of Columbia and the Virgin Islands. They shared $2,500 in prize money.

The first prize of $1,000 and the Robert S. Marx Memorial Award went to Glenda Lenhart of Omaha, Neb. Other national prize winners were Martha Ruth Wright, $600, of Thomasville, Ga.; Linda Ceciro, $400, of Riverside, N.J.; Peggy Sue Belvin, $300, of Artesia, N.M., and Laurie Michaels, $200, of Boise, Ida.

All the state contest winners were taken on a tour of historical places of interest in the nation's capital by the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. They were also given a tour of the Capitol building and a luncheon by the Carpenters.

More than 4,000 professionals and volunteer workers for the handicapped attended the annual conference of the President's Committee. Gordon M. Freeman, president-emeritus of the IBEW, is vice chairman of the committee.

AFL-CIO Asks Curbs On Multi-National Firms

Regulation of U.S.-based multi-national firms "is urgently needed" if America is to recover from a sharp deterioration in trade, AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger told the U.S. Chamber of Commerce in Washington.

Until such regulation is established, he said, there must be "at least a stop-gap" limitation on imports in areas where they are destroying U.S. jobs.

Goldfinger was one of several speakers to address a session on "U.S. International Trade and Investment in the '70s" at the 58th meeting of the Chamber.

Any attempt to blame the sharp decline of the U.S. position in world trade "on such temporary factors as the current inflation, the capital goods boom and the Viet Nam war is nothing but a dodge," Goldfinger declared.

What is a "major factor" in the rapid destruction of the U.S. trade balance, he said, is the uncontrolled, mushrooming spread of multinational firms to areas of the world where they can boost profits by hiring cheap labor.

He cited figures to show these firms now control more than 50 percent of what is called "U.S. trade." But, he added, their operations are not really "trade" at all —merely transactions within their structures entirely to their own benefit.

These firms, which also are exporting technology developed with the help of U.S. taxpayers, have "substantially reduced or eliminated" the nation's productivity leadership in a number of industries, Goldfinger stated.

One immediate step that should be taken, he said, is for the government "to stop helping and subsidizing U.S. companies in setting up and operating foreign subsidiaries" by giving them special privileges in tax and tariff laws.

"Regulation of the multi-nationals is inevitable," Goldfinger declared. "It is urgently needed. And it is needed now."

Labor Dept. Fills Post On International Bodies

Philip A. Kleinberger, a career employe of the Labor Dept. since 1941, has been named director of the department's Office of International Organizations. He succeeds John E. Lawyer, who recently retired.

Kleinberger comes to his new post from service as a functional specialist in the Bureau of International Labor Affairs. He also has worked in the Office of the Solicitor, the Wage & Hour Division, the Bureau of Employment Security and the Manpower Administration.

Luna Cites Need:

Transport Policy Held Vital Priority

Chicago—The adoption of a national transportation policy ranks "among the most pressing needs of the day," Pres. Charles Luna of the United Transportation Union declared here.

The alternative to such a policy—adopted by the federal government—"is a form of chaos in transportation that has already begun to develop," Luna told the UTU's Conference on Transportation at the University of Chicago.

He issued a statement on the eve of the conference and spoke at a dinner held in connection with the three-day meeting—attended by 100 specialists representing all modes of transportation.

Keynote speakers were Dr. Paul Cherington, a professor of education at Harvard University, and John P. Doyle, a professor of transportation at Texas A & M, and Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ind.).

The subject of the meeting, "What Should a National Transportation Policy Contain," brought out a wide range of views expressed in workshop sessions.

Luna said that the conference is not designed as any "backup" for union policy. "Many of those attending disagree sharply with us. We ask only that they present their ideas forthrightly in a forum where all ideas are needed and respected."

The UTU president urged conference participants to "give serious thought to the fact that ours is the only industrial nation in the world that does not have a working policy on transportation."

While government funds are supporting every mode of transportation, freight and people are moving through cities and across the nation "without the slightest regard for coordinating modes for maximum efficiency," Luna said.

"The result is that every American, as a taxpayer, a rider and consumer, is subsidizing the rapidly declining efficiency of a shaky transportation facility," he concluded.

Cherington, a former assistant secretary in the Dept. of Transportation, said that the department tentatively has drawn up a format for a national transportation policy. He is helping with its formulation even though he left the government in February.

Noting that there is still "considerable disagreement" within the department on the policy's specifics, Cherington said it still must gain the "approval of the Secretary of Transportation, who must sell it to the President, who must sell it to Congress."

Without going into detail on the policy, Cherington said that it will stress "future needs" in all areas of transportation and their relationship to the environment, investment and safety.

Hartke, a leader in sponsoring legislation to enlarge federal participation in transportation, said the government has failed "to comprehend the relationship between transportation and social problems—poverty, urban decay and environmental degradation."

He appealed to the Administration to back a bill he and other senators have introduced to establish regional transportation commissions charged with the planning and construction of a fully-integrated national transportation plan.

Approval Seen For Blackmun To High Court

A cautious Senate appeared ready to give its approval to the Supreme Court nomination of Judge Harry A. Blackmun after a warm endorsement from the American Bar Association and a favorable impression at Judiciary Committee hearings.

The bar association's Committee on the Federal Judiciary said it had checked Blackmun's reputation with more than 100 attorneys, including civil rights and labor lawyers, and numerous law school deans. Committee members interviewed Blackmun and found him open-minded and fair, and his legal opinions "scholarly and well-written."

The ABA panel, which had given skimpy "qualified" ratings to the two previous nominees, said the Minnesota jurist "meets high standards of professional competence, temperament and integrity."

Blackmun also received praise from members of the Senate Judiciary Committee when he appeared for questioning.

Questioned on his stock holdings, he said he had not been "in and out of the market" and planned to sell his relatively small stock holdings if confirmed.

He told the committee he believes his record on the bench shows "sensitivity" to civil rights issues, labor cases and treatment of "little people."

Goodyear Back at Table:

Bargaining Resumes In Rubber Walkout

Akron, O.—The Rubber Workers announced that Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. negotiators agreed to return to the bargaining table for the first time since Apr. 21, when 23,000 union members struck Goodyear plants in 15 cities.

Bargaining on contract terms to replace those that expired two weeks ago was resumed in Milwaukee, with URW Pres. Peter Bommarito joining union negotiators. The talks were switched from Cincinnati when suitable accommodations could not be located in the Ohio River city.

The union is asking for a "substantial" wage hike in line with high company profits and climbing living costs. Other major issues are a boost in pension benefits keyed to the consumer price index and improvements in the health and safety protection of Goodyear's production, maintenance and other workers.

While strikers picketed without incident at Goodyear plants in 13 states, union committees continued negotiations on contract terms with the other three members of the rubber industry's Big Four—Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., the B. F. Goodrich Co. and Uniroyal Inc. Those contracts also have expired but are being extended on a day-to-day basis.

Another union committee opened negotiations in Cleveland with management of the General Tire & Rubber Co., whose contract with the union runs out May 15. The URW represents 4,000 General employes in plants at Akron and Waco, Tex.

Union members at Goodyear say they will continue picketing until the giant rubber firm agrees to give its workers a fairer portion of the "biggest profits" in the company's history.

The URW will start paying $25 a week in benefits to strikers at the start of the third week of the walkout, May 5. Eighteen months ago, convention delegates agreed to put $5 a month into the strike benefit fund to prepare for Big Four holdouts.

The fund has reached the $12 million mark and assessments are due to end in May, the URW said.

Goodyear has plants in Alabama, California, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, Massachusetts, Michigan, Ohio, Nebraska, Tennessee, Vermont and Virginia. Its 1967 contract was settled after an 11-day strike. Other members of the Big Four held out for three months before reaching agreement with the strikers.

The background of this year's strike was outlined by the union in a full-page advertisement in the Akron Beacon Journal in answer to company statements.

The URW ad cited these points: Goodyear made what it called final proposals Apr. 20, and the union rejected them as insufficient but did not break off negotiations; company negotiators left the bargaining table, saying they "had no plans for further negotiations."

The union added: "The company would have you believe that its final offer was more than generous. The fact is that the Goodyear offer is far below settlements which have been made in other industries."

Urban Coalition Prods Congress For Public Service Job Program

Private manpower efforts are not adequate to meet the needs of the nation's underemployed and unemployed, the Urban Coalition Action Council declared as it called on Congress to establish a federally-funded public service job creation program.

Full employment is beyond the capabilities of the private sector of the economy, George C. McGhee told the House Labor subcommittee.

"The jobs are just not there in the private sector," McGhee said. Besides, he noted, those hired under "hard-core" unemployed programs are often the first to be let go when economic conditions trigger layoffs.

McGhee's testimony echoed that of AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, who earlier told both the House and the Senate that the Nixon Administration's manpower bill is completely inadequate since it creates no jobs and lacks a provision for a realistic public service employment program.

The Administration bill recommends conceptual and mechanical changes in the operations of existing programs but proposes no public service employment program, McGhee pointed out.

He urged passage of the bill sponsored by Rep. James G. O'Hara and 111 other House members because it faces the reality of meeting manpower needs through a federally funded job creation program.

Noting that the new welfare bill passed recently by the House requires that recipients accept training for jobs, McGhee said it would be "a cruel jest" to insist that the poor prove their willingness to work, be trained for a job, and then be denied the opportunity to work.

Although Administration spokesmen have asserted that a public service employment program is a part of their manpower proposals, McGhee said that "one cannot talk about public service employment and figure the need for federal funding to create and support more jobs."

He warned that public service employment would be lost in a competition for funds if it were included in an array of manpower programs from which state and local administrations could pick and choose.

Instead, he urged, such a program should have "a special appropriation and strong federal direction."

McGhee, formerly ambassador to West Germany, cited findings of government commissions and a special Urban Coalition study showing that vital city services are not being provided because of a shortage of jobs.

He also pointed out that a presidential commission indicated in its report that 5 million public sector jobs could be created if funds and facilities were available.

The combination of the lack of services and unemployment helps produce unrest in the cities, McGhee observed.

"Public service employment is not a cure-all," he said. It will not provide enough jobs to eliminate unemployment, end poverty or cut off the need for economic growth to provide more jobs in the public sector.

"Such a program will, however, establish for the first time in our society a national commitment to offer to people who need and want work the opportunity to be trained for public service jobs—the need for which clearly exists—and that are not dead-end make-work," McGhee stressed.

Six Students Awarded AFL-CIO Scholarships

ject. The actual amount of each scholarship, up to $1,500 a year, is determined by the National Merit Scholarship Corp. on the basis of college costs and family needs.

Sketches of the winners follow:

Darrel Banks, of Cardinal Spellman High School, the Bronx, N.Y., will study systems engineering at the Polytechnic Institute of Brooklyn. He has won recognition as a speaker and writer and as a musician and track athlete. He has been active in community activities as a member of the John XXIII Society and the Neighborhood Youth Corps. His father, William H. Banks, is a hospital attendant with no union affiliation.

Eugene Daszko, top student in his class of 1,289 at Lane Technical High School, Chicago, will major in science at the University of Chicago. He was editor of his school yearbook and is active in the Astronomical Society, World Forum, Russian Club and Ukrainian Club. He received the Harvard Book Award last year. His father, Peter Daszko, is a member of Local 1 of the Bakery & Confectionery Workers, AFL-CIO.

Robert L. Dugwyler Jr., of Lincoln High School, Tacoma, Wash. will major in mathematics at Stanford University, Palo Alto, Calif. He is editor of his school newspaper and has won prizes as a mathematician, poet and debater. The senior Dugwyler is a member of Local 470 of the Carpenters.

Michael L. Martin, of Winyah High School, Georgetown, S.C., will study physics at the California Institute of Technology, Pasadena. He played junior varsity football and basketball and is president of the French Club and a member of the governing board of the South Carolina Young Episcopal Churchmen. His father, Joseph T. Martin, is an accountant and a member of Local 233 of the Office & Professional Employes.

Patrick L. Nolan, of Nevada Union High School, Grass Valley, Calif., will study engineering at Stanford University. Last year he conducted a six-week original research project in electronics at the University of Hartford under the National Science Foundation summer program. His Science Fair projects have won numerous prizes, including awards from the Navy and Air Force. His father, John H. Nolan, is a member of Local 498 of the Meat Cutters.

Rhonda M. Rochon, of St. Agnes Academy, Houston, will study mathematics at the University of California, Berkeley. She is a member of the Chemistry Club and Art Club and secretary of the Catholic Interracial Council. Her stepfather, Joshua O. McAfee, is a member of Local 185 of the Postal Clerks.

Technical Engineers Name General Counsel

The Technical Engineers announced the appointment of David Barr as general counsel for the union and William B. Peer as associate general counsel. They are members of the Washington law firm of Barr & Peer.

AFTE Pres. James Woodside said Barr won for the union a precedent-setting 1963 decision requiring the U.S. Navy to bargain with AFTE units at Naval shipyards.

Louisiana Parley Cites Needs of Civic Services

Baton Rouge—The Louisiana AFL-CIO approved an officers' report spelling out the need for more community services and raised per capita taxes 10 cents a member per month to a new rate of 40 cents, highest for a state central body.

All but about 15 of the 900 delegates to the organization's 15th annual convention voted for the raise, to take effect May 1.

The delegates re-elected without contests all state officers including Pres. Victor Bussie, Sec.-Treas. E. J. Bourg, Sr., Vice Presidents A. P. Stoddard and Leroy Landry and 18 regional vice presidents.

Bussie reported intensive federation activity in such fields as mental health, and stressed the need for extra vigilance when the state legislature gets down to business.

Convention sessions featured a panel discussion between delegates and state legislators. Labor participants told why they oppose a constitutional convention, sought by antilabor forces and opposed by state labor as untimely and unnecessary.

The political climate in Louisiana is such that the state is probably the only one in the South that has no union-crippling legislation among its statutes, the officers reminded delegates in urging continued attention to political action and voter education, registration and voting.

Bussie and Bourg told the convention that Louisiana labor has benefited from one unexpected outcome of rescue efforts during last year's Hurricane Camille.

State labor invested about $100,000 in portable generators, electric saws and similar equipment used in the rehabilitation effort in Plaquemines parish and other hurricane-damaged areas. The equipment is now available for use by unions that need it during other emergencies.

The officers thanked all who helped in relief efforts following the storm, which leveled hundreds of homes along the Gulf and inland. When it abated, Louisiana unions and their members helped provide the volunteer labor of nearly 800 union craftsmen in rebuilding some 40 homes in the stricken areas.

Delegates and some 2,500 visitors were addressed by Gov. John J. McKeithen, Sen. Russell Long, Rep. Hale Boggs, Pres. James Chapman of the National Association for Mental Health, Vice Pres. Robert Shea of the National Red Cross, Chairman Robert Aldrich of the President's Committee on Mental Retardation, and Norman Hill, assistant director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute.

Roy Brown Named Brick Workers' Chief

Columbus, Ohio—Roy L. Brown has been named as new president of the Brick & Clay Workers, succeeding Paul Pelfrey. The latter resigned in February and was named an international representative, Sec.-Treas. Earl Bellew said.

Economic Storm Warnings

THE DANGER SIGNALS are flashing almost everywhere that the nation's current economic recession, slump, slowdown, or whatever term you like, may grow worse.

The most dramatic sign is the plunging stock market. The Dow-Jones index, a respected market indicator, has dropped to a six-year low. But there is more solid evidence of the dangers of a deepening and broadening recession.

Earnings reports of top-drawer U.S. corporations and businesses still reflect solid profits, but at a lower rate and level than the record-shattering pace of the past few years. Prices as measured by the Consumers Price Index are still running over 6 percent higher than a year ago. And unemployment is a full percentage point up on the rate over a year ago—from 3.4 to 4.4 of the labor force, and it's rising.

The AFL-CIO had specifically warned more than six months ago that what is presently coming to pass was built into the Administration's blunderbuss economic policies and its highly publicized campaign against inflation.

In its report to the October 1969 AFL-CIO convention the Executive Council said:

"The blunderbuss, general form of restrictive economic policies, tight money and sky-high interest rates can finally affect the big corporations by pulling down the whole house—by so depressing the incomes and demand of workers, farmers and smaller businesses that the sales and profits of the big blue chip corporations are finally affected.

"These policies of general restraint are dangerously wrong in the setting of 1969. They are ineffective in combatting profit inflation and the capital investment boom of the larger companies. But they hit homebuilding, consumers, smaller businesses and workers' jobs. And they can become effective in curbing the activities of the big corporations only by depressing the entire national economy."

AS OF MAY 1970 these policies have succeeded in depressing the entire national economy. No matter which indicators are used or measurements applied, everything is pointing or moving down—with the possible exception of the profits reaped by banks and other money lenders from 100-year-high interest rates.

The stock market plunge that has dominated the mass media over the past few days—much more so than the jump in the unemployment rate and the 3.7 million jobless workers could produce a new look at current policies.

The capital goods expansion plans of major corporations—plans for new plants and equipment—could be cut back, easing some of the demand for credit and helping bring down interest rates. This would bring a measure of relief to the housing industry which has been in a deep and severe recession for many months.

But if the capital goods cutback is coupled with a reduction of inventories and no change in Administration policies, then unemployment will rise and, as the AFL-CIO said a half-year ago, "the whole house" will be pulled down.

The focus on recession could finally bring home to the Administration the need for selective restraints in some areas and stimulants to economic growth in others.

For nearly 10 years the nation has been relatively free of the fear engendered by an economic recession. A change in current national economic policies can help restore a recession-free era.

Arguments for Disengagement Echo Credo of Old Isolationists

By John P. Roche

TO ONE WHO GREW UP in an isolationist America, and actively participated in the anti-war movement from 1939 to Pearl Harbor, there is an uncanny resemblance to things past in the current debate on foreign policy.

Hardly a day goes by without some senator (usually a liberal) calling for disengagement from someplace. On Apr. 10, for example, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee unanimously recommended the repeal of both the Middle East Declaration of 1957 and the Tonkin Gulf Resolution of 1964.

What this amounts to is the repudiation by the committee of the major premise of our foreign policy since 1947, the assumption that it is in our national interest to contain Communist expansion. To repeal Tonkin Gulf would mainly provide symbolic revenge on former Pres. Lyndon Johnson. However, to repeal the Middle East Declaration at this time would clearly encourage the Soviet Union in its anti-Israeli campaign.

A U.S. President who had just seen his congressional support cut out from under him would hardly be strengthened in deterring the Russians from sponsoring another shot at Israel.

Meanwhile other straws are in the wind. In the time they have free from committee meetings, various members of Foreign Relations are busily advocating the destruction of the AID program, the Alliance for Progress, and the Atlantic Alliance. While Sen. Mike Mansfield's continuing effort to cut back our troop commitment to NATO is probably the most risky project, Sen. Frank Church deserves the prize for sheer energy.

At a time that sophisticated European and British observers suspect the United States would not risk nuclear war to protect Western Europe and Germany, that we would not imperil Boston to save Bonn, our commitment of conventional forces to NATO assumes great significance. It is a litmus test of our intentions. A number of Mansfield's arguments make sense—for example, the European nations should increase their force levels.

But the isolationist symbolism of an American cutback would be overpowering. It could trigger a whole new alignment of forces in Europe, much to Soviet advantage.

Sen. Church, in one week, called for a troop cutback in South Korea, urged that the Agency for International Development (AID) "be shut down and the keys thrown away," and advocated an end to U.S. intervention in Latin America.

He came close to stating that we should become invisible: "What is necessary is that we first get off the backs of our neighbors. We must learn to hold ourselves at arm's length."

He did not explain how the United States, with a gross national product approaching a trillion dollars, can sneak out of the Western Hemisphere to some isolated nook. I confess that the first time I was exposed to this bucolic vision, in 1940, I was deeply impressed, though the then Sen. Gerald P. Nye did make the case far more effectively than Church.

PERHAPS THE MOST remarkable push on the memory-button came from Sen. J. W. Fulbright. Not only was the substance of his argument similar to the isolationist credo of the 1930s, but the rhetoric itself seemed to flow from the same old spring.

"From the standpoint of American security and interests," said Fulbright, "the central fact about Indochina is that it does not matter very much who rules in these small and backward lands." The mood . . . the pace . . . the conclusion—all rang a familiar note.

Some quick research brought up the original. On the evening of Sept. 27, 1938, Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain informed the House of Commons of the Czechoslovak crisis and continued: "How horrible, fantastic, incredible it is that we should be digging trenches and trying on gas masks here because of a quarrel in a faraway country between people of whom we know nothing."

Freedom to Dissent:

Civil Liberties of All Imperiled By Repressing Rights of Some

The following is excerpted from editorials appearing in the New York Times of April 26 and 27 entitled "The Threat to Liberty."

EACH MORNING in schools throughout this land, millions of children pledge their allegiance to a nation indivisible with liberty and justice for all.

This daily ritual is beginning to lose all meaning as America's fundamental principles of freedom are being undermined. Civil liberties, though indispensable to the goal of the open American society, have suffered periodic setbacks in the past, both under Democratic and Republican Administrations. But there is cause for the gravest concern over the currently evolving pattern of overt and subtle policies which tear at the fabric of a free, pluralistic society.

Group appeals, sectional politics, harsh and divisive statements and, most important of all, repressive administrative actions and retrogressive proposals and laws are directed from the very highest sources of government against dissenters and nonconformists. The principal target is that a very large number of peaceful and determined Americans—many of them in the younger generation—who do, openly and democratically, want to challenge the establishment and effect peaceful social change.

The Administration tactics are rendered all the more sinister because they are often contradictory and elusive. Amid high-sounding reaffirmations of the right to dissent, the government prosecutes those among dissenters whom it sees guilty of conspiracies. Amid talk of the maintenance of law and order, an epidemic of electronic eavesdropping creates conditions approaching governmental lawlessness and moral disorder.

In the difficult period through which this country and this world are moving, doubts about war, poverty, discrimination and the economy inevitably create severe tensions. Some few Americans who despair of rational answers have in fact lost all hope in the law, have finally rejected peaceful methods of change and have succumbed to the delusion that violence offers some kind of answer. When these elements act illegally as they now frequently do, they can and must be dealt with through strict, but fair, enforcement of the law.

But the vital point in repression of violence in a democracy is the fear of what a few dissenters may do. The voicing of threats or the mere expression of dissent cannot excuse suspension of the Bill of Rights or of those civil liberties which alone justify faith in representative democracy.

Under the guise of security, the Justice Dept., restorting to inquisition by questionnaire, is trying to bar protest demonstrations in the vicinity of the White House.

Atty. Gen. Mitchell, pleading the need to protect the flow of traffic, has called for an "updating" of the laws governing protests and demonstrations. He conveniently differentiates between "prospectively peaceful demonstrations such as American Legion parades" and what he suspects to be "demonstrators who are trained to force confrontations with police."

Those who condone the government's increasing resort to repressive cautions cite the dangers of violent or illegal acts. But to suggest that the Bill of Rights can be temporarily ignored in times of discord and anger would be to turn the Constitution into an impotent, bloodless document.

It is not in harmonious times that liberties require protection. It is in days of doubt that the rights of the unpopular few must be upheld, if the liberties of the many are to remain safe.

In 1920, Atty. Gen. A. Mitchell Palmer, following some anarchist bombs and bomb threats, wrote in his annual report: ". . . There must be established a systematic and thorough supervision over the unlawful activities of certain persons and organizations . . . whose sole purposes were to commit acts of terrorism or to advocate, by word of mouth and by the circulation of literature" the subversion of the government.

PALMER BOASTED of a file containing 200,000 biographies and records of speeches of persons "with radical connections." Such dossiers seem puny compared to the store of computerized intelligence data banks maintained today by a host of agencies, from the Justice Dept. to the military.

No serious student of history now believes that the Palmer forays against civil liberties contributed to the nation's survival. Yet his obsession with surveillance and his scrambling of action and advocacy are once again being elevated to public policy, with infinitely greater efficiency.

Under the guise of essential attacks on crime, police and investigatory powers are being sharpened for potential use against political offenders. Preventive detention is being advocated, when too many suspects are already imprisoned too long before being brought to trial. No-knock entry into private premises and the rifling of confidential records are being justified as weapons against narcotics.

Political snooping has seriously jeopardized the confidentiality of income tax returns and diminished the privilege of reporters' files. Personal mail is increasingly subject to scrutiny.

There are those who say that the growing reliance on surveillance, with lines blurred between the legitimate attack on crime and the illegitimate repression of dissent, is the price of America's role as a great power, but that is to misread the country's destiny. The nation's greatness springs from its dream of greater freedoms for all, not from a nightmare of restricted liberties for some. Today, no less than in earlier times of trouble, the Bill of Rights offers the best, perhaps the last, hope to carry the torch against the forces of dark suspicion and fear.

Outlook for 1980:

Nation's Workforce Seen at 100 Million

A TEAM OF Labor Dept. economists peered into a statistical crystal ball and came up with a picture of the American economy 10 years from now.

If the projections of the Bureau of Labor Statistics experts prove valid, by the year 1980:

- The nation's labor force will have grown by one-fifth, to 100 million workers. Of these, 26 million will be in the 25-34 age group.
- The gross national product—the total value of goods and services produced—will have increased an average of 4.3 percent since 1968, to reach a total value of $1.4 trillion in 1980—measured by the 1968 value of the dollar.
- Productivity will have increased 3 percent a year, a slightly slower pace than the decade of the 1960s.
- Hours of work will show little change—declining only one-tenth of 1 percent a year to 38 hours a week.
- Employment will continue to shift to industries that produce services rather than goods.
- The long-term trend will continue to white-collar occupations and those requiring the most education and training.

Like all such projections, the 1980 forecast starts off with certain assumptions.

Thus, it assumes that by 1980 "the United States will no longer be fighting a war." However "a still guarded relationship between the major powers will permit no major reduction in armaments."

It assumes that inflation will be curbed without having to pay the price of high unemployment. The economic projections are based on a 3 to 4 percent jobless rate.

It anticipates expanded government action to meet the nation's domestic problems, but with more federal funds channeled through state and local governments. This would be reflected in a larger rate of increase in state, county and city employment as contrasted with federal government payrolls.

The study also assumes that the birth rate will be lower.

WHILE THE BLS will in the months to come publish detailed industry-by-industry forecasts, an article in the April issue of its magazine, Monthly Labor Review, gives what it terms a "preview" of the projections.

It predicts that by 1980, nearly seven out of 10 workers will be employed in service-producing industries. The ratio was five out of 10 in 1950 and six out of 10 in the late 1960s.

Construction will be one of the few non-service industries to expand its share of the economy during the 1970s. A growth rate of 2.5 percent a year is predicted, nearly twice that of the 1960s, with employment rising from 4 million in 1968 to nearly 5.5 million by 1980.

Manufacturing will remain the largest single source of jobs and will employ more workers. But its share of total employment will be slightly below present levels.

Machines will continue to take over farm labor employment, which is expected to drop from 3.5 million workers in 1968 to 2.6 million in 1980, even though production will increase.

The BLS says that there will be proportionately fewer teenagers and persons over 45 in the labor force 10 years from now and that there will be a modest increase in the 20-24 age bracket. But the percentage of 25-34-year-old workers will rise from the 20 percent of 1968 to 25 percent in 1980. In numbers, the increase will be from 16.5 million to more than 26 million in 1980. The 35-44-year bracket will decline from 21 to 19 percent of the workforce.

There will be more women workers in 1980—about 37 million—although the percentage of women who work will rise only slightly from 41 to 43 percent.

The number of Negro workers is estimated at 12 million in 1980, up 3 million from 1968, with an annual growth rate of 2.4 percent as compared with 1.6 percent for the white labor force.

By 1980, seven of 10 adult workers will have completed at least four years of high school, compared with six of 10 in 1968. More significantly, about four of five young adult workers (25 to 34 years old) will be high school graduates in 1980, and one in five will have completed at least four years of college.

Postal Negotiations Pave Way For Bargaining on All U.S. Jobs

HISTORIC NEGOTIATIONS that developed the postal reform bill now before Congress proved that collective bargaining works in the federal government and paved the way for long overdue collective bargaining rights for all federal civilian employes.

That report was made by two AFL-CIO representatives closely involved in the postal negotiations and in shaping the proposed legislation, Public Relations Dir. Albert J. Zack and Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, as they were questioned by reporters on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference.

Federal employes should be guaranteed the "right to self-determination" and a voice in their wages and working conditions, Zack declared. He said that such a measure is "in the drafting stage now" and will "go to the Congress very shortly."

Biemiller declared "There isn't any question but what the (postal) strike brought the matter to a head," but it wasn't the "sole factor behind Congress's willingness to permit collective bargaining between government employes and government officials." He said that the concept has "grown" under the Executive Orders of Presidents Kennedy and Nixon permitting bargaining.

MANY CONGRESSMEN and senators will be "very happy to get rid of the headache" of setting government workers' salaries, he asserted.

Zack said that "public acceptance" of collective bargaining for federal employes resulted from "sudden realization of the conditions under which postal employes were working—the wage scales they were getting," which produced "a sense of shame in America," and "collective bargaining became a viable concept."

Biemiller and Zack agreed that bargaining has many advantages over the "lobbying" now necessary to improve federal wages and working conditions. They pointed out that while progress has been made toward "comparability" between government and private industry salaries, there are "constant delays" between the time adjustments are needed and the time they are written into law.

Pay Hikes End School Strike In Minneapolis

Minneapolis—Striking teachers in public schools returned to the classroom after voting 1,415 to 248 to accept a School Board offer including improved wages, smaller classes and a voice in pupil discipline.

Members of the Minneapolis Federation of Teachers stayed out 12 days to win improvements that include a wage schedule next September starting at $7,500 a year and rising to $11,900 in 11 yearly steps for those with the bachelor's degree. The current range is from $6,950 to $10,810.

Teachers with master's degrees will start at $8,170 a year in September instead of the present $7,570, and achieve $15,000 a year in 13 steps instead of the present $13,535 in 12 steps.

Next January, teachers on the lowest experience steps will get an additional increase.

The union won another major aim—preparation periods for elementary grade teachers. In September, every elementary teacher will get three half-hour periods a week to prepare for class. Next Mar. 1 elementary teachers in inner-city schools will be given five such periods.

Class size will be cut to no more than 33 pupils in inner city schools, no more than 35 in others except kindergarten and the primary grades, where 29 will be the limit.

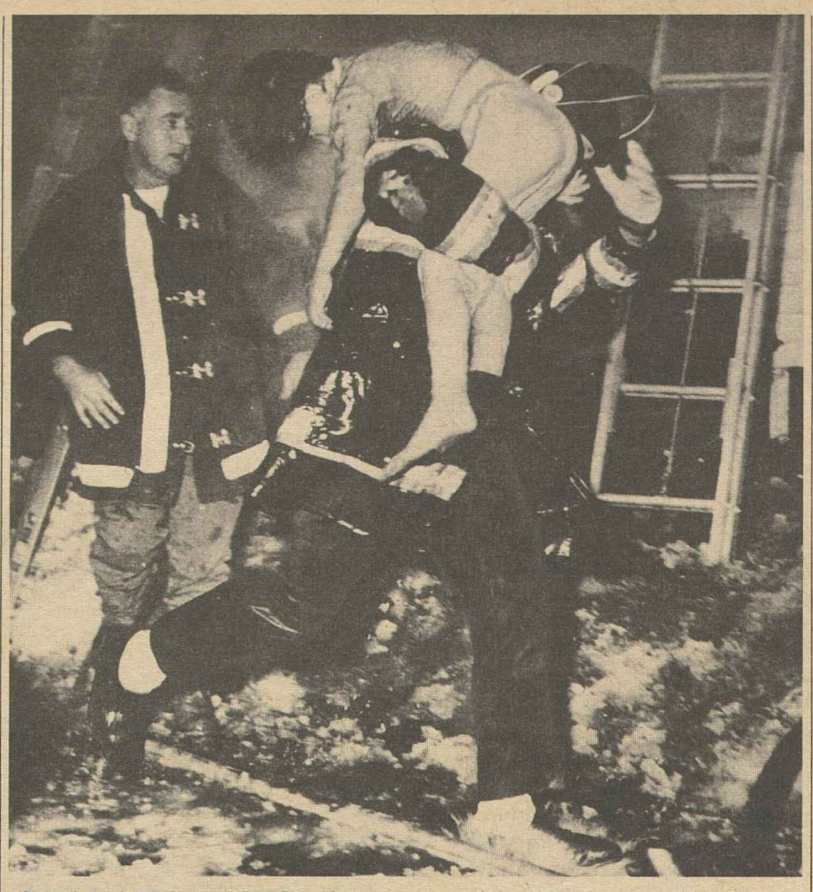
The AFT reported one new strike, by 400 of the 450 teachers in the Baldwin, Pa., public schools. Local 1592 members there are seeking a raise in base pay from $6,800 a year to $8,100 and other improvements in conditions.

Brick Workers Win First Pact At Boren Clay

The Brick & Clay Workers signed a first contract with the Boren Clay Products Co. of Greensboro, N.C., after winning a four-year legal battle to get management to bargain collectively.

Union Sec.-Treas. Earl Bellew, in a report to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, asked that the company's name be withdrawn from the unfair list. The federation's Executive Council in 1967 endorsed the union's call for a nationwide consumer boycott against Boren.

Bellew said the new pact gives 140 Boren employes improved wages, vacations and paid holidays. Management agreed to a seniority system, grievance and arbitration rules, and other benefits. Also it gave the union the right to collect dues on company property.



The union won an election at the Greensboro plant in 1966 and struck when management refused to bargain. The company appealed a National Labor Relations Board order to negotiate, and finally complied on the order of a U.S. Court of Appeals.

Plumber Trainee Unit Names Director, Aide

W. Leo Walsh has been named national director of a union-industry program to recruit partly trained men from minority groups to expand the workforce of the plumbing and piping trades.

The National Journeyman Trainee program Walsh will head was launched recently with the cooperation of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters and the National Constructors Association under a Labor Dept. grant.

Appointed assistant national director was Ernest L. Bremer of Cleveland. Walsh is from New York.

DRAMATIC PHOTO of a young girl being rescued from a blazing home in Amesbury, Mass., won a top prize in the fifth annual Fire Fighters' awards contest. The picture was taken by Robert F. Boisselle of the Haverhill, Mass., Gazette as Robert Gatcomb of IAFF Local 1783 was running to oxygen equipment with the unconscious girl he had carried from a burning bedroom.

Fire Fighter Awards Go to 29 Newsmen

Twenty nine reporters, photographers and news broadcasters have been declared winners of the fifth annual international awards program of the Fire Fighters.

A committee of three judges chose two newspaper stories, two news photos, television coverage of a major fire and two radio editorials as first prize winners. There were 200 entries in the contest, restricted to stories and pictures demonstrating "the professionalism and hazardous nature of fire fighting" during 1969.

IAFF Pres. William H. McClennan said the record number of contest entries points up the "increasing public awareness of the vital part the fire service plays" in maintaining public safety. McClennan said he is "immensely encouraged" by the continuing increase in media efforts to tell the fire fighter story, and to understand the fire fighter's role as a "dedicated and skilled public servant."

Judges were AFL-CIO Publications Dir. Saul Miller, Frank Swoboda of McGraw-Hill Publications, and Warren Kimball of the National Fire Protection Association.

First prize winners receive $500 and a plaque. Six second prize winners will get $250 and a certificate. Judges also found 14 entries worthy of honorable mention.

A special citation was given to the Boston Globe and Frank Mahoney of its staff for "superlative and sustained coverage of every aspect of the news" of fire fighting.

Photographer William Masanz of the St. Paul Fire Department won a special citation for a cover photo in the Minnesota Fire Chief magazine showing firemen advancing into a fiercely blazing warehouse.

The University of Wisconsin's Daily Cardinal was given special commendation for a large number of news stories and articles exhibiting "great sensitivity to the viewpoints and objectives" of Madison, Wis., fire fighters.

McClennan will present first prize awards to these winners:

● Debby Hope of the Wheeling, W. Va., News-Register for a "dramatic and compelling" news story telling how a fireman's training saved the life of a worker whose scaffold collapsed high above ground. The award was for the best news or feature story in newspapers of less than 100,000 circulation.

● Fred Holper of the Milwaukee Journal for a well-displayed and written series on the "complexity of modern fire fighting" and the "increasing professionalism" of the fireman's job. The category was for newspapers of more than 100,000 circulation.

● Robert F. Boisselle of the Haverhill, Mass., Gazette, for the best news or feature photo in a newspaper of less than 100,000 circulation. The picture showed a fireman rescuing a seven-year-old child in an Amesbury, Mass., fire.

● Joseph A. Mancinelli, Detroit Fire Dept., for an "unusual and dramatic view of a ladderman at work" in a fire. The photo was printed in the Detroit Free Press. Entries were confined to papers of more than 100,000 circulation.

● Cameraman John Hart and reporter Ron Robitaille of Station WHEC-TV, Rochester, N.Y., for best television news or feature coverage of firemen at work.

● Ray Carney of Station KPNW, Eugene, Ore., for best radio coverage—two editorials explaining the need for "decent fire fighter wages."

NBC to Air Panel On Labor in '70s

A highly-praised television discussion of "Challenge of the Seventies to Labor" has been adapted for radio and will be broadcast nationally over the NBC network on Sunday, May 17.

Participants are David L. Cole, noted arbitrator and mediator; Prof. George W. Taylor of the University of Pennsylvania, former chairman of the War Labor Board, and Rabbi Bernard Mandelbaum of the Jewish Theological Seminary.

The program was produced by the George Meany Foundation for the Eternal Light series developed by the Jewish Theological Seminary and carried regularly by NBC. Local radio listings should be checked for the time of the May 17 broadcast.

ILO Parley Urges Stronger Union Role

Caracas, Venezuela—Western Hemisphere nations have been urged to give unions a greater role in helping to advance economic and social development.

The appeal came in a resolution adopted here by government, employer and worker delegates to the ninth conference of the American State Members of the International Labor Organization.

The 12-day conference, attended by 250 delegates, advisers and representatives of international trade secretariats, stressed in the same resolution that "the principle of freedom of association for all workers and employers is essential" to economic and social progress.

The resolution emphasized that governments should keep worker and employer organizations fully informed on development plans and provide for their participation.

Labor and employer groups, the conference said, should also be represented on bodies dealing with such issues as labor legislation, social security, human resources, wage policies and vocational training.

George Hildebrand, assistant secretary for international affairs in the Labor Dept. and head of the United States delegation, emphasized the main theme of the meeting when he told the delegates:

"Without the full participation of workers' and employers' organizations, government programs for development cannot succeed."

A second resolution adopted by the conference called on governments to adopt wage policies that apply to workers without discrimination.

The main instruments available for applying such policies, the conference declared, are minimum wage and non-discrimination laws that cover workers in various industries.

However, the resolution said, governments as employers have a responsibility to "set an example" by providing adequate wages and decent working conditions for their own employes.

In another area, the conference urged government, employers and unions to give further impetus to programs to expand jobs in Latin American and Caribbean nations.

The need for these programs was set forth in the Ottawa Plan for Human Resources Development, approved by the previous American States conference in Canada, in 1966.

George L-P Weaver, representing the ILO secretary general, gave a report on progress made under the Ottawa Plan, as well as the ILO's World Employment Plan launched in 1969.

U.S. representatives to the conference in addition to Hildebrand were AFL-CIO Inter-American Rep. Andrew C. McLellan, worker delegate; Exec. Dir. William C. Doherty, Jr., of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, labor adviser; Edwin P. Neilan, board chairman for the Bank of Delaware, employer delegate; and Francis W. Herron of the U.S. Embassy at Caracas, a government representative.

Senate Unit Approves Direct Vote Amendment

The Senate Judiciary Committee has given an 11-6 endorsement of a proposed constitutional amendment for direct election of the President and Vice President—a major goal of the AFL-CIO.

Last September, the House voted 339-70 approval of a direct election amendment, well over the required two-thirds margin needed to initiate a constitutional change. But the amendment still faces a hard, close battle on the Senate floor.

Its chief sponsor, Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.), told newsmen it will be "touch and go" whether the necessary two-thirds margin can be achieved.

After approval by both houses of Congress, a constitutional amendment must be ratified by three-fourths of the states to become effective.

Before endorsing the direct election plan, the Senate Judiciary Committee voted down a series of substitute proposals to modify the present Electoral College system. The closest committee vote was a 9-8 rejection of a plan to divide a state's electoral votes in proportion to the vote cast for each candidate in the state.

Under the direct election amendment passed by the House and endorsed by the Senate committee:

● The Electoral College system would be abolished.

● The votes of all Americans would be counted for the candidate of their choice.

● The candidate who received the most votes nationwide would be elected President and his running-mate would be elected Vice President if the ticket received at least 40 percent of the total vote cast.

● If no slate received 40 percent of the vote, there would be a run-off election between the two top candidates.

Opponents have raised a number of arguments against the direct election proposal, some of them contradictory. Thus it has been claimed by some that direct election would nullify the importance of the small states, which now have Electoral College representation greater than their share of the population. And others have contended that the importance of the big industrial states under the present winner-take-all electoral vote system would be diminished.

The trouble with all of the alternative electoral reform proposals, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany stressed in congressional testimony last year, is that they still leave open the possibility that a candidate who receives fewer votes than his opponent can be elected President of the United States.

Only under a direct election system, Meany stressed, can there be a firm assurance that this will not happen.

New Grant Awarded To Senior Citizens

The National Council of Senior Citizens has been awarded $3.4 million in federal funds to extend for a third year its program of recruiting the elderly poor for part-time jobs in public and non-private community agencies.

The program, renewed until Apr. 14, 1971, under a Labor Dept. contract, is known as Senior Aides. The project began in June 1968. It seeks out and trains the elderly for jobs in old age homes, offices, libraries, child care centers and a variety of other positions.

As Medical Costs Soar:

Cure of Health Care Crisis Keyed to National Insurance

The cost of major illness is so high that nine of every 10 citizens "are medically indigent right now," writes Rep. Martha W. Griffiths (D-Mich.) in the American Federationist.

The only solution to their plight in an ever-worsening medical care crisis, she emphasizes, is "a comprehensive national health insurance program with comprehensive financing."

Mrs. Griffiths explains in the April issue of the magazine her labor-backed bill to establish such a program and she exposes present health care as "a 19th Century cottage industry shackling sophisticated, 20th Century technology."

The article is illustrated by charts showing that medical care prices and hospital charges have climbed much faster than the rising costs of other consumer items.

Another chart traces the sharp rise in total U.S. expenditures for health, from $12.1 billion in 1950 to $60.3 billion in 1969. This spending has absorbed a steadily greater percentage of the gross national product, going from 4.6 to 6.7 percent in the 19 year period.

The latest figures show that medical costs are going up at an increasing rate. For example: Payments for hospital care rose by 17 percent between 1968 and 1969. Medical care costs as a percent of the GNP jumped by nearly 1 percent between 1965 and 1969.

Even worse than the statistics on the soaring cost of medical care, Mrs. Griffiths declares, are the facts that workers and the poor pay an inordinate share of the total medical bill and that the present medical care system is a failure.

Noting that average health expenditures now amount to $294 a year for each individual in the nation, she adds, "For some middle Americans, this means spending 10 to 25 percent of their income on health and medical services."

"Current tax deduction for medical expenses favor the rich, simply because they can afford large expenditures for health care and therefore receive large tax deductions for them," Mrs. Griffiths points out.

The inefficiency of the present system, the article asserts, is borne out by statistics showing that U.S. rates of infant and adult mortality rank higher than in most developed nations; there are few doctors for ghetto residents; and "modern miracles of medicine" are only available in large urban areas.

Mrs. Griffiths stresses that her bill to set up a national health insurance program would make a full range of health services available to all Americans regardless of age or income.

It would provide for unlimited hospital and nursing home care, physician services including surgery, eye care including an allowance for glasses and prescription drugs.

For token fees—$2 per a visit—there would be dental care for all children under 16, home calls by doctors, and home health services. The most anyone would have to pay out of his own pocket for direct fees would be $50 a year for an individual or $100 for a family.

The benefits would be financed under social security, with employers paying 3 percent of their payroll into the program, the federal government matching that amount, and workers paying a 1 percent payroll tax as their share.

The legislation not only would provide free choice of physician, but would also permit beneficiaries a free choice of health delivery systems—individual or group practice.

Physicians are assured that the program will not interfere with the clinical practice of medicine. They would be free to participate or not participate in the program.

At the same time, Mrs. Griffiths explains, "the bill would make it possible for doctors and dentists to bypass time-consuming business administration and bookkeeping functions and permit them to concentrate on the practice of medicine and dentistry."

Adoption of the program, she states, "would not only contain the rising cost of health care" within the present limit of 6.7 percent of the GNP, but also have the potential for reducing that percentage over the years.

"The time is long overdue to make comprehensive health care a matter of right for all Americans, in all income levels, rather than a matter of privilege, pity or proximity," she concludes.

'This Is for All of Us!'

Unions Urged to Rally Support of Griffiths Bill

New York—A national health insurance program would provide quality health care for all Americans, increase the efficiency of its delivery and control its cost, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman emphasized here.

He urged unions to publicize "in every way possible" the bill introduced by Rep. Martha W. Griffiths (D-Mich.) to establish the program and said the AFL-CIO is pledged to an unending fight for its passage.

Seidman discussed the legislation and its vital importance on Labor Press Conference, a weekly radio show over WNYC, coordinated by the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trade Council of Greater New York.

The program, moderated by Richard Pyatt, centers on a wide range of labor issues. Interviewing Seidman were Richard Rohman, public relations director, Utility Workers Union Local 1-2; Tor Cedervall, managing editor of the RWDSU Record, published by the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union; and Dorothy Nies, assistant editor of the Brooklyn Longshoreman, publication of Longshoreman's Local 1814.

Seidman described a "cost-controlling mechanism" in the Griffiths' bill whereby two committees — one representing health providers and the other consumers—would make recommendations annually on the charges made by providers of health care.

On the basis of these recommendations, administrators of the program would set charges which could vary on a regional basis with hospitals, doctors, group health plans, and other program participants.

"So instead of having the situation we have had under Medicare and other medical programs, where in effect the providers determine their compensation, you would have real two-way bargaining," Seidman observed.

The delivery of medical care, he said, would be greatly facilitated by making it possible for patients to get treatment "in the setting which is most appropriate"—at home, in a doctor's office or a hospital when needed.

In another area, Seidman said that national health insurance "would put equal dollars for medical care in the hands of all consumers," whether they lived in Mississippi or New York, in rural or urban areas, in ghetto or suburb.

This factor, he said, would go a long way toward eliminating the present "lack of balance" in the distribution of doctors, which statistics show ranges from a ratio of more than 200 per 100,000 residents in affluent regions to only 10 per 100,000 in poor areas.

Seidman conceded that there would be opposition to national health insurance from "the more conservative" doctors and parts of the health industry, such as the insurance companies.

But he predicted that the program will become reality, because "the American people are becoming aroused in favor of its need by the inadequacy of medical care and the tremendous increases in its cost."

Stiffer Curbs Pressed On Credit Rating Abuses

A Senate-passed bill to regulate credit bureaus should be strengthened to give more effective protection to consumers, the AFL-CIO urged in testimony before a Senate Banking subcommittee.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said this could best be done by substituting provisions of a bill introduced by the subcommittee's chairman, Rep. Leonor K. Sullivan (D-Mo.).

"We are delighted to endorse it," he testified.

The bill the Senate passed last November says credit reports can be furnished only to firms or persons with a legitimate business need for the information. It prohibits reporting of adverse information more than seven years old, with certain exceptions, and requires reverification of adverse information more than three months old.

It also requires businesses that reject a consumer for credit to advise the applicant and identify the credit reporting agency. And it requires credit reporting agencies to disclose on request all information in the consumer's file.

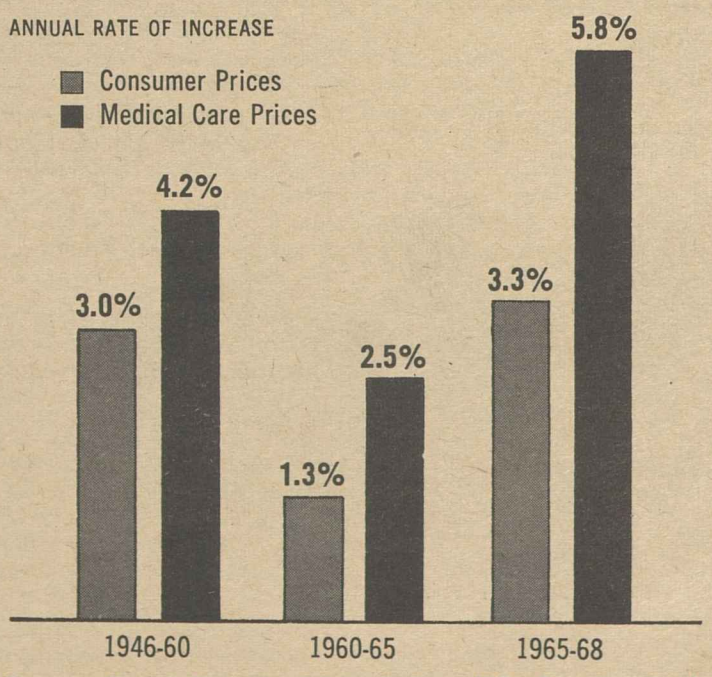
Nevertheless, Biemiller said, the Senate bill has "major defects" which need to be corrected.

He praised Mrs. Sullivan's bill for assigning regulatory power over credit reporting to the Federal Trade Commission, so that cases can be decided on the basis of clear-cut rules, "without endless individual court rulings."

The Sullivan bill also restricts the reporting of material that "constitutes an undue infringement of the individual's right to privacy."

A strong right of privacy provision in the law is especially important, Biemiller stressed.



He charged that "the technological means of prying and spying, of recording and storing huge amounts of information in computer banks on millions of people, of instantaneous distribution of a person's entire record, supplies a new and terrifying dimension to the capacity of businesses and governments to encroach on individual privacy."

In addition, Biemiller said, the Senate bill protects credit bureaus against law suits based on defamation of character, invasion of privacy or negligence. This would "render the consumer legally helpless in obtaining redress," he said.

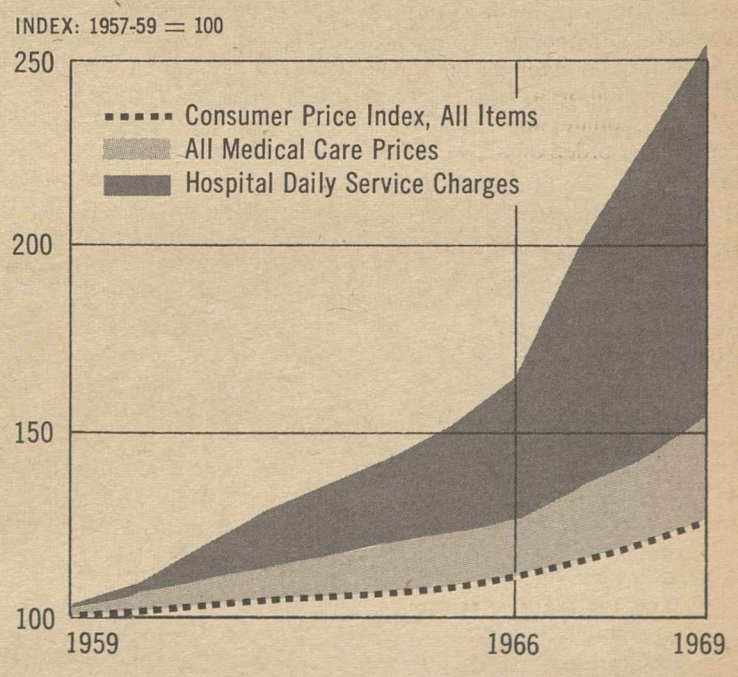
By contrast, the Sullivan bill "clearly improves the consumer's legal position and should serve as an additional incentive to the reporting industry to perform its functions with sensitivity and responsibility toward those whose reputations are entrusted to their care."



It would also give a consumer the right to know the source of adverse information so that he can challenge its accuracy if he considers it incorrect.

Ratification Pressed On Genocide Pacts

lumbia, a former Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for international organization affairs, and a former senior adviser to the U.S. Delegation to the U.N. General Assembly.

The Ad Hoc Committee on the Human Rights and Genocide Treaties consists of 52 labor, religious, civic and nationality groups representing millions of Americans. Gardner testified at subcommittee hearings on the convention, which was submitted for ratification by Pres. Truman in June 1949.

Labor Represented

Among organizations represented on the committee are the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.; Teachers; State, County & Municipal Employes; Sleeping Car Porters; Ladies' Garment Workers; Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, and Textile Workers Union of America.

The AFL-CIO has for many years pressed for Senate ratification of the convention on genocide, as well as other UN human rights conventions to abolish forced labor, guarantee political rights of women and assure freedom of association.

A resolution adopted by the 1969 AFL-CIO convention emphasized that "the national interests of the American people, the international repute and stature of our country, demand prompt Senate ratification of these conventions."

In his testimony, Gardner pointed out that 75 countries have already ratified the convention and the United States is the only major UN member which has not.

"The result of our inaction has been diplomatic embarrassment. Our friends cannot understand it. Our adversaries exploit it," he said.

He also noted that objections raised against ratification have been "carefully examined and rejected by all the relevant divisions of the American Bar Association." Furthermore, he noted that ratification of the convention would create no new criminal liability for American citizens, since genocide already is a crime under federal and state law. He continued:

"The convention has been carefully and strictly drawn to require specific intent to commit genocide. Therefore, it does not apply, as some have suggested, to racial discrimination, to segregation, or to American military operations in Viet Nam. . . .

"If a foreign sovereign includes genocide among the crimes which it condemns, then Americans can be accused of committing it there, even if neither the United States nor the other country is a party to the convention. Our ratification would not make Americans any more subject to foreign prosecution for genocide than they already are.

"American citizens could not be extradited to Viet Nam to be tried for genocide or any other crime. Our law forbids extradition in the absence of an extradition agreement between the foreign government and ourselves. We have no such agreement with any part of Viet Nam. Article VII of the convention requires extradition for genocide only in accordance with laws and treaties in force."

He concluded:

"Our ratification of this convention will dissipate the embarrassing contradiction between our failure to act and our traditional leadership in support of basic human rights. Ratification will put the United States in a better legal and moral position to protest acts of genocide in other parts of the world.

"Ratification will also increase United States influence in the continuing UN process of defining and implementing legal norms in the field of human rights. This is surely a cause that expresses the highest ideals of the American people and advances our national interest.

"At a time when our commitment to human dignity is being questioned by some of our own people as well as by some overseas, it is particularly important that we ratify a treaty so fundamental in importance and so thoroughly consistent with our national purpose."

MARITIME LABOR LEADERS from Asia, Africa and Latin America conferred with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and other federation leaders in Washington after participating in an international conference on container-shipping in Chicago. Shaking hands with Meany is Pres. # Court Rejects Sears Appeal On Picketing

The Supreme Court dismissed an appeal by Sears, Roebuck & Co. in a labor case in which the store chain claimed the right to appeal a legal ruling when the National Labor Relations Board refused to do so.

The high court, in an unsigned decision, vacated an appeals court ruling denying Sears the right to appeal and returned the case to the U.S. District Court in Denver with directions to dismiss the company's complaint as moot.

Last month the AFL-CIO filed a friend-of-the-court brief asking the justices to deny the appeal.

The case started in 1968, when Carpet Layers Local 419 of the Painters began picketing Sears stores in Denver because Sears was hiring carpet installers with whom the union had a dispute. The District Court refused to issue an anti-picketing injunction, and the NLRB regional director decided not to appeal.

Sears filed its own appeal, and the 10th Circuit Court ruled that the firm had no right to do so. Meanwhile the NLRB issued a decision that the picketing was illegal, and Local 419 removed its pickets.

Nixon Stand Threatens Voting Rights Extension

after the voting rights legislation, was the confirmation of Judge G. Harrold Carswell to the Supreme Court.

At that time, the southern bloc felt certain of Carswell's confirmation but feared the nomination might be sidetracked by a long filibuster or that votes for Carswell would be lost if preceded by a heated civil rights battle.

There has been no open threat of a filibuster, but civil rights supporters are convinced the danger is real if the southern bloc gets another crack at the Voting Rights Act.

That's where the President's letter on the 18-year-old vote came in.

Nixon wrote House leaders that he considers that it would be unconstitutional for Congress to lower the voting age by law, rather than through a constitutional amendment.

While acknowledging that the Supreme Court would eventually rule on the issue, Nixon said numerous local or state elections would be held before the court acted and the results would be put in doubt if the 18-year-old vote were subsequently ruled unconstitutional.

It would have "immense and damaging effects," Nixon warned, and if the issue were not decided until after the 1972 presidential election, "the nation could be confronted with a crisis of the first magnitude."

The end result, Nixon claimed, might be to "leave our young people frustrated, embittered and voteless."

The President's fears were sharply challenged by supporters of the legislation who pointed out that the Supreme Court would be able to consider the constitutional issue well before major elections take place—giving the case the same priority it has given other constitutional controversies involving pending elections.

To Chairman Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.) of the House Judiciary Committee, the President's letter is "part of the southern strategy to kill the voting rights bill."

Ironically, Celler does not personally favor the 18-year-old vote. But he told newsmen, "I want the voting rights bill" and the best way to assure it is for the House to accept the Senate measure intact.

Before the President's intervention, a group of 24 moderate Republicans had joined in a letter to all of their fellow Republican congressmen urging that the Senate-passed bill be approved without change.

Since the President's letter, almost all of the signers have publicly or privately indicated they have not changed their mind—and will vote to accept the Senate bill when the issue reaches the House floor.

Before the question can be put before the House, the Rules Committee has to approve a resolution to accept the Senate amendments. It is expected to do so, and the key vote will then come on a parliamentary move to approve the rule.

Economic Slump Stirs Concern, Signs Point to Further Slowdown

new hirings and recalls to jobs, fell from 43 to 40 per 1,000 between February and March. The new level is the lowest since January 1965.

Manufacturing layoffs in March, BLS also reported, were 18 per 1,000 workers—the highest for a single month in six years.

Two other economic indicators also contained bad news:

Business failures rose by 13 percent in March, Dun & Bradstreet reported, to reach a 23-month high of 921. The help-wanted advertising index kept by the National Industrial Conference Board dropped 9 points last month to 194. It was 37 points lower than in March 1969.

In other developments concerning the economy:

● Walter H. Heller, former economic adviser to Democratic Administrations, told the U.S. Chamber of Commerce's annual meeting in Washington that inflation "has sunk its roots too deep" for tight money policies to be effective in curing it.

● A publication of the Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis predicted that the unemployment rate will reach 6.7 percent by the end of 1971 even if the money supply grows at the rate of 3 percent a year. In recent months, it has not grown at all.

Faced with this mounting national concern the White House said that a television speech by Pres. Nixon on the economy is "very likely" but no date was set.

Asked if Nixon is worried about the state of the economy and if he believes that the public is concerned, a White House spokesman said:

"The President is certainly not worried about it. He of course is concerned, but is confident that his programs are working. He feels the American people should share that confidence."

However, the White House was involved in two developments which the Wall Street Journal said added "to the atmosphere of uncertainty about the economic outlook."

Nixon held a meeting with his Council of Economic Advisers to which five outside economists were invited.

The White House didn't disclose what was discussed, but the Journal noted that among those attending the meeting were Pierre Reinfret, a New York economist who has been predicting more inflation, and Milton Friedman, a University of Chicago economist who has warned of a greater economic slump.

In the other development, Herbert Stein, a member of Nixon's economic council, conceded in a Philadelphia speech that "some further increase" is possible in the nation's jobless rate, which at 4.4 percent in March was up 1 percent over the year.

But he contended that "the slowdown of production and employment has been small and there is every sign that it will be of limited duration."

Even at 4.4 percent, the overall unemployment rate is "close to what has commonly been considered full employment," Stein said.

The Dent subcommittee also received a detailed description of an industrywide, multi-employer welfare and pension plan from the Clothing Workers.

Jacob Sheinkman, ACWA vice president and general counsel, stressed the security of the nationwide programs, the portability of benefits, which follow a worker from city to city and from one branch of the industry to another, and the fact that the closing of a plant has no effect on the security of the fund.

For these reasons, he urged, multi-employer programs should be excluded from funding and vesting requirements.

Farm Union Spurs Drive For Full Labor Law Rights

Jobless Aid Bill Moves To Passage

Congress moved closer to final action on expanded unemployment insurance coverage as a new series of government statistics pointed up the worsening of the nation's job picture.

A House-Senate conference committee approved a "half-loaf" bill expanding coverage to some 4.75 million workers, but leaving 12 million others still unprotected against job loss. Among those left out were farm workers, whose inclusion had been urged by both the AFL-CIO and the Administration.

The Senate-passed bill had included workers on large farms, but the conference committee dropped that coverage from the final version.

The congressional action came amid indications that the unemployment rate for April would continue its steady rise and move close to the 5 percent mark. For March the rate was 4.4 percent. The latest job figures were to be announced after the AFL-CIO News went to press.

Most of the provisions of the new legislation won't take effect until Jan. 1, 1972, although states whose legislatures act sooner can provide earlier effective dates for a new extended benefits provision of the law.

The bill, which still must receive final passage from both the House and Senate, sets up a program of extended benefits during periods of severe unemployment.

When the unemployment rate "trigger" point is reached, persons who have exhausted their state benefits and are still jobless become eligible for up to 13 additional weeks of benefits, financed jointly from state and federal unemployment funds.

The national trigger point is 4.5 percent of insured employment for three consecutive months. The insured rate is always lower than the overall unemployment rate. Thus the 4.5 percent would probably mean an actual unemployment rate of about 6 percent.

Extended benefits would go into effect in a single state if the insured unemployment rate in the state averaged 4 percent for any 13-week period, and if that figure were at least 20 percent above the rate for the comparable period of the previous two years.

These were some of the signposts that added urgency to the congressional action:

- Factory layoffs rose to the highest level in six years—to 18 per

The union struck Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. plants with 23,000 workers Apr. 21 and picket lines are being maintained. Meanwhile contract talks are continuing at that firm and also with two other members of the Big Four—Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. and Uniroyal Inc.—and with General Tire &

FREEDOM BELL of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee is unveiled in the AFL-CIO building lobby by Cesar Chavez, right, and Federation Pres. George Meany. The bell will stay chained until agricultural workers win full freedom to organize and bargain under the law. ## House Unit Votes 5% Benefit Boost

Benefit increases of 5 percent a month for the more than 26 million persons on the nation's social security rolls, effective Jan. 1, 1971, have been approved by the House Ways & Means Committee.

The committee also adopted changes in widows' and widowers' benefits and the method of computing benefits for men that will bring additional increases to more than 13 million persons.

Widows and widowers 65 and over who now are limited to 82.5 percent of their spouse's retirement benefit would be allowed to receive a full 100 percent of the annuity. The committee estimated the change would produce greater benefits for 3.3 million persons.

Men, whose benefits now are computed on the basis of all working years up to age 65, would have the computation based only on those years up to 62 as is now the case with women. It was estimated that "correction of this discrepancy" would increase earnings for about 10 million persons.

The committee further voted to finance benefit increases by raising from $7,800 to $9,000 the wage base on which social security taxes are paid.

These were major changes announced by Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) as the committee completed the bulk of its work on amendments to the Social Security Act.

In other areas, the committee approved several proposals designed to control the soaring costs of Medicare and of Medicaid, the federal-state program to provide health care for the poor.

One significant action would allow government reimbursement under Medicare for health care and services provided by prepaid group health plans. The provision is considered an encouragement to the development of such plans.

The committee recommended an increase to $2,000 from the present $1,680 limitation on how much a social security beneficiary can earn

Consumers Urged To Support Label

By Eugene A. Kelly

The AFL-CIO farm workers stepped up their campaign for full protection of U.S. labor laws and consumer support for union-label grapes.

Cesar Chavez spelled out his union's goals at a rally on the Washington, D.C., Mall and at the unveiling of a "freedom bell" at AFL-CIO headquarters climaxing a three-day 30-mile march from the new city of Columbia, Md., to the national capital.

The United Farm Workers, he told the rally, have begun to win the goal of signed contracts with table grape growers, and from now on will press harder for the same legal protections that all other U.S. union members have—the right to organize without employer interference, to be protected against injuries and health hazards, to bargain for decent wages and working conditions.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany welcomed the marchers to the federation building. He unveiled the 290-pound freedom bell they had mounted on wheels and pulled on their pilgrimage from Columbia. It was shackled with chains to symbolize the failure of Congress to extend the protection of the labor laws to agricultural workers.

Noting that the bell was cast in the same British foundry where the Liberty Bell was cast almost 200 years ago, the AFL-CIO president said "the fact that it is chained into silence, awaiting the liberation of the American farm worker, will I think be understood very clearly by all of the American people."

The "fight for justice" for the farm worker will go on with the "full support" of the AFL-CIO, Meany pledged, "until this bell can proclaim liberty throughout the land for all. . . especially the farm workers."

Chavez said that "after serious consideration we decided that symbolically it would be a good thing to have the bell chained, to keep

Labor Asks Senate to Reject Miller

The AFL-CIO has called on the Senate to reject the nomination of Edward B. Miller to be a member of the National Labor Relations Board on the ground that his entire career has been spent as a lawyer for management.

Federation Pres. George Meany told the Senate Labor Committee that the AFL-CIO firmly believes that "no one should be appointed to the board from the ranks of labor or management, and that includes union lawyers and employer lawyers."

Stressing that the NLRB was meant to function in a non-partisan, quasi-judicial manner and that it has a specialized jurisdiction handling only matters involving employers, unions or both, Meany said precautions should be taken not to appoint to the board persons whose backgrounds are "peculiarly" open to charges of bias and prejudice.

He cited a press conference at the White House where Miller was introduced as "chairman-designate of the National Labor Relations Board" at which Miller told reporters that "all of my experience

AFL-CIO Blames Tariff Loopholes For 'Export' of 100,000 U.S. Jobs

Loopholes in tariff regulations have allowed U.S.-based multi-national companies to export about 100,000 American jobs since 1967, the AFL-CIO told the Tariff Commission.

Calling for repeal of the loopholes—items 806.30 and 807 of the Tariff Code—Federation Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger declared that the jobs being "exported" are the kind needed at home for the long-term unemployed.

They are much more needed now, he stressed, "at a time of spreading layoffs, production cutbacks and rising unemployment."

Goldfinger, appearing before the commission with AFL-CIO economist Elizabeth Jager, said the sections of the code should have been repealed in 1967 when the AFL-CIO first urged such action. Continued delays in repealing the loopholes, he said, "encourage the growth" of foreign subsidiary operations of American firms.

The sections the AFL-CIO wants repealed provide for reduced U.S. tariff duties on imports which contain U.S.-produced components that have been assembled or processed abroad.

The tariff duty, therefore, is applied effectively to the value added in foreign assembly or processing —"often to merely the very low wages of workers in foreign operations," the federation's statement declared. It added:

"Under 807 the advantage to the firm is twofold. There is a substantial advantage from the utilization of American equipment and know-how usually combined with wage and fringe benefits that are 50 to 90 percent less than in the U.S."

The AFL-CIO noted that while studies of the sections by the without losing some or all of his annuity.

Under a new schedule of tax rates approved by the committee, the rate paid by workers and employers would go to 6 percent each on Jan. 1, 1975, and 6.5 percent on Jan. 1, 1980. Social security amendments passed in 1967 call for the present 4.8 percent rate to go to 5.2 percent next January.

When the committee's bill comes up in the House it will probably be under a no-amendment rule. However, assuming its passage in the House, the legislation will go to the Senate floor open to amendments.

Labor and liberal groups are expected to press for changes in the Senate to raise benefits further, extend Medicare coverage to the disabled under social security and include the cost of prescription drugs under the program.

Labor also has pressed for an increase in social security's minimum benefit from its present $55 a month level to at least $90. The only increase in the minimum that would come through the committee's action would be through the 5 percent across-the-board boost in benefits.

If the committee's proposed general increase is enacted this year, it will mean that the 91st Congress will have raised all cash benefits under social security by 20 percent. In December, Congress passed a 15 percent hike in benefits.

Pres. Nixon's social security amendments sent to Congress last year called for only a 10 percent general increase. Nixon opposed any larger boost than that, even though Democratic leaders in Congress considered the 1969 increase only a "stopgap" action.

- The unemployment rate in poverty neighborhoods averaged 6.6 percent during the first quarter of 1970, up a full point from the same period of 1969. The increase was sharpest for white adult men, whose rate jumped from 3.9 to 5.7 percent, and for Negro teenagers, up from 20.9 to 32.7 percent.
- Three more major communities—Grand Rapids, Mich., Lowell, Mass., and Utica-Rome, N.Y. —were added to the Labor Dept.'s growing list of areas of "substantial" unemployment, over 6 percent. There are now 11 major areas on the list; a year ago, there were only four.

Leo M. Solomon, veteran newsman and noted photography consultant for a number of Washington-based labor organizations, died after a severe stroke. He was 74.

Solomon, a native of New York, had held major posts with the New York Times, Wide World Photos and Associated Press—spanning a period of about 30 years. He also was a photo editor for the U.S. Information Agency.

Solomon later served as a photography consultant for several AFL-CIO departments and affiliates, in addition to being picture editor of Press Associates, Inc.

Health Insurance Plan Pressed by Assembly

New York—Adoption of a national health insurance program to provide a "universal financing system for comprehensive health care" has been called for by the 37th session of the American Assembly.

In preparation for the program, it declared, the nation should begin to restructure the present health system "to promote rational organization and reward efficiency in the nation's competitive and pluralistic tradition."

The call for national health insurance was one of a number of recommendations adopted by the assembly's 71 participants during a four-day meeting.

The non-partisan educational organization, an affiliate of Columbia University, was established by Dwight D. Eisenhower in 1950 when he was the university's president. It meets regularly to draw up programs on important public-interest issues.

Participants at the latest assembly, considering "The Health of Americans," were drawn from many areas of public and private life. Included among them was AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman.

In a final report, the assembly said that the nation is in a health crisis, "manifested by inadequate medical services, which are themselves fragmented, inefficient, inequitably distibuted and uncoordinated."

"The crisis," it emphasized, "can be contained, but only by national commitment to prompt action of a sweeping nature."

The report emphasized that health personnel are in short supply and maldistributed, and that health facilities are uneconomically utilized and poorly managed.

"Health costs," it added, "are inequitably distributed, rising faster than other costs, and are catastrophic for many."

Among its recommendations, the assembly called for the establishment of a Council of Health Advisers in the executive branch of government, required to make an annual report on the status of the nation's health and health system.

In another area, it proposed federal payments for personal health services in such a way as to encourage development by organizations offering comprehensive health care, particularly through per capita payments.

The assembly said that "efficient delivery of comprehensive personal health services can be carried out most effectively through the vehicle of group practice." It urged that "incentives" be provided for physicians and other health personnel to organize such group practices, and called for removal of all legal barriers to their existence.

Drug Prevention Week Stresses Cooperation

Pres. Nixon has designated the week beginning May 24 as Drug Abuse Prevention Week, in a call to stem the growing misuse of drugs.

He urged civic, professional and business groups to join with government agencies and the academic community to cooperate in the development of programs that will deter youths from the use of drugs.

Labor Urges Confirmation:

Blackmun Backed For Supreme Court

The AFL-CIO announced its support of Judge Harry A. Blackmun for the Supreme Court and urged the Senate to confirm his nomination.

In a letter to Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman James O. Eastland (D-Miss.), AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said Blackmun's record as a judge entitles him to "the respect of all Americans, including those whose views are in no way identical to his."

Labor's decision to support the nomination, Meany stressed, has been "guided by the same standards and principles which led us to earlier oppose the nominations of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., and Judge G. Harrold Carswell."

Blackmun, 61, subsequently was unanimously approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee, clearing the way for a confirmation vote by the full Senate.

Meany termed Blackmun "a distinguished conservative, who has demonstrated his respect for the law and legal craftsmanship, who has not set himself against any group and who would grace the high court with his learning."

He said the AFL-CIO had been "gravely concerned" that one of the lawyers interviewed by the American Bar Association had expressed the view that Blackmun's "basic inclination is against organized labor."

The AFL-CIO's own review of Blackmun's decisions "shows that he has on more than one occasion cast his vote for anti-union decisions which were, in our view, erroneous," Meany said. "However, we do not believe that Judge Blackmun has strayed so far from the path of reason in this area of the law as to be disqualified from the Supreme Court.

"For his written opinions indicate that when he gives his full attention to labor-management relations he has the capacity to respond to pro-labor arguments soundly grounded in law."

Meany also expressed concern over Blackmun's having sat on cases in which he owned stock in companies which were litigants before him, but noted that Blackmun had termed his own action "unwise" and told the Judiciary Committee of his intention to dispose of his stock holdings. "It is our view that in light of all the circumstances, this error does not disqualify him," Meany said.

Blackmun, a native of Minnesota and a lifelong friend of Chief Justice Warren E. Burger, is the third Appeals Court judge nominated by Pres. Nixon for the seat vacated last year by the resignation of Abe Fortas. The other two, Haynsworth and Carswell, were rejected by the Senate. The AFL-CIO opposed both nominations.

Meany mentioned this opposition in his support of Blackmun, noting that "in every critical respect, Judge Blackmun represents a significant break with the two rejected nominees."

"As the record clearly shows, the AFL-CIO opposed the nomination of Judge Haynsworth on the ground that his decisions proved him to be anti-labor, that he had demonstrated indifference to the legitimate aspirations of Negroes and that he had demonstrated a lack of ethical standards while on the bench," Meany said.

Similarly, Meany said the nomination of Carswell was opposed on the grounds "that its sole justification was narrowly partisan, divisive political strategy and that it constituted a slap in the face of this nation's Negro citizens."

"Because of the courage and wisdom of the Senate, both of these unfortunate nominations failed," Meany told Eastland. "The President responded to the Senate's judgments by nominating Judge Blackmun."

Stronger Social Security System Key to Future Retirement Plans

Today's workers—even those still decades away from their own retirement—"have a tremendous stake" in strengthening the nation's retirement security programs "right now."

A working paper of the Senate Special Committee on Aging emphasized that point as well as the need for "a major overhaul in the benefit structure and the financing" of the social security system.

The author of the paper was Nelson H. Cruikshank, president of the National Council of Senior Citizens. He testified on it at the committee's final round of hearings in its year-long inquiry into the problems of the elderly.

In a preface to the report, Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr., (D-N.J.), committee chairman, said that Cruikshank was asked to draw from his long experience in dealing with the elderly's problems, including his earlier position as head of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security.

"He has responded with a study," Williams said, "which should be read by today's breadwinners as carefully as they would an insurance policy.

"The message is clear: There is no 'we' and 'they' among the young and old of this nation. The young become the old and will share the same problems, just a little later. And successes, too, ultimately become shared."

Cruikshank stressed that it is unrealistic to believe that workers can accumulate sufficient personal savings as a major part of future retirement income.

Although private pensions plans provide implementation to future retirement income for workers, he added, their coverage will continue to be among higher paid workers "while those in the greatest need in old age will be least likely to receive private pensions."

Thus, he pointed out, social security will remain the "basic underpinning" of retirement security for future retirees, and "the level of benefits will largely determine their share in economic abundance."

Although young and middle-aged workers "don't really like to think about their own old age," Cruikshank said, "let's face the facts.

"When today's worker retires some 10, 20, or even 40 years from now, he will not be retiring with a basement crammed full of the food, goods, and services he will need for the rest of his life."

The alternative to workers supporting "vitally needed" social security reforms and increased benefits, Cruikshank suggested, is a return to the "long since gone" days of workers fully supporting their children and their parents.

Much to be preferred, he said, is the present system whereby "the generation in the labor force supports the generation of retirees so that it in turn can be supported in retirement by those then productive."

Cruikshank urged "bold new steps" to permit present retirees to share in the abundance they helped to create and future retirees—today's workers—"to have an income that is adequate in relation to their standard of living prior to retirement."

He called for an immediate increase of 5 percent in monthly social security benefits with a further 20 percent increase effective Jan. 1, 1972, plus improvements in benefits for widows and workers retiring before 65, and expansion of disability benefits and Medicare.

In a letter accompanying the report, Cruikshank answered a recent Reader's Digest article by Robert H. Myers, actuary of the Social Security Administration, attacking "expansionists" who advocate reforms and strong increases in social security benefits.

In the frame of reference used by Myers, Cruikshank said, "It will be clear to all who read my working paper that I am obviously among the 'expansionists.' "

"I take this position without apology," he declared, "because I wholeheartedly believe that in an expanding economy . . . social security should not be the only program that is not expanded.

At State-County Convention:

Full Public Employe Rights Stressed as Immediate Goals

By John R. Oravec

Denver—Riding the crest of a surge in membership, nearly 1,600 delegates gathered here to mobilize the strength of the State, County & Municipal Employes towards the goal of furthering the union rights of public employes.

Pres. Jerry Wurf, citing the epical growth of the SCME as it doubled its rolls to 460,000 members since the union last met here in 1964, signaled the avenues that will be followed in the drive to achieve the goal. He told the 18th biennial convention that they include:

- A national coalition of public employe organizations—inside and outside organized labor—to work cooperatively toward improving wages and benefits of the public employe.
- Full legislative support and action for the adoption by Congress of a National Public Employes Relations Act that is designed to put the public worker on equal footing with the rights of worker in private industry.

Wurf, who was re-elected to his fourth consecutive two-year term, stressed the growth factor of SCME as the basis for its strength in the drive for winning more union rights for its members.

Sec.-Treas. Joseph L. Ames was also re-elected to another term. Both top officers were unopposed.

With its continuing growth, Wurf said, the union has been able to change the thinking of the country on public employe unionism.

Most Americans now accept the right of public workers to organize and bargain collectively, "and some people admit that we might even have the right to strike," he said.

Wurf further noted that the recent postal strike helped tear down the last barricade that would keep the public worker begging for increased wages and benefits rather than negotiating for them.

"We must go on organizing the unorganized in every city, county and state in the United States," Wurf stressed as he observed that while number of jobs in the private sector increased by 40 percent during a 20-year period, jobs in state and local governments have expanded by 140 percent.

Wurf pointed out in his keynote address that union's unprecedented growth has occurred despite repressive state laws. While there are now 21 states with laws that promise some for bargaining rights to the public workers, there is not one state that grants them the same basic rights as the worker in private industry.

"This union is determined to bring about the passage of a federal law giving us the same rights as workers in private industry enjoy under the National Labor Relations Act," he said.

"We are not and will not be second-class citizens," Wurf stressed as he pledged the union's vigorous support for passage of the Public Employes Relations Act that was introduced recently by Rep. Jacob H. Gilbert (D-N.Y.).

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland told the delegates that federal laws clearly define the rights of collective bargaining for the worker in private industry.

"It is surely just, necessary and desirable for the public employe" to have the same rights, he declared.

The labor movement, Kirkland noted, is advancing along new frontiers, and that the public worker is finding his place in trade unionism. He said no organization has a brighter future than SCME.

The convention reinforced Wurf's call for formation of a public employes coalition by directing the SCME leadership to "explore and discuss with other public employe unions . . . including AFL-CIO affiliates, unaffiliated unions and the postal labor organizations" to achieve a unified front.

Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.) and Rep. Jerome R. Waldie (D-Calif.) also stressed the need for abolishing bargaining restrictions on public employes. They both also called for realignment of national priorities to meet the needs of disadvantaged Americans.

Waldie observed that "the public employe is the first target of a president, governor or mayor in the balancing of his budget."

Resolutions adopted early in the convention:

- Proposed to have Jan. 15 recognized as a national holiday in the memory of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., who had played a key role in an SCME strike victory in Memphis, Tenn.
- Urged state and local governments to adopt progressive tax systems based on the ability to pay so as to take the burden off the lower income groups. It also called for further tax reforms on the national level.
- Called for Congress to amend the National Labor Relations Act to provide coverage for workers in non-profit hospitals and urged the National Labor Relations Board to assert the jurisdiction it already has over non-profit nursing homes, private universities and charitable and religious organizations.

Rail Carmen Negotiate Hikes in National Pact

The Railway Carmen have negotiated a new agreement that will bring the members on the nation's railroads wage boosts of up to 72 cents an hour over two years.

The contract, reached through lengthy negotiations in Washington, is similar in its terms to those imposed recently by Congress in the dispute involving four other shopcraft unions.

The congressional action, sought by Pres. Nixon, required acceptance of a settlement ratified in December by the Machinists, Boilermakers, and International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers but rejected by the Sheet Metal Workers.

As in the imposed settlement, the Carmen's skilled members will receive increases of 68 cents an hour in retroactive and future increments over a two-year period going back to Jan. 1, 1969.

In addition, the settlement makes effective a 4-cent an hour inequity adjustment previously negotiated by the union for skilled members. Carmen's Pres. George L. O'Brien explained that the adjustment brings these workers to parity with wage boosts negotiated by other shopcraft unions in previous disputes.

The union's less-skilled members—helpers and coach cleaners—will receive a total of 57 cents an hour in wage increases. All told, the contract covers about 52,000 of the union's members.

The agreement also contains the controversial rule change, which had blocked settlement of the dispute involving the IAM, IBEW, Boilermakers and Sheet Metal Workers. The rule permits some crossing of craft jurisdiction lines.

Meanwhile, drawn-out wage disputes involving other railroad unions and the carriers neared a showdown stage.

- The Railway & Airlines Clerks, Maintenance of Way Employes and Dining Car Employes (part of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes) announced that strike ballots have been distributed to their members, totalling about 450,000. The unions are engaged in a joint movement for two 12 percent pay increases, a guaranteed annual wage and improved job security.
- Pres. Charles Luna of the United Transportation Union reported that the union has invoked the services of the National Mediation Board in trying to settle its negotiations for two annual 15 percent wage hikes. UTU is circulating a strike ballot.
- The Firemen & Oilers, whose members previously authorized a strike if necessary, reported some progress in its demands for substantial wage increases and corrected inequities.
- In the wage case of the Railroad Signalmen, the mediation board announced that it was assigning a mediator to help achieve a settlement. The union seeks a sizable wage increase in a three-year contract.
- Other unions pressing for negotiations on wage movements are the Train Dispatchers, Yardmasters, Railway Supervisors and the unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers.

Active Pollution Fight Pressed in Minnesota

Duluth—Minnesota's labor movement has committed itself to an active, year-around leadership role in the battle against spreading pollution.

It took on the assignment at a two-day conference here, sponsored by the Minnesota State AFL-CIO. Taking part in the anti-pollution sessions were some 200 union delegates, environmental experts and national, state and local officials.

The theme of speakers, including Sen. Walter Mondale (D-Minn.) and Rep. John A. Blatnik (D-Minn.), was the importance of keeping up the pressure for effective pollution control programs.

A once-a-year concern with the environment isn't enough, participants stressed.

Mondale told the conference that the only way to bring about a clean environment is to "spend money to solve the problems."

If people wait for industry and governments to "study our environment to death," it could be too late, he warned.

There must be nationwide federal pollution standards, he urged, so that industries will know that they cannot escape the obligation to preserve the environment.

Union spokesmen said environmental issues are becoming contract issues.

Albert Volalillo, president of a Duluth area local of the Longshoremen, said assurances against pollution of Lake Superior and the Duluth harbor would be sought in future negotiations with shipping firms.

Jack Sheehan, national legislative director of the Steelworkers, stressed that technology is available to overcome industrial pollution and the only issue is who is going to pay for it.

He said one-fourth of steel industry "open hearth" operations meet 90 percent pollution-free standards. The immediate job, he said, is to bring up the other three-fourths to that standard.

"Management will tell you that it would be too costly to make the environment safe," he told the group. "Don't let them get away with it. The technology is available and it's up to us to see that they live up to their responsibilities."

IBEW Research Director Noe Dies

James J. Noe, director of research and education for the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, died at 55 after a brief illness.

In 32 years of IBEW membership, Noe served as business representative of IBEW Local 369 in Louisville, Ky., and as an international representative on the IBEW staff before being named director of education in 1956.

Noe directed union leadership training programs, administered the union's $120,000 electrical engineering scholarship program and prepared collective bargaining material for union negotiators.

Noe was a special labor consultant to the Atomic Energy Commission and other government agencies. He was a member of the Labor Dept.'s labor research advisory committee; served on the National Society Council's labor conference, and was active in the Boy Scouts. Survivors include his wife Edith, of University Park, Md.; three children and five grandchildren.

Stories on Haynsworth Win Eaton Top Honors

A series of stories that played a key role in the Senate rejection of the nomination of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr. to the U.S. Supreme Court won top journalism honors for William J. Eaton of the Chicago Daily News.

On successive days, Eaton was awarded the Pulitzer Prize for national reporting and a Sidney Hillman Foundation Award for outstanding achievement in mass communications.

Eaton's series, "The Appearance of Impropriety," disclosed in documented articles the conflict of interest of Judge Haynsworth that ultimately led to the rejection of his nomination by the Senate.

The Pulitzer citation to Eaton noted that "he undertook the investigation of Judge Haynsworth's qualifications . . . after his newspaper had come out editorially in support of Haynsworth's candidacy."

Winner of a Nieman fellowship in 1962, Eaton had covered labor for United Press International before joining the Chicago Daily News in 1966 where he specializes in national economic and labor issues.

Hillman awards, named for Sidney Hillman, first president of the Clothing Workers, went also to Fred Freed for a TV documentary, "Who Killed Lake Erie," produced by him for the National Broadcasting Co.; Rep. Richard D. McCarthy (D-N.Y.) for his book "The Ultimate Struggle" dealing with his fight to curb chemical and biological weapons; and Daniel Lang for an article in the New Yorker Magazine "Casualties of War," about the rape-murder of a young Vietnamese girl by four U.S. enlisted men.

Judges for the 20th annual awards competition held by the Sidney Hillman Foundation were Alan Barth, editorial writer for the Washington Post; Edward P. Morgan, TV commentator for the American Broadcasting Co.; Harrison Salisbury, an assistant managing editor of the New York Times.

Palloni Named Aide To Waymen's President

Detroit—John Palloni has been named assistant to the president of the Maintenance of Way Employes. He succeeds Hubert L. Padgett who has retired after serving in the position for 12 years.

The appointment was announced by Waymen's Pres. Harold C. Crotty. Palloni has been a longtime union leader on the New York Central, now part of Penn-Central.

The Freedom Bell

AN HISTORIC MOMENT in the history of the farm workers' union took place in the AFL-CIO building lobby on May 4, 1970, when the Delano Freedom Bell was placed before the famed mosaic on the American worker. Cesar Chavez, director of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, spoke first. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany responded. Here is what they said:

CHAVEZ: Ever since the union received this bell from England, we have planned that the bell should come to the House of Labor and rest here for at least a day. So that in its history it will have visited this building—will have been in the presence of Pres. Meany, and more importantly it will be a part of labor history that this bell will make as it travels across the land.

We were, of course, happy and anxious that this bell be here, because it symbolizes to us the support that the AFL-CIO and Pres. Meany have given us and the endorsement that, God knows, we need so much in order to stay with the struggle and to continue making progress.

After serious consideration we decided that symbolically it would be a good thing to have the bell chained, to keep it silent, only momentarily, until farm workers are able to get their freedom. Some people across the seas, who gave us the bell do not fully understand the significance of the meaning of the silencing of the bell. We want to tell them and everyone else that the chain only symbolizes what we consider to be the silence of the farm workers for not being able to have their freedom as workers and their union.

At the point when the farm workers are able to make their first big breakthrough and establish a union in the grape fields—at that point we're going to take the chain off—we're going to ring the bell loud enough so that Pres. Meany can hear it in this building—and so that all men of good will will hear it all over the world signifying the end of the oppression of the farm worker.

It's indeed a great pleasure for me to be here and to have the bell here where it should be—in the House of Labor.

MEANY: First, I'd like to express our appreciation to Cesar Chavez and the farm workers for bringing the bell here even for a short time. This bell was cast in the same foundry where the Liberty Bell, which rests in Philadelphia, was cast almost 200 years ago. So we think it has great significance.

The fact that it is chained into silence, awaiting the liberation of the American farm worker, I think will be understood very clearly by all of the American people.

This fight for justice for farm workers has been going on for a long time and I don't know how much longer it is going to go on. But, as far as the AFL-CIO is concerned, it's going to go on until this bell can proclaim liberty throughout the land for all of the people of the land especially the farm workers of the country.

So, I'd like to again pledge to Cesar Chavez and his co-workers the full support of the AFL-CIO, until we can really say that the farm workers are not second-class citizens—that they're covered by the labor laws of the land, the same as all other workers.

I think that is the first requisite to bringing about freedom for farm workers—putting them under the same labor law—giving them the same right to organization, the same right to recognition as the workers in any other part of the land.

So, I'm delighted that you brought the bell here and I look forward to the day when it will ring and ring in a meaningful way.

'The Only Kind to Buy'

A Word Edgewise:

Free, Prime Time TV Basic To Effective Political System

By John P. Roche

IF ONE SHARES my view that a presidential election has a higher priority in American life than a television drama, it makes sense to require the TV stations to provide free, prime time to candidates during two months of every four years. This would insure that, whatever its affluence, a party could bring its candidates and program to the people.

At the same time, however, I think there is a real danger, particularly among Democrats, of assuming that TV has wholly altered the operating assumptions of American politics, that it can serve as a substitute for traditional forms of political organization.

My premise is that TV is most effective precisely among those groups in the population who least need stimulation to participate in elections. And conversely that it is least effective among those segments of the body politic that are habitually inert.

At the risk of being empirical, let us look at the 1968 presidential vote in two sets of congressional districts. The first two are overwhelmingly Negro—California 21 and New York 18. Humphrey won them with, respectively, 92.4 and 87.9 percent of the vote. The second pair are white suburban—California 35 and New York 1—and Nixon got 67.2 and 58.7 percent. The districts are, within each state, comparable in population, that is, they have the same number of potential voters.

In percentage terms, Humphrey really murdered Nixon in the black districts. But then you take another look at the net pluralities and get a terrible shock. In California 21, Humphrey (92.4 percent) emerged with a plurality of 89,046; in California 35, Nixon (67.2 percent) with 118,882. In New York 1, Nixon with 58.7 percent got a plurality of over 61,000, while in New York 18, Humphrey at 87.9 percent won by only 56,981 votes.

The percentages, in short, are virtually meaningless because the base figure of participants varies so radically from one group to another.

If the Negroes of California 21 had voted with the same intensity as the whites in California 35, Humphrey would have come out of that district with a plurality around 250,000. There is no need to labor the point; districts can be found in many other states that tell the same tale.

IN THE IRISH WARDS of New York in my great-grandfather's time this problem was solved by having the activists simply vote on behalf of their inert neighbors. Today this practice is widely and correctly frowned upon, so the question remain: "How do you get them out?" And I submit, the answer is organization, not television.

To summarize, guaranteed access to the people of the United States through television is a necessary precondition for an effective presidential campaign. Congress should enact legislation to require such free time from the nation's trustees, the networks, and TV stations. A formula can be worked out to handle the problem of minor parties.

Ironically, however, this would not necessarily be a break for the poverty-stricken Democrats. The chances are that TV would be most effective among those who are already active (college graduates, for example, who voted 57 percent for Nixon).

If the Democrats are going to get their inert troops to the polls, they will have to continue the arduous labor of mounting registration campaigns, and pulling in the votes on election day.

These voters don't need to be convinced. If they did, TV might be more signficant. They have to be energized, and no TV show ever did that, unless one includes trips to the refrigerator for beer. Effective TV is, in short, necessary for effective campaigning, but it is not sufficient for victory.

Rustin Tells COPE Conference:

Trade Union-Minorities Unity Only Path to Progress for Both

The following is excerpted from the April 27, 1970, issue of Memo from COPE entitled "Coalition: the Only Route to Victory," the text of a speech by civil rights leader Bayard Rustin to a recent COPE area conference.

THERE IS ONLY ONE WAY to destroy the labor-minorities coalition and that is through scarcity, because scarcity will bring about further divisions between old and young, between rich and poor, between black and white—but more seriously, between those who believe in the political process and those who don't.

Now, what Pres. Nixon is depending on is division. While he talks about unity, his objective is division, and he creates this division through policies that make whites fearful and make blacks, who are already frustrated, enraged.

The "Philadelphia plan" is a good illustration of this. He climbs on a white charger supposedly in the interest of black people in order to discredit trade unions.

The Philadelphia plan does not say a thing, except that a contractor must make a good will effort to get Negroes in. So the contractor writes a letter to an Urban League guy or an NAACP guy, and he picks up five blacks who are not new to the trade, but come off another job.

So he picks up five. Now he's OK. He's made a "good will" effort. The building goes up. He fires them two weeks later and they are hired by another contractor who wants to make a "good will" effort, and not a single new job for any blacks.

But while Nixon is on this charger in the interest of black people, he says, incidentally what I forgot to tell you the other day was we have to cut back construction 75 percent. Now I ask you, how can the building trades bring in more minorities while the administration is cutting back federal construction 75 percent?

The result purely and simply is to make the black community angry with the building trades, and a lot of blacks and liberals are falling for that foolishness, not understanding what this Administration's objective is.

My friends, so long as there are inadequate houses in this nation, blacks will be enraged because they do not have them, and whites will be fearful that someone else will come and get their house. This is what the President's "southern strategy" advisers know.

As long as there is unemployment, and as long as the President intends to deal with problems of inflation by making more unemployment, he knows as well as I know that blacks, who have not had jobs for generations, and still do not have them, will be enraged. And whites will be fearful that blacks will come and get the few jobs that are left.

Now, it is in the face of this threat that we must not permit the foolishness of some in the Negro community to obstruct our brothers in the trade union movement who are white from keeping their heads and being sensible. And we must not permit the vestiges of discrimination in the trade union movement, which have not yet been cleared up, to obscure in the eyes of the Negro community the positive things labor has done.

There is great strength in this movement, in this labor-minorities coalition, and don't let anyone tell you it's dead. This coalition can only be destroyed from within. It cannot be destroyed from without, if we stand firm.

We beat Haynsworth back and we beat Carswell back, and I think the most important lesson we have to learn from Carswell we learn from George Meany.

Somebody said to George Meany, "George, what do you know about Carswell's record on labor?" And George Meany said, "I don't know what his record is on labor because he has never been active enough in this regard to have a record." Then he added what was the wisest word said about the Carswell nomination. "What I do know from history," he said, "is that any man who has a record on civil rights such as Carswell has must have an anti-labor bias—because the two go hand in hand."

AN ALLIANCE is not necessarily based, as a marriage is, on love and affection. You know, people often jump on me for defending the labor movement. How can I do anything but defend the labor movement since all black folks are workers? We either make it or we don't make it in the trade union movement.

Do you realize that if you added up all the money that the 2 million black people who are in the trade union movement make and then on the other side add up all the money that those who are outside the trade union movement make, that 37 percent more money is made by blacks in the trade union movement.

I don't defend everything about it, but I have to, and want to, defend it. But, you have got to defend the right of minorities to political power to the degree that they deserve it, because there is not a single state where there is a "right to work" law or other anti-union act threatened that it could come if the black brother stands firm with the trade union movement, and that goes down the line on anything that is anti-labor.

We are one, and we are one because we have mutual need for one another. It's simple mathematics. We need you, and you need us.

But if this coalition is to work well two things have got to cease. The black brother today is not what the black brother was five years ago. He can perform in the trade union movement and in the black community to the degree that he has visibility in decision-making and in administration of the trade union movement.

And secondly, the black brothers have got to understand that no matter what we are faced with in the fight for visibility and the fight for elimination of any vestige of discrimination in the trade union movement, we must work for them not outside of the trade union movement but inside—where we can democratically achieve the unity we need and continue to build the coalition of labor and minorities without which no progress is possible for either of us.

On Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico:

Shipping Costs Impact on Prices Weighed by Labor and Industry

MARITIME UNIONS and management are shaping joint efforts to find solutions to the "unusual transportation circumstances" and problems of Alaska, Hawaii and Puerto Rico, it was reported on Labor News Conference.

"Obviously, shipping costs do have an impact" on the economies of these areas, said William Moody, administrator of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., but many other factors add to the complex problem. He pointed out that Alaska's limited warehousing makes it hard for merchants there to "build up large inventories like they do in other areas," and that is "reflected in (consumer) prices."

Appearing with Moody on the AFL-CIO-produced network radio interview, Bert Gottlieb, research director of the industry-sponsored Transportation Institute, said that "all of the factors that economists accept as leading to higher prices and higher living costs exist in Hawaii." These are relatively high employment, heavy influx of government money for defense and other programs, population growth about double that of the mainland states, and a big tourist trade.

Moody and Gottlieb agreed that the conference produced "encouraging" signs that the unions, management, businessmen and government officials "are finally working together—jointly—in the effort to solve" the problems of these areas without harming "any of these great and deserving American interests."

Moody warned that "weakening" the Jones Act protection of American-flag ships' transportation rights between continental U.S. ports and the noncontiguous states and island territories would not cut transportation costs, but could harm "the national security of this country."

"If foreign-flag operators were allowed to capture (this trade) by undercutting American-flag operators . . . they would run their rates up" once they had driven the American-flag ships out, he declared.

WALL STREET is going through the worst stock market crash since the end of World War II and is now at the lowest point it has been in six years.

Hundreds of millions of dollars in paper values have been wiped out and none of the hopeful statements of the Nixon Administration has been able to give more than a fleeting boost to stock prices.

Yet for those who lived through the Wall Street crash of 1929 and what it did to the national economy, there is little resemblance between the 1970 situation and the 1929 one.

Individuals, of course, are suffering. But the impact of the 1970 "bear" market to date has been nowhere nearly as disastrous to the national economy as the 1929 one.

There are a number of reasons for this but one is that Wall Street no longer is as dominant an influence on the economy as it once was.

Today's catastrophic drop in stock values has been partly psychological. Paper losses have been large, but most stock owners still own their stocks and can vaguely hope for a return to the fat values of February 1969.

In 1929 people who "owned" stock on the big margins that were then permitted were literally wiped out.

In 1970 there are a number of built-in safeguards and stabilizers in the economy. Ironically enough, most of these built-in factors were put there by a couple of generations of New Dealers, Fair Dealers and Great Society supporters who pushed through legislation that was bitterly opposed by conservatives.

Creation of the Securities & Exchange Commission in 1934 has served to protect investors from the worst of Wall Street's own excesses. Bank deposits are now guaranteed and today's Wall Street plunge has not been followed by wholesale bank closings as happened in 1929.

SINCE 1933, despite bitter conservative opposition, all sorts of social legislation, vigorously supported by liberals and organized labor, has given the American economy solid props that have prevented a repetition of the Great Depression.

The list is long and honorable: the Social Security system, the minimum wage, unemployment compensation, federal aid to state welfare programs, Medicare, Medicaid, and a great number of improvements over the years which have helped keep the economy going in abnormal as well as normal times.

Added to this is the contribution that organized labor has made in helping to set up pension systems, in helping to keep wages at decent levels, and in supporting progressive legislation.

Unemployment during the Great Depression reached the astronomical height of 12,830,000 workers, or 24.9 percent, in 1933. Today 4.5 percent is considered a "trigger" percentage high enough to put into effect extended jobless benefits. From 24.9 to 4.5—we have come a long way.

What is happening on Wall Street, of course, is not to be belittled. Millions of investors, many of them rank and file workers, have their stake—big or little—in what happens to the market. The loss of stock values, even paper ones, has a crucial impact on spending patterns. That vacation may be cancelled; that new car unbought; new furniture left in some warehouse. Stocks to be used as collateral for loans no longer have the value that they had a year ago. People who have lost money on Wall Street just don't feel as affluent as they once did, and they are thinking twice before spending what they still have.

All this has its impact on the economy and on jobs and, as the rising rate of unemployment shows, it has had a depressing effect.

Nevertheless, today's generation can thank the New Deal and Fair Deal and other liberal and labor-supported measures beginning with the Roosevelt Administration in 1933 for sparing us the kind of depression that began in October 1929.

WORKING TOGETHER, maritime unions and management are shaping solutions to the "unusual transportation circumstances" of Alaska, Hawaii and Puerto Rico, reported Bert Gottlieb, research director for the Transportation Institute, and William Moody, administrator of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., second and third from left. They appeared on Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio. Questioning them were Neil Gilbride, left, of the Associated Press and Frank Swoboda of Business Week magazine.

Label Campaign Pushed:

Farm Union Spurs Drive for Rights

it silent, but only momentarily, until farm workers are able to get their freedom."

At that point, Chavez said, "we're going to take the chain off—we're going to ring the bell so that Pres. Meany can hear it, so that all men of good will all over the world will hear it as signifying the end of the oppression of the farm worker."

The bell is the gift of the British Transport & General Workers. It was cast in the Whitechapel Bell Foundry, London.

The bell ceremony was followed by the presentation of a grape box with the new UFWOC union label—a black eagle or "thunderbird" on a white circle set against a red field. Chavez gave it to Meany.

AFL-CIO Dir. of Organization William L. Kircher introduced Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) as a member of Congress who favors including farm workers under the labor act, and one who marched with them from Delano, Calif., and Columbia. O'Hara called the struggle of the farm workers a fight for "first class citizenship." Such workers are now excluded from coverage under the labor act.

The rally on the Mall before the U.S. Department of Agriculture building featured some 1,000 farm workers, members of other unions, and young people rallied by students of St. Mary's Seminary, Catonsville, Md.

Pulling their freedom bell, they walked behind a banner of Our Lady of Guadelupe, patroness of Mexican Catholics; flags symbolizing "huelga," used below the border when a strike is in progress; and banners of other kinds.

Chavez told the rally "as you have heard, we are slowly but surely winning our fight" for union contracts. Five contracts have been signed with California table grape growers, and the first union-label grapes will go on sale early in June.

"If people don't buy these grapes because they are union-grown," Chavez said, "they should buy them because they are better for the health. They are free of pesticides" because of protections written into UFWOC contracts.

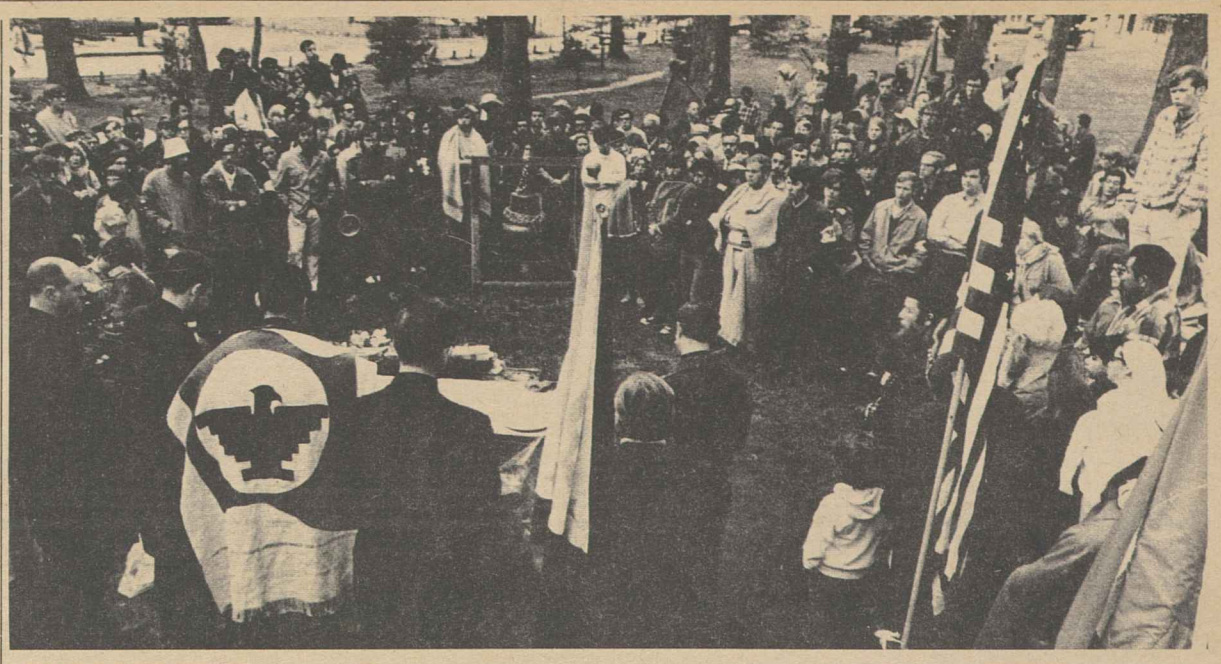
The farm workers have found the U.S. government and its agencies ranged against them, behind the growers, he related.



"If the Defense and Agriculture departments really want to buy grapes, as they say they do, it will be OK now provided they buy grapes with the union label," he said to loud applause and cries of "huelga, huelga."

Chavez listed federal support payments to big corporation grape growers. Six big firms were paid more than $1 million apiece, with two of the six getting more than $3 million—J. G. Boswell Co. and Giffin, Inc.—in crop subsidies.

Growers who got over $1 million each, according to a statement in the Congressional Record by Rep. Paul Findley (R.-Ill.) were South Lake Farms, Fresno; Salyer Land Co., Corcoran; Mt. Whitney Farms, Five Points; and the Kern County Land Co., Bakersfield.

The latter grower was bought recently by Tenneco, a fast-growing conglomerate that Chavez identified as "the biggest scab grape grower in the United States."

The weekend pilgrimage started at Columbia, near Baltimore. Among those taking part were the Rev. Eugene Boutilier of Washington; the Rev. Victor Salandini of New York City, who celebrated a field Mass for the marchers in Silver Spring. Md. and the Rev. Ralph Abernathy of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

FARM WORKERS—on a 30-mile pilgrimage from Columbia, Md., to Washington, D.C.—pause for an outdoor Mass at Silver Spring, Md. (top photo). The celebrant, Rev. Victor Salandini, wears a vestment bearing the "thunderbird" label of the farm workers. Father Salandini is the research director of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee. The farm workers' freedom bell (right photo) is pushed along the march route to Washington. The chained bell will ring out when farm workers achieve full rights to collective bargaining.

The march was one of a number staged by the farm union to call public attention to the plight of the U.S. migrant worker and the refusal of major table grape corporations to let their workers vote for or against union representation. The UFWOC has signed more than a dozen contracts with California grape growers and also is pressing for inclusion of agricultural workers under federal and state labor laws, Union Chairman Cesar Chavez told a Washington rally.

Rail Waymen's Frank Noakes Dead at 66

Detroit—Frank L. Noakes, secretary-treasurer of the Maintenance of Way Employes and a leader in furthering solidarity between U.S. and Mexican unions, died in a hospital here after a brief illness. He was 66.

Noakes joined the Waymen in 1924 after he went to work for the Illinois Central Railroad. After serving as a local chairman and general chairman on the carrier, he was elected Waymen's secretary-treasurer in 1956.

He represented railroad unions at the formation of the Joint United States-Mexico Trade Union Committee in Mexico City in 1953, and was named chairman of the U.S. section—a post he held until his death. The committee has helped solve border problems in the interest of workers in both countries.

Noakes also was a member of the Labor Dept.'s Farm Labor Advisory Committee.

Rubber Union's Strike Spreads to Goodrich

Rubber Co., whose agreement with the union expires May 15.

All members of the URW's Goodrich policy committee voted earlier to authorize a strike on May 5 unless more progress toward agreement was made. The deadline was extended in the hope of last-minute negotiating progress, but Goodrich refused to narrow the gap and union members began taking to the picket lines May 6.

URW Pres. Peter Bommarito, who has been sitting in on Goodrich negotiations, said the strike was caused by company foot-dragging.

Union and management had reached a basis for agreement on occupational health and safety protection for Goodrich employes, but no similar progress was made on other issues.

Bommarito reported that management proposals fall short of acceptability in the areas of wages, pensions, cost-of-living protection, vacations, interplant inequity adjustments and skilled trade differential pay.

Goodyear strikers began receiving $25 strike benefit checks this week, the third week of their walkout.

The union is asking for a "substantial" pay raise in line with high company profits and steadily rising living costs. Other major issues are improved pension benefits keyed to the consumer price index, and "clear language" to protect employes against "toxic chemicals, compounds and related work hazards."

Bommarito said of Goodyear "it is realizing the biggest profits" it has ever received but is "not willing to pass a fair measure of those profits along" to the workers who made them possible.

Meany Asks Senate to Veto Choice Of Management Lawyer for NLRB

as an attorney has been representing management."

Miller continued: "I have been asked on a couple of occasions to represent unions, but our firm has a sufficiently broad practice in representing management, so we felt a conflict of interest would inevitably develop were we to accept that representation. . . ."

Meany emphasized to the committee that "Miller recognized that employers and unions are antagonistic and that a lawyer representing employers is necessarily so imbued with the employer point of view that it is not feasible for him to represent unions. There would be a 'conflict of interest', Mr. Miller believed, in even representing employers in one case and unions in quite another."

Tracing the essentially judicial, or quasi-judicial nature of the NLRB in handling unfair labor practice and representation cases, and noting the need also for impartiality for the board's general counsel, Meany added that while it is possible that a union or employer attorney might be able to put past associations aside "a suspicion would always remain, and it is important that justice not only be done but that it appear to be done."

The AFL-CIO president reviewed for the committee the history of appointments to the NLRB by Democratic and Republican administrations.

Democratic presidents appointed 22 board members, Meany noted, and none was a union lawyer or connected with the trade union movement despite the fact that "the labor movement has had a certain amount of influence with some Democratic administrations."

The experience under Republican presidents "has been quite different." Meany pointed out, with five of the nine appointees drawn directly from "active service with the business community." Three nominees to the board, at the time of their nomination, were employer lawyers.

Concluding, Meany told the committee that "the Senate should reject this appointment, and any other appointment of a partisan advocate to what is meant to be a non-partisan, quasi-judicial agency."

He urged also that the labor committees of Congress consider legislation to "ban former board members and general counsels from practicing before it for a substantial time after leaving, such as five years."

Miller was nominated to the five-year term by Pres. Nixon on Feb. 20 to replace board member Sam Zagoria whose term had expired. The President said he would designate Miller as chairman to succeed Frank W. McCulloch.

Miller, 47, of Chicago, was a partner in the law firm of Pope, Ballard, Uriell, Kennedy, Shepard & Fowle, noted for representing management in labor relations cases. He was nominated after a two-month search by the Administration for a suitable candidate.

Labor Deplores Attacks On Jews in Soviet Union

New York—American labor's "deep concern over a vicious anti-Jewish campaign being pursued with increased vigor in the Soviet Union" was expressed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in a telegram to a labor gathering here.

Meany told a Conference in Support of Soviet Jewry held by the Jewish Labor Committee that the facts of anti-Semitism are clearly established despite denials by Russia's Communist leaders.

He pointed out that all Jews are required to list themselves as such in applications for jobs and education; Jews are excluded from many posts in government and the army; Jewish quotas exist in schools of higher education; and the Yiddish language is banned in periodicals and books.

"To the long list of persecutions, suppressions of labor's rights and human rights practiced by the Soviet leadership have been added the traditional mark of totalitarianism—discrimination against the Jewish people," Meany concluded.

Labor-Negro Unity Stressed:

'One Society' Theme Of LID Conference

New York—Commitment to the goal of a "single society," to be achieved through democratic action, emerged as the dominant theme of the 65th annual conference of the League for Industrial Democracy.

The climax of the two-day conference was the presentation of the league's 1970 annual award to Roy Wilkins, executive director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Wilkins was cited for "his leadership in the fight for racial integration, social equality and democracy for all Americans."

North Carolina AFL-CIO Pres. Wilbur Hobby presented the award to NAACP Co-Director John Morsell, who accepted on behalf of Wilkins.

Hobby read the award, which said in part, "today, when too many erstwhile friends of equality have fallen in confusion or despair into the grip of the separtist mystique, Roy Wilkins remains the eloquent and cogent speaker for one society — not two."

Special citations were presented to AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller and Clarence Mitchell, legislative director of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, for leading the fight on Capitol Hill against the nominations of Judges Haynsworth and Carswell to the Supreme Court.

Biemiller, who accepted the citations for himself and Mitchell, was executive secretary of the Student League for Industrial Democracy from 1931 to 1933.

Biemiller told of the difficulties he and Mitchell had in persuading even liberal senators that the Haynsworth and Carswell nominations could actually be defeated.

Crediting the solidity of the Negro-labor alliance with this victory. Biemiller praised Mitchell as the "hardest working man on the Hill." He warned, however, that only strong action could prevent the Nixon Administration from watering down the Voting Rights Act.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in a telegram to the conference, joined in saluting Wilkins for "his firm commitment to the principles of democracy and decency."

Those principles, Meany said, "were really what was at stake in the historic Senate battles against the Haynsworth and Carswell nominations where the NAACP banner was so capably carried by Clarence Mitchell." Meany termed the drive to extend the Voting Rights Act "an equally crucial battle."

American Federation of Teachers Pres. David Selden also received a special citation for his leadership of the successful Newark teachers strike last winter. Selden had been released only the previous day from the Essex County jail, where he served a 60-day sentence for picketing with his Newark members.

The NAACP's John Morsell sounded the keynote of the conference when he called on labor and civil rights groups to work together toward a "single society." Disagreements had sometimes arisen between them, he said, but they were over "questions of tactics, never of basic policy."

Morsell chided white liberals who have hailed the black separatist movement as "the vanguard of black thought." He singled out some Protestant denominations which, he said, "treat black people as if they were children."

If a group of whites demanded money from the Episcopal Church, Morsell said, the church would carefully weigh the merit of the demand. "But when a group of Negroes demand money, the church gives it without asking what it's for or who's getting it."

He stressed that separatist doctrines, whether pursued by whites or blacks, have led historically to the creation of two societies—"separate and unequal."

Earlier in the LID Conference, Earth Day Coordinator Denis Hayes shared a panel discussion on "The Politics of Pollution" with ILGWU Assistant Pres. Gus Tyler, and Eldon Clingan, minority leader of the New York City Council.

Tyler warned that in a society threatened by such calamitous problems as over-population and destructive waste, "there is no solution short of imposed social planning." The question our generation must face, the panel concluded, "is whether this will be democratic social planning or the imposition of totalitarian controls which discriminate against minority groups."

Elmer Walker Dies, Ex-Official of IAM

Elmer E. Walker, retired secretary-treasurer of the Machinists, died after a series of heart attacks at the age of 69.

Walker joined IAM Local 121 in 1918 as an apprentice machinist for Swift & Co. in East St. Louis, Ill., and remained an active member and union officer until his retirement in 1965.

After service as local union officer and IAM district representative in St. Louis, he became a field representative for the U.S. Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training. In 1942 he was named special assistant to Vice Chairman Joseph D. Keenan of the War Production Board. Later he served on Pres. Truman's Wage Stabilization Board.

He became IAM secretary-treasurer in 1959 after 14 years of service as a union vice president.

His wife, Jeannette, a son and two daughters survive.

Training Set For Minorities In New Mexico

Albuquerque, N.M.—A program to upgrade the skills of 100 prospective journeymen in the building trades has been set up here with a $152,423 grant from the Dept. of Labor.

The trainees, mostly Negroes and Mexican-Americans, will be workers with some skills but without journeyman status, or they will be workers beyond the normal age for apprentices.

The 18-month grant was made to the Journeyman Advancement Program for New Mexico, Inc. The same group is concurrently operating an Apprenticeship Outreach program to prepare 45 minority youths for entry into the building trades. This is the group's second Outreach program, with 65 youths placed in 10 trades at the completion of the first program.

F. W. Sanders of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, the project director, said that Albuquerque has several low-cost housing programs under way, on which many of the graduates of the Outreach program were placed. Sanders said these projects, one of which is operated by the Carpenters, would also provide a job source for the journeymen to be upgraded under the new grant.
